Theatre and Amusement Janitors Union, Local 9, Service Employees International Union, AFL–CIO (Blumenfeld Enterprises, Inc.) and Yhya Mohamed. Case 20–CB–7404

July 29, 1988

DECISION AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN STEPHENS AND MEMBERS JOHANSEN AND CRACRAFT

On April 28, 1988, Administrative Law Judge Joan Wieder issued the attached decision. The Respondent Union filed exceptions and a supporting brief, and the General Counsel filed a reply brief.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the decision and the record in light of the exceptions and briefs and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings,[1] findings, and conclusions[2] and to adopt the recommended Order.

ORDER

The National Labor Relations Board adopts the recommended Order of the administrative law judge and orders that the Respondent, Theatre and Amusement Janitors Union, Local 9, Service Employees International Union, AFL–CIO, San Francisco, California, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall take the action set forth in the Order.

[1] The Respondent has excepted to some of the judge's credibility findings. The Board's established policy is not to overrule an administrative law judge's credibility resolutions unless the clear preponderance of all the relevant evidence convinces us that they are incorrect. Standard Dry Wall Products, 91 NLRB 544 (1950), enfd. 188 F.2d 362 (3d Cir. 1951). We have carefully examined the record and find no basis for reversing the findings.

[2] We agree with the judge's finding that Charley Huber was an agent of the Respondent, as he held the office of president of the Local on November 17, 1987. We, therefore, find it unnecessary to rely on the judge's alternative finding that Huber, even if he were not president, was an apparent agent for the Respondent.

Christine Ralls, Esq., for the General Counsel.
William Sokol, Esq. (Van Bourg, Weinberg, Roger and Rosenfeld), of San Francisco, California, for the Respondent.

DECISION

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

JOAN WIEDER, Administrative Law Judge. This case was tried in San Francisco, California, on February 23, 1988. The initial charge was filed by Yhya Mohamed, an Individual, against the Theatre and amusement Janitors Union, Local 9, Service Employees International Union, AFL–CIO (the Union), on October 9, 1987, and amended on November 24, 1987.[1] The complaint, issued on December 18, 1987, and amended at trial, alleges the Union refused to permit Mohamed to view specified hiring hall records in violation of Section 8(b)(1)(A) of the National Labor Relations Act. In its answer, the Union denied the commission of any unfair labor practices.

All parties were provided opportunity to present oral and documentary evidence, cross-examine witnesses, and present oral argument. Counsel for the General Counsel presented an oral argument, and a posthearing brief has been received from Respondent.[2]

On the entire record, including my observation of the demeanor of the witness, and after due consideration of all pleadings and Respondent's brief, I make the following

FINDINGS AND CONCLUSIONS

I. JURISDICTION

The Union admits its status as a labor organization and stipulated that Blumenfeld San Francisco Theaters (Blumenfeld), a partnership with an office and place of business in San Francisco, California, where it is engaged in the operation of movie theaters and the exhibition of motion pictures, during the calendar year ending December 31, 1986, derived gross revenues in excess of $500,000 from such business and purchased and received goods and materials valued in excess of $5000 which originated from points outside the State of California. However, the Union asserts that Blumenfeld is not the appropriate entity to derive jurisdiction in this proceeding and therefore claims the Board lacks jurisdiction.

It is Respondent's position that it is a "minuscule union" predominately concerned with representing janitors at racetracks; thus, most of its operations are not encompassed within the Board's jurisdiction. The Union did not adduce any evidence in support of this position. The Union did stipulate that from time to time it had collective-bargaining agreements with Blumenfeld and the last contract requiring them to hire janitors from the Union under an exclusive hiring hall provision, which has expired, was being followed by Blumenfeld and the Union in 1987. Accordingly, I find this claim of lack of jurisdiction to be without merit.

The most recent collective-bargaining agreement effective August 1, 1980, provides in relevant part:

> Section 2. Union Security
> (a) Union Membership: Membership in good standing in the Union not later than the thirty-first (31st) day following the beginning of employment or not later than the thirty-first (3lst) day following the effective date of this Agreement, whichever is later, shall be a condition of employment.
> (b) Hiring: When new or additional employees are needed, the Employer shall notify the Union of

Mohamed has never worked in a Blumenfeld theater but has been dispatched by the Union to work in other theaters and for various television stations, and is dependent on the Union on matters affecting his employment.

The complaint alleges, and I find, based on the stipulation and admitted uncontroverted facts, that Blumenfeld is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act. Similarly, I further find the Union is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

II. THE ALLEGED UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

A. The Facts

Only one witness appeared and testified, Mohamed. Mohamed has been a union member since 1972. He signed the out-of-work list "years ago." The list contains only the members' names and telephone numbers. At any one time, there were only about 15 names on the list. Usually, the same 15 members' names were on the list. As each new list was posted, Mohamed signed it. As a member was dispatched, his name would be crossed off the list. During 1987, Mohamed visited the Union 2 to 3 days a week seeking work. The list was hung on a wall and he frequently consulted it to determine if he would be dispatched. He was consistently told there was no work. The turnover rate was apparently slow; the list was changed approximately every 5 months.

In mid-1987, Mohamed began to suspect that members were being dispatched out of order.[3] While he was at the union hall seeking work, he observed on the table used by the dispatchers four or five dispatch slips for several television stations, including KGO and KPIX. He does not know if the individuals dispatched to these jobs had their names crossed off the out-of-work list as he did not check. At the time he observed these dispatch slips, he talked to an individual called Kelly, who was indisputably a dispatcher for the Union. Mohamed asked Kelly if there was any work for him. Kelly replied "there's nothing, there's nothing for you, there's no job, it's kind of slow." After observing the dispatch slips, Mohamed asked about them if there was no work and Kelly said:

> Well those people had been request [sic]. I said this is not true request, I've been working Channel 5, I've been working Channel 7, I've been working all the building or this TV station that Local 9 has and these are the ones that put me to work. You can't say that. Well he says it's nothing, I can't do anything, there's no work for you.

Mohamed never talked to any individuals he suspected received a dispatch, whether or not he believed their names were crossed off the list. He thought some names were not taken off the list after the members had been dispatched. Mohamed testified he would be told that certain individuals were dispatched and yet would still see their names on the list. Mohamed was unsure whether there were two or three copies of the dispatches, but it is undisputed that there were at least two; one to be given to the Employer and one to be placed in the members' file which was maintained by the Union.

On November 16, Mohamed telephoned the Union and spoke to an individual he identified as Louie's wife. It is undisputed that Louie also dispatched members and was assisted by his wife. He asked her if there was any work for him and she replied:

> There is no work for you. Then I ask her well I like to have a copy for the dispatch for the past six months because all the time I call she's no work and I'd like to get a copy.[4] She said no we have to get an order for that from the court and she hung up on me. I tried to call her again and she hung up again.

The next day, November 17, Mohamed went to the union hall and saw Charley Huber.[5]

[3] There is no allegation in the complaint that the Union violated the Act by making out-of-order dispatches.

[4] Respondent claimed in its opening argument that Mohamed sent a letter to the Union claiming, "My attorney has advised me to ask for referral lists from the Union." The letter was not placed in evidence. Respondent understood that the reference to "my attorney" was either an attorney or field examiner for Region 20 and raised as a defense to the complaint the claim that the charge had been solicited by the Region. I find this claim has not been shown to be meritorious. On cross-examination Mohamed said no one told him to ask for the dispatch slips and he did not tell Kelly his attorney advised him to ask for the dispatch slips. Inasmuch as Mohamed's testimony is uncontroverted, Respondent has failed to substantiate this allegation of solicitation of the charge by the Region. See generally Plumbers Local 136 (Shaw Co.), 280 NLRB 847 (1986).

[5] Respondent denies Huber is the president of the Local. I credit Mohamed's uncontroverted testimony that he referred to Huber as the president during the described conversation that day, November 17; and Huber admitted he was president of the Local. Furthermore, neither Huber nor Kelly, who was also present, claimed that Huber was no longer president. This conclusion is supported by a Labor Organization Annual Report, Form LM-3, submitted by Respondent to the United States Department of Labor pursuant to the Labor Management Reporting and Disclosure Act of 1959, as amended, and Title VII of the Civil Service Reform Act, which indicates Huber was the president in 1986 and the next regular election for officers was December 1987. Mohamed testified, without dispute, that Huber was president of the Local since he

Mohamed asked Huber if Huber could assist him in getting work, since there had been other members dispatched. Huber asked his name and when told referred to a suit Mohamed had initiated against the union, which cost them $700 for attorney's fees. Mohamed again asked Huber for work. Huber replied: "Well we can't do that. The Executive Board they say there's no work for you." Mohamed then told him he as president should be able to assist him. Huber rejoined: "There's no work, there's no work for you and I'm President doesn't mean any good, because I'm President I can't do anything."

Mohamed then asked to get a copy of the Union's dispatches for the past 6 months indicating that he thought others had been dispatched out of order when he should have been dispatched. Huber told him they could not give him the information without a court order and referred him to their attorney. The Union never gave Mohamed a copy of the requested dispatches or offered to let him review the documents in the union hall. Mohamed telephoned the Union's attorney three times, left his name and telephone number, but his calls were never returned.

B. Analysis and Conclusions

The Union's position is that they are not under a legal obligation to let one member see the files of all the other members.

As was held in Operating Engineers Local 825 (Building Contractors), 284 NLRB 188, 189 (1987):

> A union has an obligation to deal fairly with an employee's request for job referral information and that an employee is entitled to access to job referral lists to determine his relative position in order to protect his referral rights. Teamsters Local 282 (AGC of New York), 280 NLRB 733, 735 (1986); Operating Engineers Local 324 (AGC of Michigan), 226 NLRB 587 (1976). Moreover, it has been held that "A union breaches its duty of fair representation in violation of Section 8(b)(1)(A) of the NLRA when it arbitrarily denies a member's request for job referral information, when that request is reasonably directed towards ascertaining whether the member has been fairly treated with respect to job referrals." See NLRB v. Carpenters Local 608, 811 F.2d 149 (2d Cir. 1987), enfg. 279 NLRB 747 (1986).

Respondent argues that Mohamed offered no "good reasons" for his request which it claims "is overbroad and burdensome . . . it invades the privacy of the members, and Mohamed has always been allowed to see the out-of-work list." I find these arguments unpersuasive and lacking in merit.

As previously indicated, a union member has the right to protect his right to fair treatment by the union in matters affecting his employment. Miranda Fuel Co., 140 NLRB 181, 189 (1962). In that decision, the Board quoted from Electrical Workers IUE Local 801 v. NLRB; NLRB v. General Motors Corp., 307 F.2d 679, 683 (D.C. Cir. 1962), as follows:

> Among the most important of labor standards imposed by the Act as amended is that of fair dealing, which is demanded of the union in their dealings with employees. . . . The requirement of fair dealing between a union and its members is in a sense fiduciary in nature and arises out of two factors. One is the degree of dependence of the individual employee on the union organization; the other, a corollary of the first, is the comprehensive power vested in the union with respect to the individual.

In this case, Mohamed indicated he was on the out-of-work list for years without dispatch and suspected he was not being treated fairly by the Union. He suspected other members were dispatched out of order and the mentioning of a prior suit he filed against the Union further raised his suspicions of unfair treatment. Instead of taking steps to allay his concerns, the Union referred Mohamed to their attorney. There was no claim of unduly burdensome efforts required to meet the request for the dispatch slips as the basis for denial when Mohamed spoke to anyone at the Union. Only after union representatives denied his requests did counsel raise the claim that the request was unduly burdensome.

I find this claim is not colorably valid. On the one hand Respondent asserts it is so minuscule as to avoid the Board's jurisdiction, and on the other presents assertions that reviewing personnel files for dispatch slips is so burdensome as to overcome a member's right to information relevant to determining if he is receiving fair treatment when he fails to receive a dispatch. The uncontroverted evidence of record is that there were few dispatches over the 6-month period encompassed in the request in a "minuscule" Union. There was no evidence that there were logistical problems in providing the information. Huber and Louis' wife did not make such a claim at the time Mohamed made his requests. If there are impediments to providing the information, Respondent has not demonstrated them.

Similarly, Respondent failed to substantiate its claim that the personnel files of its members contain confidential material. There is no evidence of what they contained other than dispatch slips. Again, it was not until after the Union refused to provide the information that a claim of confidentiality was raised. I find there is no basis to conclude that the material contained in the files warrants designating them confidential. Even if I assume there are confidential matters contained in the files, as noted above, there was no reasonable impediment demonstrated to Respondent's extracting the dispatch slips from the files. Thus, I conclude Respondent's refusal to honor Mohamed's request was arbitrary.

became a member. Any change in officers after such a long tenure would likely be the subject of common knowledge and/or susceptible to documentation; no documentation supporting the claimed change of union presidents was submitted. Based on the absence of any evidence that there was a change in officers, the situs of the conversion in the office rather than outside in the hall, and the failure of Huber and Kelly to disclaim Mohamed's assertion, I find Huber was president of the Union on November 17, 1987. Additionally, assuming Huber was no longer president, his failure to correct Mohamed's understanding in the presence of the uncontroverted agents, makes Huber an agent for Respondent during the time here pertinent and renders the Union responsible for his statements and actions.

As found in Operating Engineers Local 324 (AGC of Michigan), 226 NLRB 587, 598–599 (1976):

> A union is a service agency, designed to further the interests of the employees it represents. There is no reason for it to be a closed society, unresponsive to reasonable requests of the unit employees. As the Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit noted in I.U.E., Frigidaire Local 801 v. NLRB, supra, 307 F.2d at 683 (per J. Burger), a union, as the agent of employees, is subject to the positive obligation set forth in Restatement (Second), Agency Section 381 (1958): "To use reasonable efforts to give his principal information which is relevant to affairs entrusted to him and which, as the agent has notice, the principal would desire to have." On the evidence before me, there is nothing to show that the [members'] request required Respondent to exert efforts which might be described as unreasonable and beyond the call of duty described.

In the circumstances of this case, I find Respondent violated Section 8(b)(1)(A) of the Act by arbitrarily denying Mohamed's request for the dispatch records for the preceding 6 months. Mohamed clearly requested the information to ascertain if he was being fairly treated by the Union when he failed to receive job referrals and he was entitled to and had a reasonable need for that information.

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. Blumenfeld Enterprises, Inc. is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.
2. The Union is now, and has been at all times material, a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.
3. By arbitrarily refusing to provide Yhya Mohamed with copies of dispatches for a specified 6-month period as lawfully requested by him, the Union has engaged in unfair labor practices within the meaning of Section 8(b)(1)(A) of the Act.
4. The aforesaid unfair labor practices are unfair labor practices within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

THE REMEDY

Having found the Union has engaged in unfair labor practices in violation of Section 8(b)(1)(A) of the Act, I recommend that it be ordered to cease and desist therefrom and that it take certain affirmative action to effectuate the policies of the Act. Having found that the Union unlawfully refused to provide Yhya Mohamed with the previously described information, I recommend that, on request duly made, it be ordered to do so.

On these findings of fact and conclusions of law and on the entire record, I issue the following recommended[6]

ORDER

DECISION AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN STEPHENS AND MEMBERS BABSON AND CRACRAFT

On June 9, 1983, Administrative Law Judge Jesse Kleiman issued the attached decision. The Respondent filed exceptions and a supporting brief.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the decision and the record in light of the exceptions and brief and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings,[2] and conclusions[3] only to the extent consistent with this Decision and Order and to adopt the recommended Order as modified.

The judge found that the Respondent's announcement, 1 week before the representation election, that it would lay off a number of employees was an unlawful, implied threat of layoff if the Union won the election. The Respondent excepts to this finding, claiming that the layoffs were justified by business considerations and that the announcement thereof was unrelated to the union campaign. We find merit in the Respondent's exceptions.

The Union filed its petition for a representation election on October 9, 1980; after a hearing on December 18, 1980, an election was scheduled for January 16, 1981,[4] at the Respondent's facilities on Southwood Drive and Tank Farm Road in San Luis Obispo, California. The Respondent manufactures telecommunications equipment, including telephone-switching and transmission devices. It is uncontested that during the period 1979 to 1980, the Respondent's business, which is heavily influenced by the housing market, declined because of an increase in the mortgage interest rate, which led to a decrease in the number of housing starts. In December 1980, the Respondent decided to remove itself from the telephone-switching business, to consolidate some of its operations, and to reduce the number of employees at certain locations. There is no claim that the Respondent lacked a substantial business justification for deciding to take the action described above.

To effectuate its plan, the Respondent determined it would (1) phase out 150 employees at its Sunnyvale, California facility between January and June 1981; (2) lay off employees at the San Luis Obispo facilities on February 27, 1981; and (3) lay off employees in Melbourne, Florida, on January 16, 1981. The Respondent put together an "overall communication plan" designed to inform all employees at all affected locations at the same time of its proposed reductions in force. The Respondent's plant production manager, Ray Antunez, held a meeting of Tank Farm Road employees on January 9. Antunez read a letter from the Respondent's vice president and general manager, A. B. Lipscomb, explaining the business need for a layoff and noting that the layoff would affect San Luis Obispo and Melbourne. Antunez advised the employees that approximately 19 Tank Farm Road employees would be laid off on February 27. An employee who attended this meeting testified that Antunez did not refer to the Union during his speech.

The Respondent's plant manager, Mac Brinton, held a meeting with Southwood Drive employees on January 12. Brinton announced that because of

[1] On November 2, 1987, the Teamsters International Union was readmitted to the AFL–CIO. Accordingly, the caption has been amended to reflect that change.

[2] The Respondent has excepted to some of the judge's credibility findings. The Board's established policy is not to overrule an administrative law judge's credibility resolutions unless the clear preponderance of all the relevant evidence convinces us that they are incorrect. Standard Dry Wall Products, 91 NLRB 544 (1950), enfd. 188 F.2d 362 (3d Cir. 1951). We have carefully examined the record and find no basis for reversing the findings.

[3] We agree with the judge that the Respondent discriminatorily enforced its no-access rule in violation of Sec. 8(a)(1) when it refused to allow off-duty employees the use of the company cafeteria to discuss the Union, while allowing other off-duty employee groups the use of the cafeteria for nonwork-related activities. However, in affirming the judge's decision in this regard, we do not adopt his reliance on A. W. Schlesinger Geriatric Center, 263 NLRB 1337 (1982). Fn. 2 of the Board's decision in A. W. Schlesinger reveals that the Board did not find in that case that the respondent there had disparately enforced its no-access rule. In addition, we find it unnecessary to pass on the issue, not raised by the complaint, of whether the Respondent's conduct would have violated the Act in the absence of discrimination. See Methodist Hospital of Gary, 263 NLRB 411 fn. 3 (1982), enfd. 733 F.2d 43 (7th Cir. 1984). We shall modify the judge's recommended Order to conform to the violation found.

Chairman Stephens agrees that the cease-and-desist provisions of the recommended Order should be modified by deleting the reference to "an unlawfully broad no-access rule" and replacing it with the provision contained in our modification of the Order. Because he considers the issue actually litigated, even if not alleged, he would reach this result by granting the Respondent's exception to the judge's overbreadth finding on the ground that Tri-County Medical Center, 222 NLRB 1089 (1976), modified the holding of GTE Lenkurt, Inc., 204 NLRB 921 (1973), only to the extent that it is now lawful for an employer to maintain a clearly disseminated rule denying access to off-duty employees only if that rule is limited in its application to "the interior of the plant and other working areas" and to those parts of "parking lots, gates and other outside nonworking areas" for which a business justification for denying access can be shown. Tri-County, supra. Chairman Stephens would adhere to the Tri-County rule as formulated, and, as the cafeteria is plainly not in an "outside area," he would find that a rule such as the Respondent's rule, so long as it is not discriminatorily enforced, is lawful as applied to the cafeteria. Chairman Stephens would overrule Hudson Oxygen Therapy Sales Co., 264 NLRB 61, 72 fn. 2 (1982), to the extent it holds otherwise.

poor economic conditions 19 employees would be laid off in late February. Vickie Wobermin, an employee who attended this meeting, testified that Brinton also stated "with the union organizing going on, he didn't want to hide anything. He wanted to be right up front and let them—let everyone know that there would be a layoff."

The judge found that the Respondent's announcement of layoffs during the critical preelection period constituted an implied threat of loss of employment in violation of Section 8(a)(1). The judge questioned the timing of the announcements at the San Luis Obispo facilities, both of which were made within 1 week of the January 16 election. In this regard, the judge referred to the testimony of Kent Anderson, the Respondent's director of human resources. Anderson admitted that the announcement of the employee layoffs at the San Luis Obispo facilities could have been made after the election because those layoffs were not to occur until February 27. The judge thus determined that the Respondent had some flexibility in timing the layoff announcements inasmuch as the actual layoffs were scheduled for different times at different locations. The judge also was not convinced that the Respondent had a definite company policy, which required such advance notice of layoffs. Finally, the judge referred to the statement made by Mac Brinton to the Southwood Drive employees. Considering the facts surrounding the layoff announcements as well as other evidence of antiunion hostility, the judge found that the Respondent's layoff announcements were implied threats of loss of employment in violation of Section 8(a)(1).

We do not agree with the judge's findings in this regard. There is no dispute that the Respondent had substantial and legitimate business reasons for consolidating its operations and laying off employees; there is no claim to the contrary. Additionally, there is no claim that the timing of the Respondent's decision to consolidate its operations or the schedule of layoffs was motivated by anything other than legitimate business reasons.

Unlike the judge, we do not see the timing of the layoff announcements as lacking in business justification. The Respondent has a policy of giving as much advance notice as possible to employees who are being laid off. In this particular situation, the Respondent desired to coordinate its announcements so that all employees at all affected locations were informed at the same time. The Respondent's management expressed the need to present a consolidated communications plan to all affected employees so that they would understand the entire operating plan. As the Respondent had scheduled employee layoffs in Melbourne, Florida, on January 16, coincidentally the date of the Board election, the Respondent had little choice but to make its announcement prior to that date. Although the layoff announcements occurred prior to the election, there is no evidence that the timing thereof was for an unlawful purpose.

We also do not agree with the judge's conclusions regarding the statements made by Mac Brinton on January 12 to the Southwood Drive employees concerning being "up front" with the "union organizing going on." The judge concluded that this statement could be construed by employees as being a "coercive threat rather than [an] honest forecast." We do not find anything in Brinton's statement that connects the presence of the Union to the Respondent's need to lay off employees. There is nothing in his statement that, either expressly or impliedly, contains either a threat of reprisal or promise of benefit. There is no evidence that the Respondent was influenced in its actions by the representation election or that the Respondent acted in any way inconsistent with its usual business practices.[5] Under these circumstances, there is nothing in the Act that prohibits an employer from truthfully advising its employees of forthcoming layoffs. Accordingly, we find that the Respondent did not violate the Act by announcing employee layoffs.

ORDER

The National Labor Relations Board adopts the recommended Order of the administrative law judge as modified below and orders that the Respondent, TRW Vidar, a Division of TRW Corporation, San Luis Obispo, California, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall take the action set forth in the Order as modified.

1. Substitute the following for paragraph 1(a).

"(a) Discriminatorily enforcing its no-access rule against employees who engage in union activities."

2. Delete paragraphs 1(b) and 1(c) and reletter the subsequent paragraphs.

3. Substitute the attached notice for that of the administrative law judge.

DECISION

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

JESSE KLEIMAN, Administrative Law Judge. On the basis of a charge filed on January 13, 1981, by Teamsters-Warehousemen Local 381, International Brotherhood of Teamsters, Chauffeurs, Warehousemen & Helpers of America (Union), the General Counsel of the National Labor Relations Board (Board), by the Regional Director for Region 31, Los Angeles, California, duly issued a complaint and notice of hearing on March 25, 1981, against TRW Vidar, a Division of TRW Corporation (Respondent), alleging that the Respondent engaged in certain unfair labor practices within the meaning of Section 8(a)(1) of the National Labor Relations Act (the Act). On April 6, 1981, the Respondent filed an answer denying the material allegations in the complaint.

A hearing was duly held before me in Santa Maria, California,[1] on December 8, 1981. At the close of the General Counsel's case, the Respondent moved to dismiss paragraphs 8 and 9 of the complaint for failure of proof, which allege that the Respondent on January 9 and 12, 1981, "impliedly threatened to lay off certain of its employees if the Union won the election." I denied the motion. All parties were afforded full opportunity to appear, to introduce evidence, to examine and cross-examine witnesses, to argue orally on the record, and to file briefs. Thereafter, the General Counsel and the Respondent filed briefs. In its brief the Respondent seeks dismissal of the allegations in the complaint "out of hand" for failure of proof. For the reasons set forth, I deny the Respondent's application for dismissal in its entirety.

On the entire record and the briefs of the parties, and on my observation of the witnesses, I make the following

FINDINGS OF FACT

I. THE BUSINESS OF RESPONDENT

The Respondent, at all times material, has been a corporation organized under and existing by virtue of the laws of the State of Ohio, with an office and principal place of business located in San Luis Obispo, California, where it is engaged in the manufacture of telecommunication equipment.[2] In the course and conduct of the Respondent's business operations during the preceding 12 months, these operations being representative of its operations at all times material, the Respondent annually purchases and receives goods or services valued in excess of $50,000 directly from suppliers located outside the State of California for use at its San Luis Obispo, California location. The complaint alleges, the Respondent admits, and I find that the Respondent is now, and has been at all times material, an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

Furthermore, the complaint alleges, the Respondent admits, and I find that at all times material, Gerald Cross, the Respondent's personnel director, Mac Brinton, its plant manager, and Ray Antunez, its production manager at the San Luis Obispo, California plant have been, and are now, supervisors within the meaning of Section 2(11) of the Act and agents of the Respondent acting on its behalf.[3]

II. THE LABOR ORGANIZATION INVOLVED

The complaint alleges, the Respondent admits, and I find that Teamsters-Warehousemen Local 381, International Brotherhood of Teamsters, Chauffeurs, Ware-

[1] The transcript indicates that the hearing was held in Los Angeles, California, but this is incorrect. It was held in Santa Maria, California.

[2] Regarding its operations in San Luis Obispo, California, the Respondent maintains a facility located at 1050 Southwood Drive, and two annex facilities at Tank Farm Road.

[3] Kent Anderson, the Respondent's director of human resources working at its "Division Headquarters" in Sunnyvale, California, and John Lane, its production supervisor at the San Luis Obispo, California facilities both testified at the hearing. It is obvious from their testimony that they are supervisors within the meaning of Sec. 2(11) of the Act and agents of the Respondent acting on its behalf, and I so find.

housemen & Helpers of America is, and has been at all times material, a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

III. THE UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

The complaint alleges, in substance, that the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act by discriminatorily refusing to allow employees the use of the company cafeteria during nonworking hours for protected or concerted activities, by impliedly threatening its employees with layoffs if the Union won the election, and by threatening its employees with the withholding of work reviews if the Union won the election. The Respondent denies these allegations.

A. Background

The evidence shows that the Union commenced its organizational activities at the Respondent's Southwood Drive and Tank Farm Road Annex facilities in San Luis Obispo, California, in May 1980, and its activities continued through January 1981. The Respondent's brief asserts that, "On October 9, 1980, the Union, Teamsters Local 381, filed a petition for a representative election among the Respondent's production and maintenance employees. On December 18, 1980, following a hearing conducted by the Board, an election was ordered for January 16, 1981.[4] Gerald Cross, the Respondent's personnel manager at its San Luis Obispo, California facilities testified that during this period he was fully aware that some of the employees were engaging in activities in support of the Union, attending union meetings, wearing union campaign buttons, and distributing union "flyers or propaganda."[5]

B. The Evidence

1. The Respondent's refusal to allow employees to use its cafeteria for a union-related meeting

Vickie Wobermin, employed by the Respondent at its San Luis Obispo, California facilities since September 1971, and an active participant in the Union's organizational campaign at these facilities,[6] testified that she had distributed a notice, prepared by herself, to "test department personnel—the technicians and test specialists," scheduling a meeting to be held on Tuesday, December 2, 1980, at 4 p.m. in the Southwood Drive facility cafeteria.[7] Wobermin asserted that the reason therefore was that because of the pending Board election scheduled for January 16, 1981, the results of which could have "serious consequences" for the Respondent's "professional-technical employees," these employees should be fully informed regarding what union representation would mean, "ramifications of what geting in a union would do to us." Wobermin related that the meeting had been arranged for 4 p.m. and to last until 4:30 p.m. because the day-shift technicians completed their work shift at 4 p.m., while the night-shift technicians, her own work shift, did not commence work until 4:30 p.m.; therefore, all these employees would have a reason for being at the plant and would already be physically on the premises for the schduled meeting time. She added that this also acted to set the meeting during nonwork hours.[8]

Wobermin testified that on December 2, 1980, at 4 p.m., she appeared at the plant cafeteria with Kathy Tpomala, another technician employee, and that present were Larry McNamee, a day-shift technician, and several other employees. Wobermin stated that McNamee evidenced surprise at her presence there and advised her that the personnel manager, Gerald Cross, had "notified the group leaders that none of their people were to attend this meeting . . . they were told that they could not attend." Wobermin added that while she was in the cafeteria she observed Cross and Carl Findlay, the "warranty night-shift supervisor" walk up and down the hallway in front of the cafeteria entranceway several times.[9] According to Wobermin, she remained in the cafeteria until 4:30 p.m., with no other employees appearing to attend the meeting, whereupon she reported "immediately to work."

Wobermin recounted that approximately 2 days later she wrote a letter to the Respondent's management through "direct line . . . a direct communication letter between management and employees" in which she "ask[ed] why we were not allowed permission to have our meeting in the cafeteria."[10] Wobermin related that she subsequently received an answer from the Respondent typewritten across the bottom of her original "direct line" letter and posted on the "direct line board" which stated that, "we had not gotten an authorization to hold our meeting, and if they allowed us, they would have to allow other people to have meetings in the cafeteria." She testified that during the approximately 10 years she had been employed by the Respondent, she was unaware of any company rule requiring that employees obtain prior authorization from the Respondent to hold meetings on company premises. Wobermin added that she knew about, and had observed herself, various employee group meetings being held in the cafeteria during nonwork hours involving, "Weight Watchers . . . the racquetball club and the bowling league."

Gerald Cross testified that on or about December 1, 1980, he became aware of the efforts of some test specialists and technicians to holo a meeting in the Southwood Drive facility cafeteria, which was scheduled for December 2, 1980, at 4 p.m. for the purpose of discussing union matters. Cross stated that he had been given a copy of the meeting notice by Production Supervisor Rudy Buchmann, who had told him that the notices

[4] The representation hearing was held on or about October 30, 1980.

[5] Cross had testified at the representation hearing on October 30, 1980, and acknowledged subsequently learning in December 1980 that the Board had scheduled an election for January 16, 1981.

[6] Wobermin was a member of the Union's employee organizing committee, attended union meetings, distributed union literature, and wore union buttons.

[7] See G.C. Exh. 2.

[8] Gerald Cross confirmed in his testimony that technician and test specialists were not normally scheduled to work between 4 and 4:30 p.m.

[9] Wobermin testified that Cross and Findlay were approximately 20 feet from the cafeteria entranceway when this was occurring.

[10] See G.C. Exh. 6. This form is provided by the Respondent and after completion by an employee is placed in a box located in the hallway at the Southwood facility specifically for these communications.

were being distributed in the plant cafeteria, and he knew the date, time, place, and reason for the meeting. He related that after learning of the intended meeting, it was decided by himself in concert with "other members of management" not to allow these employees to hold the meeting because they had not requested nor received approval.

Cross testified that, "The company has a broad, general no-access policy to the premises where employees are denied permission to the plant before or after hours." He related that the "no-access" rule applies only to the plant interiors and other "working areas" and not to the parking lots or sidewalk areas. Cross maintained that prior permission from management to use the Respondent's premises for meetings is always required as "standard operating procedure" and that the employees had been made aware of this through "past practice."[11] Cross stated that the only written rule embodying the Respondent's "no-access policy" was a memorandum dated January 18, 1980, issued by him and posted on the plant bulletin board. The subject of the "Memo" is "I.D. Badges," and the stated purpose thereof being "to help [the Respondent] keep unauthorized people out of the plant, and to ensure our visitors are properly identified." The particular rule that allegedly encompasses the Respondent's "no-access" policy rule states, "No employee will be allowed access to the plant for personal reasons during off hours."[12] He continued that the Respondent has allowed various employees' groups, such as the company basketball team, the company bowling team, the company racquetball club, and a "Weight Watchers" group, to use the Southwood Road facility cafeteria during nonwork hours, but that permission for such use was always requested and received beforehand as standard operating procedure.[13] Cross added that the Respondent has also denied employee requests on behalf of groups seeking access and use of the Respondent's premises, i.e., permission was denied to hold a math class in the facility that would have been accredited through Questa College, and to hold a local San Luis Obispo United Fund group meeting at its premises.

Cross testified on direct examination that he had not instructed "certain group leaders of the technicians and test specialists to tell their employees that they could not attend that meeting." He also denied personally telling "some of the test specialists and technicians themselves that they could not . . . use the cafeteria of the company to hold the meeting to discuss the union, even if it was before or after work hours." The Respondent's counsel, however, had previously submitted a "summary of facts and statement of position" dated February 9, 1981, to the Board's Region 31 during the investigatory stage of this proceeding in apparent response to the Union's charge filed herein and seeking the dismissal of the charge in its entirety. This document states

> The Company has a broad, general no-access policy which prohibits employees from entering the plant prior to the beginning of their scheduled shift, or from remaining on the premises after their workday has been completed.
> Pursuant to this rule, Cross informed the technicians group that it could not conduct its meeting on company premises after regular working hours. He stated that although they were free to discuss the Union or any other matter they wished during breaks or lunch periods, they could not utilize the company cafeteria after or before their normal workday for the purpose announced in their notice. To the best knowledge of the Company's management, the proposed meeting was not held.[14]

On cross-examination, Cross attempted to explain this apparent inconsistency by asserting that what actually occurred was that he had not personally informed the technicians and test specialists that they could not conduct their planned meeting on the Respondent's premises, but instead had instructed Rudy Buchmann to tell the group leaders to advise these employees that the meeting could not be held, and Cross believed that the group leaders had done so.

2. The Respondent's layoff of employees

Kent Anderson, the Respondent's director of human resources, testified that the Respondent, as part of its business, is engaged in the manufacture of "telephone switching and transmission equipment, which is heavily influenced by housing starts—the housing industry—as well as interest rates, mortgage interest rates." He related that because the exceedingly high mortgage interest rates during 1979–1980, which resulted in a depressed housing market "which, in turn, has severely depressed the purchase of capital telephone equipment in the telephone in-[11] Cross testified that such requests to use company premises for meeting purposes were made orally to him or to "a sponsor of the employees' committee," whenever the employees' committee were going to meet," such as the bowling team.

[12] In substance, the rest of this "Memo" provides: that employees wear their identification badges when at the facilities; requires visitors to obtain and wear color-coded badges based on the reasons for their visit while at the facilities; and that, "A list of employees authorized to be in the plant, between 6/p.m. and 7 a.m., and weekends, will be maintained by the security guard. All others must have prior authorization by a manager or Supervisor I. Exceptions to this rule include personnel regularly scheduled to work second or third shift, and employees working overtime." See G.C. Exh. 4. Moreover, according to Cross, the Respondent enforces this rule as follows, "we have a guard service that comes on at 4:00 o'clock, locks the plant; in the main plant at 4:30 the guard makes a round to check and see who's in the operation," with Cross also checking after hours to see "who is around." The facility is locked until 7 a.m. and any employee seeking entrance sooner "must sign in if they're coming in to work early." When employees "are coming in after hours, then notice is left with the guard service that people would be coming in" to use the cafeteria, with such notice being given by Cross or his security assistant. Cross added that the meetings to be held in the cafeteria after work are generally attended by employees already on the premises and do not require notice to the guards for them to gain access to the facility.

[13] Cross testified that permission has also been granted to individual employees who are also college students to use equipment on the plant premises "to complete a requirement for graduation," but the Respondent has denied other individual employees such use of equipment for "other personal reasons."

dustry . . . our whole industy was depressed," resulting in lower sales and the loss of a "significant amount of money." Anderson stated that in late December 1980, the Respondent decided to "get out of the switching business entirely because of continued depression of the business" and, based on its "bookings and operating forecast," made plans for "some reductions in our work forces in various locations, plus some consolidation of some activities."

Anderson continued,

> What was decided was that we were going to have to close out Sunnyvale manufacturing plant on Borregas Avenue and move all of our ITS switching products to Melbourne, Florida; and what transmission product work that we were doing in Sunnyvale was going to have to be moved back to San Luis Obispo.
> At the same time, we also knew that we were going to have to make some reductions in force at Melbourne, Florida in January based on our operating plan, and begin the layoffs at Sunnyvale in January.
> We also knew that we were going to have to be making some small number of cuts at San Luis Obispo at the end of February.

Anderson recounted that the Borregas Avenue facility in Sunnyvale, California, employed about 150 employees who were going to be time-phased "completely out of the facility by the end of June, 1981," starting in January 1981. He added that the layoffs of employees in the reduction in force at the Respondent's Melbourne, Florida facility was scheduled for January 16, 1981, with layoffs at the San Luis Obispo, California facilities scheduled for February 27, 1981.

Anderson testified,

> There had been rumors about the fact that Borregas possibly would be closing—had been rumors for a considerable amount of time. We felt that it was very important that we put together a consolidated communication plan to all employees in the division, explaining to them exactly how they were personally affected, and how the entire transition of our business out of Sunnyvale's manufacturing plant to our other two locations, how it all tied together; how each employee was affected.

According to Anderson, as part of "an overall communication plan" regarding the closing of the Sunnyvale plant and the projected layoffs at both the Melbourne, Florida, and San Luis Obispo, California facilities, the Respondent notified all its employees at these locations on January 9, 1981, about its above plans and about the scheduled layoffs of employees. He stated that the purpose of this was to allay employee concerns about their jobs, "part of our plan was to make sure that all employees understood the entire operating plan . . . at the same time so there would not be further concerns about when the next shoe would drop, something like that."[15] While Anderson did not personally participate in the planning of the layoffs at the Respondent's San Luis Obispo facilities, he acknowledged that, given the fact that the Board election was scheduled for January 16, 1981, and the layoffs of employees had been scheduled for February 27, 1981, the announcement of such layoffs made on January 9, 1981, could have been made after the election had been held, but that the Respondent's "feeling was that all employees in the division deserved to know exactly what was happening throughout the division at the same time, and how it affected them." He concluded, "I think it's based on good employee relations practice."

The evidence shows that the Respondent's "communication plan" was accomplished as follows: a "Memo" dated January 9, 1981, from A. B. Lipscomb, the Respondent's vice president and general manager, explaining the reasons for the proposed consolidation and reduction in work force at its various facilities,[16] was read to all employees by managerial and/or supervisory personnel who were instructed how to accomplish this in a separate "Memo" to them from Lipscomb, dated similarly January 9, 1981, and which, among other things, directed them to hold meetings with the employees under their supervision or report.[17] Another "Memo," also dated January 9, 1981, this time from Lipscomb and the appropriate respective plant manager involved, was to be distributed to the particular employees actually designated and scheduled for layoff at a subsequent time.[18]

Mac Brinton, the Respondent's San Luis Obispo facilities' plant manager, testified[19] that on or about Decem-

[15] Anderson's testimony concerning this on cross-examination was somewhat equivocal. Although he maintained that all the Respondent's employees "knew about the slowness in our business" and "were concerned about their job security in varying degrees," he could not base this on any actual statements made to him or to any other management representative by employees indicating such concern. Anderson was called as a witness for the Respondent.

However, on redirect Anderson testified that he had received feedback indirectly from employees about this since the Respondent had held a number of employee meetings during which management representatives discussed issues, problems, complaints, and "things they would like to see improved" with the employees.

[16] See R. Exh. 5. The "Memo," in substance, recites the economic basis for the recession in the Respondent's business and the accompanying need for consolidation of its operations and reductions in work force through layoffs, and its hopes for a brightening future to "get Vidar back on the growth track." The Respondent also sets forth its plans for assisting employees with "layoff benefits." This notice announces a general layoff and does not specifically indicate the number of employees or, regarding those employees, who would actually be terminated.

[17] See R. Exh. 4. This "Memo," in substance, places responsibility for communicating the Respondent's "plans for consolidation of operations and reduction of work force to those employees who report to you," on managers and supervisors, and lists a format through employee meetings, which they were to follow.

[18] See R. Exh. 6. This "Memo," in substance, explains the reasons for the Respondent's "business slowdown," the need for the layoffs to accomplish a reduction in work force, the date of termination of the employee, as in the case of the San Luis Obispo facility, being February 27, 1981, and an offer of assistance to find new employment for those employees terminated.

ber 14 or 15, 1980, there was a meeting of all the plant managers and the director of operations in San Jose, California, at which the decision was made to consolidate operations and reduce the work force by layoffs because of "business factors" and "current production rate forecasts;" which projected declining sales and the need to reduce the level of production. He stated that since "well, it's company policy that once a decision has been made to try and both make that decision to those affected known as rapidly as possible, and to synchronize a decision so that all the various geographical locations were informed at the same time," it was decided to make the announcement of consolidation and layoffs on January 9, 1981. Brinton continued that there had been approximately four layoffs of employees in the last 5 years and, when he was asked if an announcement was made to employees in advance he responded, "There was a recent one in October and we had [an] announcement ahead of time there. We have, in the early 70's we had a layoff and used that same approach there. It really depended upon the situation and the timing."[20] He added that actually 52 employees, not 19, were laid off at the San Luis Obispo facility on February 27, 1981.

Concerning the timing of announcements of layoff, Gerald Cross testified that the Respondent had scheduled a layoff of employees in the engineering department for late March or early April 1980, and had made a prior general announcement to the employees in February 1980. He stated that subsequently the six individual engineers involved were notified regarding their selection for layoff, "so that the total notice would be minimum of a month, but probably less than two."

a. The Tank Farm Road Annex meeting on January 9, 1981

Diana Keppel, employed by the Respondent from October 30, 1978, until October 30, 1981,[21] testified that on or about January 8 or 9, 1981, about 10 a.m., she attended a meeting of employees and management representatives held in the plant lunchroom.[22] She related that Ray Antunez, the plant production manager, addressed the gathered employees[23] and read a letter to them from A. B. Lipscomb, the Respondent's vice president and general manager, which stated that, "due to economy, that there would be a layoff, and that one of the plants would close, and that the layoff would affect Melbourne, Florida, and San Luis Obispo." Keppel continued that Antunez then advised the employees that, "about 19 employees would be laid off, and that would happen around—I mean on February the 27th, 1981. That it would be done by seniority." She added that Antunez had not mentioned anything about the Union or the organizing campaign during this meeting, and that this was the very first time she had heard about the proposed layoffs.

Cynthia Stevens, employed by the Respondent from March 1979 until February 1981[24] testified that she also had attended the meeting held during the morning of January 9, 1981, in the lunchroom at the Tank Farm Road Annex One, during which "head of production," Ray Antunez, spoke to a group of production employees.[25] She stated that to the best of her recollection, Antunez did not read from a letter when he addressed the employees, but instead told them directly, "That because of inflation, the company needed to lay off 19 people. They weren't doing very well economically." Stevens related that Antunez advised the employees that the layoffs would take effect on February 27, 1981. She continued that Antunez had not mentioned the Union during his speech and that this was the first time that the Respondent had notified its Tank Farm Road Annex employees that there would be layoffs. Stevens added that she was subsequently given 2 weeks' notice prior to February 27, 1981, that she was one of the 19 employees to be laid off, and during this 2-week period she obtained other employment.

Ray Antunez[26] the Respondent's production manager at its San Luis Obispo Tank Farm Road Annex facilities, testified that the meeting with employees held on January 9, 1981, at the Tank Farm Road Annex One building, he "[b]asically . . . read the memo verbatim to the employees," referring to Lipscomb's "Memo" dated January 9, 1981, directed to all employees.[27] This memo states, in part, "Unfortunately, there will also be some layoffs—at Melbourne immediately and at San Luis Obispo in February." Antunez related that he did not make any statements other than what was written in the "Memo" nor did he say anything afterward other than to answer a few questions that were asked by the employees present. Antunez denied that he had said anything about "the union, the union organizing campaign and the upcoming election." However, on cross-examination, Antunez acknowledged that he also may have told the employees that the layoffs would occur on the basis of se-

[20] On cross-examination Brinton acknowledged that the Respondent's policy to announce layoffs as soon as possible in advance thereof was not a "concrete policy." He also testified, on cross-examination, regarding a layoff that occurred in April 1980, that he could not recall when the announcement of such layoff was made; and for a scheduled October 1981 layoff, the announcement was made anytime between a week to a month in advance.

[21] Keppel, called as a witness for the General Counsel, worked as a production employee at the Respondent's Tank Farm Road Annex facility during all the times relevant. She functioned as a member of the Union's "in-plant organizing committee," attending union meetings herself and asking other employees to attend such meetings, distributing union literature to employees, and wearing union buttons.

[22] Keppel testified that she was advised about the meeting by her group leader, Mary Salazar, and that her production supervisor, John Lane, was also present at this meeting.

[23] Keppel stated that there were approximately 12–14 employees present at the meeting, including Cynthia Stevens, Bobby Wright, and Danny Skaggs.

[24] The evidence shows that Stevens worked as a production employee at the Respondent's Tank Farm Road Annex facility during all the times relevant under the same supervisors as Keppel, with Mary Salazar as her group leader and John Lane as her production supervisor. Stevens testified that she was active in the Union's organizational campaign, attending union meetings, distributing union literature, and wearing union buttons. She testified as a witness for the General Counsel.

[25] Stevens stated that there were 10 employees present at this meeting, including Keppel.

niority and that he may have said some other things that were not included in the "Lipscomb memo."[28]

b. The Southwood Drive meeting on January 12, 1981

Vickie Wobermin testified that on the Monday before the election scheduled for January 16, 1981, she attended a meeting in Plant Manager Mac Brinton's office at Southwood Drive, San Luis Obispo, California, at which 15–18 night-shift technicians and/or test specialists were present. She stated that "group leaders" had been apprised of the meeting and that they in turn notified the employees to attend. Wobermin related that present representing management were Brinton, Kent Anderson, Carl Findley, her immediate supervisor, and Bruce Austin, her "group leader." She continued that Brinton, "announced that due to the bad economic conditions, that there would have to be a layoff of 19 people on the assembly line. . . . He said that with the union organizing going on, he didn't want to hide anything. He wanted to be right up front and let them—let everyone know that there would be a layoff," with such layoffs scheduled for "late February" 1981. Wobermin added that this was the first time she had heard about projected layoffs at the San Luis Obispo facilities.[29]

3. The Respondent's employee work reviews

a. The meeting on January 12, 1981

Keppel testified that the Respondent issues employee work performance reviews in March and September of each year, which provide the basis for employee wage increases. Keppel related that on Monday, January 12, 1981, 4 days before the Board-scheduled election, she attended a meeting in the lunchroom at the Tank Farm Road Annex facility at 10 a.m., having been advised about the meeting by her group leader, Mary Salazar. She recounted that present at the meeting were about 12 employees[30] and for management, Gerald Cross and John Lane. Keppel stated that Cross spoke to the employees telling them, "That if the Union won the election—if we won the election—that was, the organizers—that [everything] would be [at] a standstill and there would not be any reviews, because they would be negotiating [would take a long time, possibly 9 months]. . . . That there would be negotiating and that possibly [after that] they would go on strike. But there would be no reviews."

Keppel continued that Cross spoke for about "half an hour" or less and although he mentioned "other things" that she could not clearly remember, since the Respondent had held "so many meetings" in and around this time, she particularly recalled Cross speaking about the employee work reviews because that topic was the "most penetrating" one he had discussed. Keppel added that she particularly remembered this,

> Because if there was not to be any reviews, it would definitely sway the vote of the employees, because that's what everyone waits for, are the reviews. That's when we get our raise in pay.

She stated that the Respondent granted pay raises to its employees on the basis of the work performance reviews.

Although the testimony of Cynthia Stevens concerting this meeting was, in most part, similar to that given by Keppel regarding what was said about the work performance reviews, yet concerning some of the other aspects of the meeting, it differs in some respects. Stevens testified that about 3 or 4 days prior to the Board's election, held on January 16, 1981, she attended a meeting during the morning in the Tank Farm Road Annex facility lunchroom. She related that Mary Salazar, her group leader, had told her about the meeting and that there were about 30 employees who attended it, including Keppel, Lemus, and Carolyn Scaggs. Stevens continued that Gerald Cross and Mac Brinton represented management at the meeting and that Cross told the employees, "That during the negotiations, the job reviews are—everything would be at a standstill, which would mean that job reviews—which would mean that the March reviews would be at a standstill because their hands were tied."[31] She added that the job reviews, given in March and September of each year, covered "production, punctuality, everything," and was the basis for determination of the amount of pay raise an employee would receive, if any.[32]

Stevens testified that this meeting lasted between "half an hour, perhaps an hour" and that other topics were discussed by Cross and Brinton, for example, the "pros and cons of union versus company benefits," and a comparison of employee benefits was shown by means of a slide projector and screen presentation, between "other electrical companies that are union" and the Respondent's. However, on cross-examination, Stevens acknowledged that the slide projection presentation might have occurred at a subsequent employee meeting held by management prior to the Board election.

Gerald Cross testified that the January 12, 1981 meeting was held for the purpose of educating the Respondent's employees "as to what collective bargaining was about."[33] Cross stated that he spoke from "a prepared text,"[34] which he did not depart from at any time during his presentation except for one instance when he explained to the employees the meaning of the term "chal-

[28] Antunez testified that Plant Manager Mac Brinton had instructed him to read the "Memo" to the employees at the meeting.

[29] Although Brinton and Anderson testified, they did not deny any of this testimony.

[30] Keppel named employees Cynthia Stevens, Betty Lemus, Bobby Wright, and Danny Skaggs as having been among the employees who attended the meeting.

[31] Stevens denied that Cross had actually stated at this meeting, "If the Union wins, however, our hands would be more or less tied while the company bargained with the union; that is, we couldn't make any changes unless both sides agreed or until the company had satisfied its bargaining obligation," instead of what she had testified to.

[32] Wobermin testified that the work reviews included quality of work, dependability, adaptability, and cooperation, and that the employees' wage increase depended on this review.

[33] Cross' testimony concerning the time and place of this meeting was similar to that given Keppel and Stevens. According to Cross, he and John Lane were present at the meeting for management and that "about 30" employees were in attendance.

lenged ballot," which appears therein. Cross related that what he stated to the employees at the meeting was that

> If the Company wins [the election], it will be free to make whatever changes it deems appropriate. The election rules prohibit us from making any specific promises concerning changes. I really can't say anything more than that at this time.
> If the Union wins, however, our hands would be more or less tied while the Company bargained with the Union—that is, we couldn't make any changes unless both sides agreed or until the Company had satisfied its bargaining obligation.

Cross denied that he had discussed or mentioned the March work reviews, or said that wages or benefits would "be frozen" or "be at a standstill." Cross added that visual aids were used in his presentation in the nature of slide projections "in conjuction with the prepared text," and that he did not "speak extemporaneously."

John Lane, the Respondent's production supervisor at its Tank Farm Road Annex facility, testified that he had attended the January 12, 1981 meeting at which Cross addressed approximately 30 to 37 employees. He stated that this was an informational meeting to inform employees about "a bargaining possibility with the Union." Lane recounted that Cross spoke to the employees from a prepared text[35] and "[did] not recall any extemporaneous speaking whatsoever." He added that Cross never told the employees that the March reviews would be at a "standstill, cancelled or frozen," nor did Cross mention the March reviews at all during his presentation.[36]

b. Posted notices concerning work reviews

Diana Keppel testified that sometime during the month preceding the election held on January 16, 1981, she observed a "bulletin" posted on the bulletin board at the Tank Farm Road Annex location[37] which stated, "That if we won the election, that there wouldn't be no reviews, because the company would be negotiating with the union." She stated that this "bulletin" had a TRW Vidar letterhead and was posted on the bulletin board where management usually places its notice to employees. Keppel related that the "bulletin" was signed by Gerald Cross or Mac Brinton.[38]

Vickie Wobermin testified that there are two bulletin boards located at the Southwood Drive facility on which the Respondent posted "notices of company policies and any memos . . . pictures of our picnics and Halloween costume parties, and things like that." She related that during the Union's organizational campaign, about a month or 3 weeks before the election, or even before that, the Respondent inaugurated a procedure entitled "Question of the Day," which was in the form of a typed, mimeographed, or xeroxed "plain paper" notice, which contained a question, and then an answer to such question. Wobermin continued that about 3 weeks before the election she observed a "Question of the Day" posted on the bulletin board that stated

> [T]he question asked what would happen to our reviews if the union negotiations were still going on. And the answer said that everything would be frozen—that there would be no reviews, because everything had to stay the same way during the negotiations.[39]

Gerald Cross testified that, "during the course of the campaign which preceded the union election on January 16,"[40] he caused to be posted on the company bulletin boards, "a number of bulletins" which collectively were called "Questions of the day.' Cross stated that the source of these "Questions of the Day" was Richard R. Pace, the Respondent's legal counsel at the trial, denying that he personally had authored them. He related that not all the "Questions of the Day" given to him by Pace were posted, but that of those that were, Respondent's Exhibits 3(a) through 3(m) composed all of those that were posted on the bulletin boards. Cross denied that he had ever posted a "Question of the Day" that dealt with the March work reviews or that stated "if the Union won the election, that the reviews would be at a standstill," frozen, postponed, or canceled.

Cross testified that during winter 1980, he did author and publish "possibly over 20" memos, some of which he could not recall regarding content, but that he did clearly remember that none of these "dealt with reviews" except for one dated December 5, 1980, directed to "all supervisors." This memo, according to Cross, in substance instructed the supervisors "to sit down with their employees and review goals . . . and what improvements they noted should be made between September of 1980 and March of 1981," which would be of assistance to the supervisors "when they did their reviews in March."[41] Cross denied authoring or posting any memo dealing with the March reviews being frozen, postponed, or canceled for any reason.

Mac Brinton also denied having authorized, published, or posted a "Question of the Day," bulletin or memorandum dealing with the freezing, postponing, or canceling

[35] Lane, on direct examination, identified R. Exh. 2 as the prepared text used by Cross to give his speech, after Lane had looked at the exhibit, "Without going through the whole thing." On cross-examination, however, he admitted that he had not had a copy of the prepared text at the meeting when Cross spoke to the employees. Lane stated that he had looked at the "top sheet" of the text after the meeting, and from the statements made by Cross to the employees, he could identify this exhibit as the prepared text.

[36] Lane testified that he personally did not address the employees at this meeting, which lasted "somewhere around an hour."

[37] Keppel testified that there is only one bulletin board at this facility, used by both management and employees to post notices, and that the Respondent usually posts material related to work rules and regulations, "job-related" notices, and "anything pertaining to our job from management."

[38] Keppel denied that the "bulletin" was "in the form of something called a Question of the Day," more about which appears subsequently.

[39] On cross-examination, Wobermin was shown R. Exhs. 3(j) and 3(f), whereupon she stated that neither of these exhibits were the "Question of the Day" that she referred to regarding the March work reviews.

[40] The Respondent, in its brief, states, "During the month of January 1981, the Respondent conducted a vigorous campaign in opposition to the Union's organizing efforts."

of the March work reviews. He stated that the "Questions of the Day" orginated out of the personnel department. Although Brinton testified that he had authored "a lot" of company memorandums during the winter of 1980, he denied that any of these concerned employee work reviews.

c. Acts of interference, restraint, and coercion

Section 8(a)(1) of the Act prohibits an employer from interfering with, restraining, or coercing its employees in the exercise of their rights guaranteed in Section 7 of the Act.

4. The Respondent's refusal to allow employees to use its cafeteria for a union-related meeting

The complaint alleges that in violation of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act, the Respondent discriminatorily refused to allow employees the use of the company cafeteria during nonworking hours for the purpose of conducting a meeting to discuss the Union. The Respondent denies this allegation.

a. Analysis and conclusions

In its "statement of position" dated February 9, 1981, the Respondent's counsel asserts that the Respondent became aware of the intent of its "technical employees" to hold a meeting in the company cafeteria at 4 p.m. by obtaining a copy of the notice announcing such meeting. The "statement of position" continues

> No permission had been requested by the authors either to circulate the notice or to hold the meeting.
> The Company has a broad, general no-access policy which prohibits employees from entering the plant prior to the beginning of their scheduled shift, or from remaining on the premises after their workday has been completed.
> Pursuant to this rule, Cross informed the technicians' group that it could not conduct its meeting on company premises after regular working hours.[42]

The Respondent additionally asserts that its "broad, general no-access policy," is encompassed in a memo dated January 18, 1980, from its personnel manager, Gerald Cross, to all its employees which states, in pertinent part, "No employees will be allowed access to the plant for personal reasons during off hours."[43]

From all of the foregoing, it is clear that the issue to be resolved regarding the above is the validity of the Respondent's "no-access policy" rule, and pursuant thereto, the lawfulness of its refusal to permit its employees the use of the company cafeteria for a union-related meeting during nonworking hours.

In GTE Lenkurt, Inc., 204 NLRB 921 (1973), the Board stated

> Under well-settled principles applicable to employees activities . . . an employer may not, absent special circumstances, prohibit employees lawfully on the premises from engaging in union solicitation on their own time. However, it is also well settled that nonemployees are not entitled to enter an employer's premises to engage in union activity there.[6] Accordingly, to dispose of the issue here, we must determine which of these principles applies to an off-duty employee, i.e., whether, notwithstanding an employer rule to the contrary, he has a right to enter or remain on an employer's premises if he wishes to do so for this purpose.
> In our view, he does not, for his status is more nearly analogous to that of a nonemployee, and he is subject to the principles applicable to nonemployees. This is so because the interests to be balanced in determining the validity of such a rule are very different as between an employee on the premises in connection with his work and an off-duty employee who seeks to enter. The former involves a balancing of statutory rights of self-organization against the employer's interests in production, safety, or discipline, and in this situation the statutory rights prevail (unless it can be shown that interference with those rights is essential) because an employer may not close off this normal channel of communication among the workers without proper justification.[7] The latter situation, however, requires a balancing of the employees' Section 7 rights against the employer's private property rights.[8]
> It seems apparent that for purposes not protected by this Act off-duty employees and nonemployees would be invitees to the same extent, and one is no more entitled than the other to admission to the premises. We are unable to conclude that a different rule is required where union organization is involved, and absent a showing of inability to reach the employees otherwise, we see no justification for holding that an employer's right to control ingress to his property must give way for that purpose.
> In view of the above, we find that the balance between the competing interests in this situation is properly struck by holding that, where an employer's no-access rule is nondiscriminatory, i.e., it denies off-duty employees access to the premises for any purpose and is not disparately applied against union activities, it is presumptively valid absent a showing that no adequate alternative means of communication are available.[9] As there is no such showing here, and no evidence that rule D was discriminatorily enforced, we conclude that Respond-

[42] See G.C. Exh. 3 at 6. Although there is uncontroverted testimony by Wobermin in the record that the Respondent had given as one of its reasons for denying the employees the use of the cafeteria, that the employees had failed to obtain prior management consent for the meeting, it appears from the Respondent's brief that it does not now maintain that this was a significant consideration in its refusal of such permission. As stated by the Respondent in its brief,

> Evidence showed that in most instances, permission to use the plant after hours was requested in advance. No such permission was sought by the group seeking to discuss union matters. However, for the purposes of this proceeding, it is stipulated that had such permission been requested, it would have been denied.

[43] See. G.C. Exh. 4. The written rule contains no requirement that prior permission be obtained from management by employees seeking any dispensation therefrom.

However, to the extent McDonnell Douglas Corporation, supra, remanded 472 F.2d 539 (C.A. 8), and Diamond Shamrock Co., 181 NLRB 261, enforcement denied 443 F.2d 52 (C.A. 3), are inconsistent with the holding herein, they are hereby overruled.[44]

Subsequently, however, the Board narrowed the scope of GTE Lenkurt, supra,[45] in Tri-County Medical Center, 222 NLRB 1089 (1976), wherein it stated

> The holding of GTE Lenkurt must be narrowly construed to prevent undue interference with the rights of employees under Section 7 of the Act freely to communicate their interests in union activity to those who work on different shifts. We conclude, in order to effectuate the policies of the Act, that such a rule is valid only if it (1) limits access solely with respect to the interior of the plant and other working areas; (2) is cle[a]rly disseminated to all employees; and (3) applies to off-duty employees seeking access to the plant for any purpose and not just to those employees engaging in union activity. Finally, except where justified by business reasons, a rule which denies off-duty employees entry to parking lots, gates, and other outside nonworking areas will be found invalid.[46]

The Respondent alleges in its brief,

> It is well-settled under the authorities cited above that an employer's published, non-discriminatory, no-acess rule is presumptively valid, absent a showing by the union that it has no adequate alternative means of communication available to it.[47] It is also clear from these same authorities that such a rule is not violatie of the Act if it meets the following three criteria: (1) It limits access solely with respect to the interior of the plant and other working areas; (2) it is clearly disseminated to all employees; and (3) it applies to off-duty employees seeking access to the plant for any purpose, and not just to those employees engaging in union activity.[48] Uncontradicted evidence introduced at the hearing on this matter clearly established that each of these criteria was satisfied in the instant case.

I do not agree with the Respondent's assessment of the evidence.[49]

The doctrine enunciated by the Board in GTE Lenkurt requires that an employer's no-access rule deny all off-duty employees access to its premises for any purpose and not be disparately applied against employees engaged in union activities in order that such rule be presumptively valid absent a showing that no alternative means of communication are available.[50] Moreover, in narrowing the construction of its holding in GTE Lenkurt, the Board in Tri-County Medical Center now required for the validity of a no-access rule that the rule limit access solely with respect to the interior of the plant and other working areas, be clearly disseminated to all employees, and apply to off-duty employees seeking access to the plant for any purpose and not just to those employees engaging in union activity.[51]

The evidence clearly shows that although the Respondent's no-access rule purports to deny all off-duty employees access to "the plant for personal reasons" yet the Respondent admittedly allows some off-duty employees the use of the company cafeteria for meeting purposes as "exceptions in its application of the rule." The Respondent permits its company bowling, basketball, and racquetball club teams to hold meetings in the company cafeteria. Additionally, it has allowed a "Weight Watchers" group to also use this facility for meeting purposes, as well as individual employees to use its facilities off hours. The record also discloses that the Respondent has also denied employee requests on behalf of groups seeking access to, and the use of, the plant premises, i.e., permission was denied to hold a math class in the facility under the aegis of Questa College, and the Respondent refused authorization to a local United Fund group to hold a meeting on its premises.

[44] In GTE Lenkurt, the Board considered an employee work rule that, in substance, prohibited off-duty employees from entering or remaining on the employer's premises for any purpose. The no-access rule in GTE Lenkurt, supra, read, "An employee is not to enter the plant or remain on the premises unless he is on duty or scheduled for work."

[45] In substance, the decision in GTE Lenkurt, supra, held that when an employer's no-access rule denies all off-duty employees access to the premises for any purpose and is not discriminatorily applied only against employees engaged in union activities, the rule is presumptively valid absent a showing by the Union that no adequate alternative means of communication is available to it. Tri-County Medical Center, supra.

[49] I do agree with Respondent, however, that its no-access rule, which provides that, "No employee will be allowed access to the plant for personal reasons during off hours," was disseminated to all employees. The Respondent's no-access policy was "reduced to writing" as a rule and posted on the company bulletin board on or about January 18, 1980, several months prior to the advent of the Union's organizational campaign. Howard Johnson Co., 242 NLRB 386 (1979). Moreover, none of the parties asserts that such a posting of the rule was inadequate notice to the Respondent's employees and not a "clear dissemination" thereof. Although Wobermin testified that she was unaware of any company rule requiring that employees obtain prior authorization from the Respondent to hold meetings on company premises, even if this was construed as her having no knowledge of the non-access rule itself, this would not change my above finding. (See Wometco Coca-Cola Bottling Co., 255 NLRB 431, 444 fn. 58 (1981).) Furthermore, I agree with the Respondent that this rule is applicable only to off-duty employees as stated.

[50] The General Counsel does not assert that the Respondent's no-access rule is invalid and in violation of Sec. 8(a)(1) of the Act because there was no alternative means of communication available.

[51] Also see Continental Bus Systems, supra.

The General Counsel asserts that "By refusing to allow the test technicians and test specialists group the use of the company cafeteria in order to discuss the Union, while at the same time, allowing other groups the use of the cafeteria for non-work related activities during non-work hours, Respondent discriminatorily enforced its no-access rule in violation of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act." I agree.

As set forth, the Board in Tri-County Medical Center found that the holding of GTE Lenkurt must be narrowly construed "to prevent undue interference with the rights of employees under Section 7 of the Act freely to communicate their interest in union activity to those who work on different shifts."[52] The Board then required, as one of the criteria for establishing the validity of a no-access rule, that it be applicable, "to off-duty employees seeking access to the plant for any purpose and not just to those employees engaging in union activity." This same language was again reiterated by the Board in Continental Bus Systems, supra.

In E. I. du Pont & Co., 263 NLRB 159, 174 (1982), during the week of a Board election the company promulgated and enforced a rule denying vacationing employees access to its plant except for the purpose of voting. Just prior to the commencement of their vacation, two employees had requested permission to enter the plant while they were on vacation, but were denied such permission on the ground that it was the week of the election. One of the employees testified unconditionally that he was unaware of any rule restricting access to the plant by vacationing employees. Additionally, the evidence showed that in the past, retired employees had been allowed in the plant for social visits in the cafeteria and elsewhere with other employees. The Board affirmed without comment the holding of the administrative law judge that

> It is obvious that denial of permission for Merriman and Sharp to enter the plant during their vacation was a departure from the past practice and was imposed for the purpose of limiting employee union activities prior to the Board election. I find this was an unwarranted limitation of their Section 7 rights and a violation of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act. Tri-County Medical Center, Inc., 222 NLRB 1089 (1976); GTE Lenkurt, Incorporated, 204 NLRB 921 (1973).

In Harrison Steel Castings Co., 262 NLRB 450, 456 (1982), the employer had a no-access policy barring off-duty employees from its plant premises unless the employee could show that he or she had business in the plant. Although the employer "freely conceded" that the rule was relaxed and leniently applied regarding those seeking entry for legitimate reasons, the evidence also showed that employees gained access during their off-duty hours for personal convenience unrelated to any busines interest of the employer. The Board affirmed the ruling of the administrative law judge who, citing Tri-County Medical Center, supra, and GTE Lenkurt, supra, found therein.

> Here, it does not appear that the scope of the rule was ever formally communicated to employees. And the record amply discloses that the rule did not apply to those seeking access for all purposes, with exceptions to the ban being undefined and freely conferred. . . . Accordingly, the nonaccess policy involved here did not meet the standards of legitimacy set forth in Tri-County Medical Center, supra.

Again, in A. W. Schlesinger Geriatric Center, 263 NLRB 1337, 1341 (1982), the employer had issued a memorandum to its employees stating, in pertinent part, that "Off duty employees may not attempt to organize the SEIU on . . . Center property . . . inside in non-work areas because the Personnel Policies states, 'Employees should not loiter around the buildings or grounds when not on duty or receive visitors while they are on duty.'" The Employer's director had organized an employee "Committee" to disseminate "more information about the Union prior to the election." The committee then held meetings for employees in Respondent's chapel. The Board affirmed the findings of the administrative law judge therein that

> With regard to inside areas, a no-access rule must be clearly disseminated to all employees and apply to off-duty employees seeking access for any purpose. Tri-County Medical Center, Inc. [supra]; Central Solano County Hospital Foundation, Inc., d/b/a Intercommunity Hospital, 255 NLRB 468 (1981). Any ambiguity is to be construed against the party which promulgates the rule. Eastern Maine Medical Center [253 NLRB 224 (1980)]; Continental Bus System, Inc., [supra]. Most importantly, the rule was discriminatorily applied to permit off-duty employees to engage in activities on behalf of the committee or to attend committee meetings while prohibiting off-duty employees from engaging in union activities.[53] Accordingly, I find that Respondent vio-

[52] This is consistent with the Board's finding in GTE Lenkurt that off-duty employees entering or remaining on an employer's premises are subject to principles that "requires a balancing of the employees' Section 7 rights against the employer's private property rights."

[53] The Respondent asserts in its brief,

> First, the abstract theory that an employer necessarily forfeits the right to enforce otherwise valid rules concerning the use of its property simply by failing to follow its own rules was squarely rejected by the U.S. Supreme Court in N.L.R.B. v. United Steelworkers, [357 U.S. 357 (1958)] . . . . In the instant case, it is clear that the union is asking the Board to do what the Supreme Court refused to do in United Steelworkers—invalidate an otherwise valid rule simply because the employer did not accord to the union the same privileges which it accorded to itself.

I do not agree. What the Supreme Court actually held in the United Steelworkers case as stated therein was that,

> Employer rules prohibiting organizational solicitation are not in and of themselves violative of the Act, for they may duly serve production, order and discipline. See Republic Aviation Corp. v Labor Board, 324 U.S. 793; Labor Board v. Babcock & Wilcox Co., 351 U.S. 105. In neither of the cases before us did the party attacking the enforcement of the no-solicitation rule contest its validity. Nor is the claim made that an employer may not, under proper circumstances, engage in non-coercive anti-union solicitation indeed his right to do lated Section 8(a)(1) by promulgating and maintaining an overly broad rule denying access to off-duty employees and by discriminatorily applying such a rule to interfere with activities on behalf of the Union.[54]

so is protected by the so-called 'employer free speech' provision of Section 8(c) of the Act. The very narrow and almost abstract question here derives from the claim that, when an employer himself engages in anti-union solicitation that if engaged in by employees would constitue a violation of the rule--particularly when his solicitation is coercive or accompanied by other unfair labor practices--his enforcement of an otherwise valid no-solicitation rule against the employees is itself an unfair labor practice. We are asked to rule that the coincidence of these circumstances necessarily violates the Act, regardless of the way in which the particular controversy arose or whether the employers conduct to any considerable degree created an imbalance in the opportunities for organizational communication. For us to lay down such a rule of law would show indifference to the responsibilities imposed by the Act primarily on the Board to appraise carefully the interests of both sides of any labor-management controversy in the diverse circumstances of particular cases and in light of the Board's special understanding of these industrial situations.

There was no indication in the record . . . that the employees, or the union on their behalf, requested the employer, himself engaging in anti-union solicitation, to make an exception to the rule for pro-union solicitation.

No attempt was made . . . to make a showing that the no-solicitation rules truly diminished the ability of the labor organizations involved to carry their message to the employers.

We do not at all imply that the enforcement of a valid no-solicitation rule by an employer who is at the same time engaging in anti-union solicitation may not constitute an unfair labor practice. All we hold is that there must be some basis in the actualities of industrial relations, for such a finding. [Emphasis added.]

This is exactly what the Board has done in the various cases cited herein. Also see AMF, Inc., 228 NLRB 1406, 1416 (1977); Wometco Coca-Cola Bottling Co., supra; G. H. Bass & Co., 258 NLRB 140, 144 (1981); St. Francis Hospital, 263 NLRB 834 (1982). Moreover, no-access rules are subject to somewhat different principles than are applicable to no-solicitation, no-distribution rules. See The Mandarin, 221 NLRB 264 (1975); Barney's Club, Inc., 227 NLRB 414 (1976); Harvey's Resort Hotel, 236 NLRB 1670 (1978).

[54] Also see Intercommunity Hospital, 255 NLRB 468 (1981), in which the Board found that the Employer's no-access rule did not meet "the Tri-County standard" because it did not prohibit access for all purposes and because "In addition, employees testified that they were permitted to remain in the hospital after work while waiting for rides or car-pools." The employer's rule stated, "When you are off duty, visits to the hospital should be limited to friends or relatives who are patients or on official business with the hospital." St. Vincent Hospital, 244 NLRB 331 (1979), in which the Board affirmed an administrative law judge's ruling that an employer's no-access rule stating, "Employees may not enter on hospital premises or remain thereon except as required by the work relationship unless they are themselves patients of the hospital or visiting a patient of the hospital," did not meet the Tri-County Medical Center criteria since, among other reasons, the rule was not strictly enforced. The ALJ found that "employees frequent the cafeteria before and after their shifts, off-duty employees return to the hospital for employee parties, to visit patients, to visit on-duty employees, and to attend educational courses that apparently are not required as a condition of retaining employment. Some employees habitually enter the premises a half hour or so before their shift commences and remain for a period of time after the shift ends. Respondent's administrator admits that the rule would be difficult to enforce and it is clear that no serious effort was made to enforce it except during the period of the election campaign." Baptist Memorial Hospital, 229 NLRB 45 (1977), in which the Board affirmed the holding of an administrative law judge that the Employer's no-access rule was invalid because, among other reasons, "employees [were] not restricted for all purposes. The hospital permits, for example, employees to visit patients or to pick up their paychecks during their nonduty hours, citing Tri-County Medical Center.

In the instant case, the Respondent's no-access rule does not meet all the criteria established by the Board in Tri-County Medical Center, supra, to be held valid. The rule was not strictly enforced in its application to all off-duty employees seeking access to the plant for any purpose,[55] with exceptions to the ban being undefined and inconsistently applied.[56] The Respondent permitted off-duty employee groups access to the company cafeteria for meeting purposes, i.e., the bowling, basketball, and racquetball teams, and a "Weight Watchers" group, and denied the use thereof to a college-sponsored mathematics class and a "local United Fund" group. The Respondent failed to identify what criteria it used, if any, to determine whether off-duty employees would be granted or denied access to the plant. Moreover, while the evidence shows that the Respondent initially gave its employees' reasons to support the denial of the use of the company cafeteria for a union-related meeting, these reasons were apparently down-played or withdrawn as justification therefor in its brief.[57] In effect, because no specific reason for its action has been advanced other than the no-access rule itself, any ambiguity therewith must be construed against the Respondent, the party that promulgated such rule.[58]

I further find that the Respondent's no-access rule is invalid as being overbroad. In order for such a rule to be valid it must "limit access solely with respect to the interior of the plant and other working areas."[59] In Hudson Oxygen Therapy Sales Co., 264 NLRB 61, 72 (1982), the Board affirmed the finding of an administrative law judge that the following no-access rule was overbroad and therefore invalid:

> No one except employees during their scheduled working hours is permitted to enter the Plant unless permission has been granted by the appropriate supervisor or higher management. It should be noted that this regulation forbids you to enter the plant

[56] Harrison Steel Castings Co., supra.

[57] According to Wobermin's uncontradicted testimony, the reasons given by the Respondent for denying permission to the off-duty employees to hold the meeting in the company cafeteria were, that the employees had failed to obtain prior authorization to use the company cafeteria for such a meeting, and that if the Respondent permitted these employees such use of the cafeteria it would "have to allow other people to have meetings in the cafeteria." Since the evidence shows that these reasons have no validity in fact because the Respondent's no-access rule, as written, did not require permission for any exceptions to its application nor make any exceptions thereto at all; all employees were not made aware of any such requirement; and the Respondent already had allowed "other people," employee groups and, in the case of the "Weight Watcher's group," perhaps nonemployees, access and use of its company cafeteria, there arises a strong inference under the circumstances in this case that the reasons offered were pretextual and that the actual reason for denying these off-duty employees the use of the company cafeteria was the purpose of such meeting, it being a union-related meeting.

during your off-hours unless you have been called in to perform a job asignment.

The administrative law judge therein stated,

> Since the rule here denies off-duty employees access to "any of its [the plant's] facilities, including the plant lunch room" it is invalid. No business reasons are advanced to justify no-access to . . . the lunchrooms and other nonworking areas.[34]

The above is based on one of the criteria established by the Board in Tri-County Medical Center, supra.

Again, the Board in St. Vincent Hospital, supra, affirmed the holding of an administrative law judge that an employee no-access rule was invalid as not meeting the Tri-County Medical Center criteria "inasmuch as it does not clearly limit the restriction to the interior of the building." The no-access rule in St. Vincent Hospital read, > Employees may not enter on hospital premises or remain thereon except as required by the work relationship unless they are themselves patients of the hospital or visiting a patient of the hospital.

The administrative law judge stated therein,

> There is no evidence that Respondent has ever sought to widely disseminate to its employees its interpretation of the term . . . "premises" to mean only the interior of the building

Moreover, in Panavision, Inc., 264 NLRB 1284, 1286 (1982), the Board adopted a hearing officer's findings which stated,

> Since the Board's decision in Tri-County Medical Center, Inc., 222 NLRB 1089, the Board has held that, except where justified by business reasons, a rule which denies off-duty employees entry to parking lots, gates and other outside non-working areas will be found invalid. The Board has even refined Tri-County to prohibit denial of access to off-duty employees for union organizational activities in certain non-work areas inside the plant (e.g., the cafeteria). Maywood, Inc., 251 NLRB 979; Central Solano County Hospital Foundation, Inc., 255 NLRB 468.

In the instant case the Respondent's no-access rule, that "[n]o employee will be allowed access to the plant for personal reasons during off hours," squarely falls within the purview of the above recited cases. The Respondent's refusal to allow off-duty employees the use of its company cafeteria for a meeting renders invalid as overbroad the use of the term "plant" in its rule without more or some interpretation of this term to employees in a lawful context.[60]

[60] In Woodview Rehabilitation Center, 265 NLRB 838 (1982), the Board affirmed the finding of an administrative law judge that an employer's no-access rule, "Employees are not permitted access to the interior of the Home or outside work areas during off-duty hours, unless they have received prior authorization from a Department Head or the Administrator," was "facially valid." The administrative judge stated,

> The new no-access rule, prohibiting employee access to both the interior of the home and outside work areas during off-duty hours without prior employer authorization, contrary to General Counsel, is not inconsistent with Tri-County Medical Center, Inc., 222 NLRB 1089 (1976), since this rule (a) deals only with work areas; (b) was widely disseminated; and (c) applies generally and not merely to employees engaged in union activity. Moreover, there is no suggestion that Respondent was including parking lots and similar nonwork areas within the rule.

In the instant case, however, there was actual indication that the Respondent included the company cafeteria, a nonwork area, as encompassed within the definition of the term "plant" as used in its no-access rule.

After carefully considering the Respondent's contentions in its brief regarding this issue, which I reject as being contrary and inconsistent with Board and court law, although these contentions have a certain logic and under the circumstances present in this case, I find that the Respondent maintained and discriminately enforced an invalid no-access rule when it refused to allow employees the use of the company cafeteria during nonworking hours for the purpose of conducting a meeting to discuss the Union, with the Respondent thereby violating Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.

5. The Respondent's layoff announcements as implied threats of layoff

The complaint alleges that on or about January 9 and 12, 1981, the Respondent impliedly threatened to lay off certain employees if the Union won the election, in violation of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act. The Respondent denies these allegations.

a. Analysis and conclusions

To reiterate briefly, the evidence shows that the Respondent, about mid-December 1980, decided to close its Borregas Avenue facility in Sunnyvale, California, and to lay off employees at its Melbourne, Florida, and San Luis Obispo, California plants because of depressed economic conditions in the telecommunications equipment industry resulting in lower sales and a significant loss of earnings for the Respondent. The Borregas Avenue facility employees were to be time-phased out over a period commencing in January 1981, with completion at the end of June 1981, when this facility would be closed down. The reductions in force at the Respondent's Melbourne, Florida facility was scheduled for January 16, 1981, and at its San Luis Obispo, California facility on February 27, 1981, with the layoff of employees to take place on those respective dates.

On January 9, 1981, the Respondent held a meeting with its employees at its Tank Farm Road Annex facility in San Luis Obispo, during which the plant production manager, Roy Antunez, advised the employees present that there would be layoffs of employees in February 1981. Diana Keppel and Cynthia Stevens, who had been employees at the time and present at this meeting testified that this was the first time they had heard about proposed layoffs of employees at the San Luis Obispo facilities. They also testified uncontradictedly that no mention was made at this meeting about the Union or the Union's organizational campaign. This meeting occurred 1 week before the Board's scheduled representation election to be held on January 16, 1981.

Additionally, on January 12, 1981, the Respondent held a meeting with its employees at its Southwood Drive facility in San Luis Obispo where Plant Manager Mac Brinton, announced the layoff of 19 assembly line employees scheduled for "late February, 1981." Vickie Wobermin testified that Brinton also stated, "that with the union organizing going on, he didn't want to hide anything. He wanted to be right up front and let them—let everyone know that there would be a layoff." Wobermin also recounted that this was the first time that she had heard about proposed layoffs at the San Luis Obispo facilities.[61] This meeting occurred just 4 days prior to the election.

The General Counsel contends that "the timing of Respondent's layoff announcements is inherently suspect and that the announcements themselves must be interpreted as implied threats intended to coerce employees in violation of their Section 7 rights. It is submitted, therefore, that Respondent's announcements of layoffs during the critical pre-election period constituted implied threats of loss of employment in violation of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act." Although the issue is a close one, under the circumstances of this case I agree with the General Counsel.

In NLRB v. Gissel Packing Co., 395 U.S. 575, 616-617 (1969), the Supreme Court stated,

> At the outset we note that the question raised here most often arises in the context of a nascent union organizational drive, where employers must be careful in waging their antiunion campaign. Regarding conduct generally, the above-noted gradations of unfair labor practices, with their varying consequences, create certain hazards for employers when they seek to estimate or resist unionization efforts. But so long as the differences involve conduct easily avoided, such as discharge, surveillance, and coercive interrogation, we do not think that employers can complain that the distinctions are unreasonably difficult to follow. Where an employer's antiunion efforts consist of speech alone, however, the difficulties raised are not so easily resolved. But we do note that an employer's free speech right to communicate his views to his employees is firmly established and cannot be infringed by a union or the Board. Thus, [Section 8(c) of the Act] merely implements the First Amendment by requiring that the expression of "any views, argument, or opinion" shall be "evidence of an unfair labor practice," so long as such expression contains "no threat of reprisal or force or promise of benefit" in violation of Section 8(a)(1). Section 8(a)(1), in turn, prohibits interference, restraint or coercion of employees in the exercise of their right to self-organization.
> Any assessment of the precise scope of employer expression, of course, must be made in the context of its labor relations setting. Thus, an employer's rights cannot outweigh the equal rights of the employees to associate freely, as those rights are embodied in Section 7 and protected by Section 8(a)(1) and the proviso to Section 8(c). And any balancing of those rights must take into account the economic dependence of the employees on their employers, and the necessary tendency of the former, because of that relationship, to pick up intended implications of the latter that might be more readily dismissed by a more disinterested ear.

The Supreme Court's logic, as set forth above, is equally applicable to the issue presented and now under consideration. An employer has a right to run its business as it sees fit subject generally of course to various applicable laws and, particularly, as affects this case, to its employees' Section 7 rights under the Act. In balancing these respective rights the Supreme Court's direction that consideration must be given to the employees' economic dependence on their employers and the effect of this relationship, comes into play and becomes an important factor. Initially, while there is no allegation that the Respondent's decisions concerning plant closure and employee layoffs was violative of the Act,[62] still it should be remembered that this decision was made in December 1980, subsequent to the advent of the Union's organizational campaign and the Board's hearing in the representation case involving the Respondent and the Union. Moreover, the economic conditions that were the basis for the Respondent's decision to close one of its plants and lay off employees at its other facilities, were in existence for some time prior thereto, and the announcements were made to employees on January 9 and 12, 1981, after the date of the Board election had been announced and within 1 week of the holding of such election on January 16, 1981.

Additionally, the actual implementation of the Respondent's decision concerning plant closure and employee layoffs was scheduled for different dates at different facilities, giving the Respondent, in all actuality, some flexibility in the timing of any announcement. The Borregas Avenue facility was scheduled for "phase-out" between January and June 1981, and employee layoffs at the Melbourne, Florida, and San Luis Obispo, California facilities were set for January 16 and February 27, 1981, respectively.

The Respondent asserts that, "the announcements, to avoid rampant rumors, at other locations, had to be made prior to layoffs at the Melbourne plant which were scheduled to begin on January 16, 1981." However, it would appear from the evidence that the Respondent had tolerated similar "rampant rumors" previously regarding the possibility of the closing of the Borregas

[61] Although the Respondent in its brief declares that, "Furthermore, both Mac Brinton and Ray Antunez stated that during the respective announcements, the union and upcoming election were never mentioned," only Antunez so testified. Wobermin's testimony thus remains unrebutted and is credited by this and for other considerations set forth.

[62] The uncontradicted evidence shows that the Respondent had a "substantial business justification" therefore.

Avenue plant and for a "considerable amount of time,"[63] without taking any immediate action to dispel, explain, or "avoid" such rumors among its employees. It further occurs to me, concerning the layoffs at the Melbourne, Florida, and San Luis Obispo, California facilities, that these plants are separated by the width of the North American Continent being located on the east and west coast of the United States, respectively. Be that as it may, Kent Anderson, the Respondent's director of human resources,[64] candidly admitted in his testimony that given the fact of the Board's election scheduled for January 16, 1981, and that employee layoffs at the San Luis Obispo facilities were not to become effective until February 27, 1981, the Respondent could just as well have announced the layoffs after the election than before, as it did, although he added that it was "better employee relations practice" to have made the announcement when the Respondent did and to all its employees at the same time.

Furthermore, the credited testimony of Vickie Wobermin shows that at the January 12, 1981 meeting with employees at its Southwood Drive facility in San Luis Obispo, the Respondent's plant manager, Mac Brinton, along with announcing the Respondent's decision to lay off production employees at its San Luis Obispo facilities, also remarked that, "with the Union organizing going on, he didn't want to hide anything. He wanted to be right up front and let them—let everyone know that there would be a layoff." Again applicable as analogous is the Supreme Court's statement in the Gissel case that, "[T]he Board has often found that employees who are particularly sensitive to rumors of plant closings, take such hints as coercive threats rather than honest forecasts." Although I am cognizant of the fact that the layoffs were of assembly employees and did not involve the technical employees who were present at this meeting, yet the election was only 4 days away at the time of this announcement and involved plant closure and layoffs at two other facilities so that the employees at the meeting could well have taken such announcement as possibly applicable to them in the future and as "coercive threats rather than honest forecasts," analogously.[65]

Finally, although there is evidence in the record that it was the Respondent's policy to notify employees affected by a company decision as soon as possible, and that employee layoffs in the past were announced in advance, yet the record also shows that the actual timing of such advance announcements varied and in those prior instances appeared not to have been required to be considered in the context of a "labor relations setting," as here.

In the total context of this record, I find and conclude that the timing of the announcement in its relation to the January 16, 1981 election was motivated by antiunion hostilities also manifested elsewhere in the Respondent's conduct and, therefore, the Respondent's announcements of layoffs during the critical preelection period constituted implied threats of loss of employment in violation of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.[66]

6. Alleged threats to withhold work reviews

The complaint alleges that the Respondent threatened its employees orally and by posted notice to withhold work reviews and keep March reviews at a standstill if the Union won the election, all in violation of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act. The Respondent denies these allegations.

a. Analysis and conclusions

Diana Keppel testified that sometime in December 1980, she observed a "bulletin" posted on the bulletin board at the Respondent's Tank Farm Road Annex facility, which stated that employee work reviews would not be given if the Union won the election, "because the company would be negotiating with the Union." Keppel attributed the notice to either Mac Brinton or Gerald Cross and indicated that it had a "TRW Vidar" letterhead. Vickie Wobermin testified that "about three weeks" before the election she saw a "Question of the Day" posted on a bulletin board at the Respondent's Southwood Drive facility that asked the question, in substance, what would happen to employee work reviews during the Union negotiations, and answered that, "everything would be frozen—that there would be no reviews, because everything had to stay the same way during the negotiations." Brinton and Cross denied either authorizing, publishing, or posting such notices, and the Respondent even questions the actual existence thereof.[67]

[63] See the testimony of Kent Anderson.

[64] Anderson is "responsible for all the personnel administration programs" and "involved . . . in the area of communication of [layoff decisions to the employees]."

[65] Threats to employees made shortly before a scheduled election are not to be taken lightly because they may influence the outcome of the election. Hilton Inn, 232 NLRB 873 (1977).

[66] Taylor-Dunn Mfg. Co., 252 NLRB 799, 814 (1980); J. P. Stevens & Co., 244 NLRB 407 (1979). Contrast Aunt Millie's Sauces, 259 NLRB 278 (1981), where the Board found that there was a valid business reason for the employer's decision, as is true of the instant case, but also that the announcement thereof, when made to employees, was not inconsistent with its usual practices and "there was no mention of the Union or of the pending election at the time the initial terms of employment were announced."

Moreover, the cases cited by the Respondent in support of its contentions regarding this issue, in all actuality do not do so and are readily distinguishable from the instant case. In R. J. Reynolds Tobacco Co., 240 NLRB 620 (1979), the Board affirmed an administrative law judge's finding that an employer's action in telling employees during an election campaign that, "something big is going to happen after this election is over," did not constitute a violation of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act. However, the ALJ's finding was based on the ambiguity of such statement since it was equally susceptible "of an interpretation as either a threat of reprisal or a promise of benefits" and "of an innocuous interpretation." In the instant case the statements of layoff were clear and unequivocal. Other differences are also plainly apparent between the cases.

It is similarly apparent from a reading of C & E Stores, 221 NLRB 1321 (1976), that this case also fails to support the Respondent's position. Most importantly, in the instant case the layoff and the dates thereof had actually been set and included in the announcements of layoffs, although this in and of itself is not violative of the Act.

[67] Although the Respondent admits that, "During the pre-election campaign, the Respondent posted a number of bulletins which collectively were called 'Questions of the Day' on various bulletin boards at its facility," it also asserts that it posted no "Question of the Day" other than those contained in R. Exh. 3(a-m). This exhibit contains no "Question of the Day" that specifically makes reference to employee work reviews.

Furthermore, Keppel testified that on Monday, January 12, 1981, 4 days before the Board's scheduled election on January 16, 1981, Cross held a meeting of employees at the Tank Farm Road Annex facility where he told the employees that if the Union won the election, there would be no work reviews because everything would be at a "standstill" while negotiations proceeded. Cynthia Stevens, who had also attended the January 12, 1981 meeting, testified similarly regarding what Cross had told the employees at this meeting. She stated that Cross had said that during negotiations between the Respondent and the Union, the Respondent's "hands would be tied" and therefore "everything would be at a standstill" including the March employee work reviews.

Cross denied that he had mentioned anything about the March work reviews or that they would not be forthcoming. He also denied stating to the employees that wages or benefits would "be frozen" or "be at a standstill." However, Cross acknowledged that he had read the following from a prepared text, which he followed without departure except for one explanatory instance,

> If the union wins, however, our hands would be more or less tied while the company bargained with the union—that is, we couldn't make any changes unless both sides agreed or until the company had satisfied its bargaining obligation.

John Lane, a production supervisor also present at this meeting, testified that Cross spoke directly from a prepared text, which Lane identified as Respondent's Exhibit 2, and "I do not recall any extemporaneous speaking whatsoever." He also testified that Cross had never stated that the March reviews would be at a standstill, canceled, or frozen during his presentation at this meeting.

From the above it is obvious that the resolution of this issue depends substantially on a credibility determination between the witnesses for the General Counsel and the Respondent, respectively. I admittedly have found such a determination to be difficult and distressing at best. As the administrative law judge observed in Cas Walker's Cash Stores, 249 NLRB 316, 321 (1980):

> Resolution of credibility conflicts are often difficult, requiring the weighing of equally plausible narrations of testimony of witnesses who appear to be telling the truth and who are no more prejudiced and biased than others who are telling a wholly different story. Of times, there are no fatal inconsistencies nor contradictions for the determiner of factual issues to seize upon to arrive at a firm conclusion. In those instances, the trial judge or jury must rely upon a sixth sense and instinct, which makes the resolution of certain conflicts somewhat unsatisfactory, leaving the chance, somewhat slight and many times significant, that the final decision was erroneous. A reasonable doubt remains.

Although I have found that some of the above observations hold true in this case, still reasonable, appropriate, and valid credibility resolutions can be and have been made based on a careful review of all the evidence, my observation of witness demeanor, the weight of the respective evidence, established or admitted facts, inherent probabilities, and reasonable inferences that may be drawn from the record as a whole.[88]

After carefully considering all of the above factors, I tend to credit the account of what occurred regarding the events bearing on the issue under consideration, as given by the General Counsel's witnesses, for the reasons that their testimony was generally forthright, mostly clear and unequivocal, and consistent with each other and the other evidence present in the record. Moreover, while I also believed much of the general testimony given by the Respondent's witnesses, yet when it came to bear on the crucial incidents that gave rise to the allegations of unlawful conduct on the Respondent's part, the emphasis of their testimony was directed toward acquitting such conduct of any tinge of unlawfulness as opposed to the truth of what actually occurred.[89] Their testimony at times was contradictory and equivocal and inconsistent with the other evidence in the record, as will be referred to hereinafter.

Initially, and in reinforcement of my above credibility determination, is that Vickie Wobermin was still employed by the Respondent at its Southwood Drive facility in San Luis Obispo at the time she testified in this matter. As an employee of the Respondent, her testimony, adverse to its positions here, was given at consider-

I have also taken note in such resolutions that even witnesses whose demeanor and forthrightness of testimony engendering belief will often give testimony that in part may seem inconsistent or unclear because of the passage of time requiring the remembrance of things and events past.

[89] Cross testified that he followed a prepared text (R. Exh. 2) in addressing the employees at the January 12, 1981 meeting and did not deviate therefrom except once, to explain to them the meaning of the term "challenged ballot." However, the copy of the text in evidence is replete with sentences that have been crossed out, indicating that Cross omitted these in his presentation. Additionally, question marks appear alongside certain paragraphs, and words and sentences are underlined there creating ambiguities regarding what these signified to Cross and whether he intended to or did in fact elaborate on these as he had done with the term "challenged ballot," one of which significantly was the phrase "we couldn't make any changes" if the Union won the election and the Respondent's hands were more or less tied, "changes" impliedly encompassing wages and undefined benefits and other conditions of employment.

Moreover, John Lane, a management employee and present at this meeting, also testified that Cross had spoken from a prepared text and not extemporaneously and had not departed therefrom. After reviewing R. Exh. 2, he identified it as a copy thereof. However, his testimony regarding this became suspect when, on cross-examination, it was revealed that Lane did not have a copy of the prepared text before him at the meeting nor had he seen it prior thereto. And, according to his own testimony, it was only after the meeting had concluded that he had the opportunity to "glance at the top sheet" of the text, but he "did not go through the whole thing."

As the evidence shows, the Respondent, during the month of December 1980, and admittedly during the month of January 1981, up until the time of the election on January 16, 1981, "conducted a vigorous campaign in opposition to the Union's organizing efforts." Thus, the Respondent's antiunion feelings were obvious to its management personnel, whose interests would be furthered by support of their Employer's position thereon rather than opposition or indifference thereto. I do not mean to infer or suggest that this is in any was unlawful, unless manifested by these employees in a manner violative of the Act. It is mentioned to give perspective in focusing events and management personnel actions that occurred here.

able risk of economic reprisal, including loss of employment or promotion, and therefore unlikely to be false.[70] Additionally, at least as applicable to Cynthia Stevens, if not to Diana Keppel as well, and although laid off for economic reasons, Stevens left the Respondent's employ prior to the hearing and under circumstances that show a decided lack of animosity and bad feelings between she and the Respondent, therefore she had no apparent reason to testify as she did other than as to her own recollection.[71]

Also of some significance in resolving this issue in favor of the General Counsel, aside from the above credibility findings, is the fact that although Cross testified that at the January 12, 1981 meeting, he not only refrained from mentioning anything about employee work reviews, but also did not tell the employees that wages or benefits would "be frozen" or "be at a standstill." The evidence shows that Cross did read, as part of his presentation from the prepared text, the following,

> If the Union wins, there will be a quick contract. Don't count on it. First, contract negotiations are often lengthy and can end up being drawn out over a long period of time. And the employees wait for raises and improvements in benefits while this takes place.[72]

Aside from the contradiction implicit in the above between Cross' denial regarding what he actually said about wages and benefits and what he read above, and albeit my crediting the testimony of Keppel and Stevens as to what he told the employees at this meeting, even assuming arguendo that Cross did not actually mention employee work reviews by name and that such would not be forthcoming if the Union won the election, yet the clear and unequivocal impression that this would be the case was conveyed to the employees by this statement as being the only possible implication and meaning the employees could draw.

Rank-and-file employees are generally much less sophisticated in concepts and nuances of labor relations law than are management employees, especially when managements' actions are orchestrated by labor relations' counsel. The Respondent's practice and procedure concerning employee raises was to issue employee work reviews in March and September of each year on which the amount of the raises, if any, were based. Thus, employees were well aware that without work reviews as in the past, no salary raises would be granted, and as Keppel so credibly testified, "that's what everyone waits for, are the reviews. That's when we get our raises in pay."[73] With this as background, Cross advised the employees that if the Union won the election, the Respondent's "hands would be more or less tied while the company bargained with the Union," that no changes could be made unless both parties agreed or bargaining had been satisfied. Soon thereafter Cross stated to them that bargaining negotiations could be lengthy, "drawn out over a long period of time," and that employees would then have to "wait for raises and improvements in benefits while this takes place." It was therefore obvious to the employees that if the Union won the election, the Respondent was telling them that no raises or improvements in benefits would be granted while it negotiated with the Union, and implicit in this therefore was the withholding of the next work reviews, the March review.[74]

Regarding the posting of written notices, the Respondent, in its brief, states that the sole support for the "Phantom Wage Freeze Notice" was the testimony of Vickie Wobermin. This is incorrect since Diana Keppel also testified that she had seen a notice concerning employee work reviews at the facility where she worked. The Respondent maintains that the Union's failure to produce the notice supports its position of the nonexistence thereof. However, these would be notices prepared and posted by the Respondent's personnel department, i.e., "Question of the Day," and in their control, so how could the Union or the General Counsel produce such notices unless the employees had removed them from the company bulletin board, an act that I am sure the Respondent does not encourage or condone regarding posted notices. Moreover, Cross' testimony to the effect that the "Questions of the Day," which were introduced into evidence by the Respondent, constituted all those that were produced during the campaign and that contained nothing about work reviews, was not corroborated under oath by Pace, the Respondent's counsel, who allegedly authored all such notices. Although I am sensitive to the ramifications of counsel testifying at the same hearing in which he is representing a client, in the instant case a witness testified to seeing a document alleged by an adverse witness to be nonexistent. Certainly Pace's testimony would have some bearing thereon.

The Respondent also asserts, in support of its denial that it posted any notices threatening to withhold employee work reviews if the Union won the election, that Cross published a memorandum dated December 5, 1980, to "Supervision" instructing them to review their employees' performances in preparation for the "March 1, 1981, Performance Reviews," which shows that the Respondent actually intended to issue such reviews.[75]

[70] The Board has long held that testimony against the interests of one's employer while still in its employ is entitled to added support. 7-Eleven Food Store, 257 NLRB 108 (1981); Shop-Rite Supermarket, 231 NLRB 500 (1977); DePaul Community Health Center, 221 NLRB 839 (1975); Georgia Rug Mill, 131 NLRB 1304 (1961). Although I am also aware that Wobermin was apparently a strong and active union adherent, I do not believe that this fact without more offsets the peril inherent in an employee testifying against the employer while still so employed.

[71] Tri-County Tube, 194 NLRB 103, 107 (1971). Stevens testified that after notifying her of her intended layoff effective 2 weeks hence, the Respondent actively assisted her in obtaining other employment with a different company, although Stevens thereafter found a better job by herself before she started on this other position.

[72] R. Exh. 2 at 6.

[73] It is no wonder that Keppel and Stevens remembered Cross' statements concerning this clearly while other topics he spoke about were vague or forgotten entirely. To these employees, the work reviews and possibly resulting pay raises were of paramount importance, taking precedence over everything except job loss by layoff, discharge, or plant closure.

[74] Again the Supreme Court's holding in the Gissel case rings true concerning employer-employee relations.

[75] R. Exh. 7.

However, even assuming that this was true when this memorandum was issued on December 5, 1980, the Respondent's position could have changed as the Union's organizing campaign heated up and its own campaign in opposition thereto substantially increased in response to Board notification to the parties about December 18, 1980, of the now-pending election to be held on January 16, 1981. Credited testimony that notices to the contrary were posted by the Respondent directed to the employees amply shows that such a change might well have occurred.

With the above in mind, the question to be resolved now is whether such statements made by the Respondent, orally and in writing, constitute a violation of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act. The Respondent asserts in its brief, "Even if it is found that Respondent did state that March reviews would be 'at a standstill,' such statements are lawful under the Act." I do not agree that such statements made by the Respondent are lawful under the Act.

The Board in Signal Knitting Mills, 237 NLRB 360, 361 (1978), set forth the principles applicable to the issue presented. The Board stated

> It is well established that an employer's legal duty in deciding whether to grant benefits while a representation proceeding is pending, is to act precisely as it would if a union were not in the picture. In the instant case, however, Respondent posted a notice which purported to set forth the consequences, vis-a-vis potential increases in wages or benefits, of the Union's filing of objections to an election. However, the notice contained no qualifying language indicating that the "freeze" would apply only to benefit and/or wage increases not in accord with Respondent's past practice. Further, the notice indicated that the Union was the sole cause of the wage and benefit freeze, thus placing the onus of the employees' potential loss of financial improvements on the Union. Accordingly, we find that the notice, on its face, conveyed to employees the message that their union activity would harm their prospects for improved wages and benefits and, therefore, threatened and coerced employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them in Section 7 of the Act in violation of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act. [Emphasis added.]

In the instant case the Respondent had a longstanding policy of reviewing employee work performances twice a year, in March and September, and granting or withholding wage increases based on these employee work reviews. It is uncontested that if the Union were not in the picture, such work reviews would have issued as in prior years. Thus, the Respondent's threats to withhold employee work reviews, in actuality a threat to deny employees the basis for wage increases as in the past, was unlawful. Moreover, by indicating expressly or impliedly that this would only occur if the Union won the election and the Respondent had to negotiate with it, the Respondent was indicating to the employees that the Union was the sole cause of their being denied their work review and thus any wage increases, thereby placing the onus of such potential loss of financial improvements on the Union. The threatening and coercive effect of the Respondent's statement is most cogently illustrated by Keppel's testimony that,

> Because if there was not to be any reviews, it would sway the boat of the employees because that's when we get our raises in pay.

Accordingly, I find and conclude that the Respondent's statements made orally and by posted written notice, conveyed to its employees the message that their union activity, i.e., voting in favor of the Union in a Board-conducted election, would harm their prospects in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them in Section 7 of the Act in violation of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.[76]

IV. THE EFFECT OF THE UNFAIR PRACTICES ON COMMERCE

The activities of the Respondent set forth in section III, above, found to constitute unfair labor practices occurring in connection with the operations of the Respondent described in section I, above, have a close, intimate, and substantial relationship to trade, traffic, and commerce among the several States and tend to lead to labor disputes burdening and obstructing commerce and the free flow thereof.

THE REMEDY

Having found that the Respondent has engaged in certain unfair labor practices, I shall recommend that it cease and desist therefrom and take certain affirmative action designed to effectuate the policies of the Act.

In light of the standards set forth in Hickmott Foods, 242 NLRB 1357 (1979), I conclude that a broad remedial order is inappropriate since it has not been shown that the Respondent has a proclivity to violate the Act or has engaged in such egregious or widespread misconduct as to demonstrate a general disregard for the employees' fundamental rights. Accordingly, I recommend the use of the narrow injunctive language "in any like or related manner" in the recommended Order.

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

I do find, however, such distinguishability concerning the cases cited by the Respondent in its brief in support of its contentions, i.e., in Patsy Bee, Inc., 249 NLRB 901 (1980), the administrative law judge and the Board found that the evidence did not establish the existence of "a failure to abide by established practice," among other things, as was established in the instant case.

Helpers of America, is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

3. The Respondent has interfered with, restrained, and coerced its employees in the exercise of their rights guaranteed in Section 7 of the Act, and has thereby engaged in unfair labor practices in violation of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act by

(a) Denying to its off-duty employees equal nondiscriminatory access to its facilities for purposes of engaging in activities protected by Section 7 of the Act.

(b) Promulgating and discriminatorily enforcing an unlawfully broad no-access rule.

(c) Impliedly threatening its employees with layoff if the Union won the election by unlawfully timing its announcements thereof during the critical preelection period because of anitunion hostilities.

(d) Threatening to withhold its March employee work reviews if the Union won the election.

4. That the unfair labor practices found above are unfair labor practices affecting commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

On these findings of fact and conclusions of law and on the entire record, I issue the following recommended[77]

ORDER

The Respondent, TRW Vidar, a Division of TRW Corporation, San Luis Obispo, California, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall

1. Cease and desist from

(a) Denying its off-duty employees equal nondiscriminatory access to its facilities for purposes of engaging in activities protected by Section 7 of the Act.

(b) Promulgating and discriminatorily enforcing an unlawfully broad no-access rule.

(c) Impliedly threatening its employees with layoff if the Union won an election.

(d) Threatening to withhold its March employee work reviews or any such reviews if the Union won the election.

(e) In any like or related manner interfering with, restraining, or coercing employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them by Section 7 of the Act.

2. Take the following affirmative action necessary to effectuate the policies of the Act.

(a) Post at its San Luis Obispo, California facilities, including the Southwood Drive and Tank Farm Road Annex facilities, copies of the attached notice marked "Appendix."[78] Copies of the notice, on forms provided by the Regional Director for Region 31, after being signed by the Respondent's authorized representative, shall be posted by the Respondent immediately upon receipt and maintained for 60 consecutive days in conspicuous places including all places where notices to employees are customarily posted. Reasonable steps shall be taken by the Respondent to ensure that the notices are not altered, defaced, or covered by any other material.

(b) Notify the Regional Director in writing within 20 days from the date of this Order what steps the Respondent has taken to comply.

[77] If no exceptions are filed as provided by Sec. 102.46 of the Board's Rules and Regulations, the findings, conclusions, and recommended Order shall, as provided in Sec. 102.48 of the Rules, be adopted by the Board and all objections to them shall be deemed waived for all purposes.

[78] If this Order is enforced by a judgment of a United States court of appeals, the words in the notice reading "Posted by Order of the National Labor Relations Board" shall read "Posted Pursuant to a Judgment of the United States Court of Appeals Enforcing an Order of the National Labor Relations Board."

DECISION AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN STEPHENS AND MEMBERS JOHANSEN AND CRACRAFT

On May 12, 1988, Administrative Law Judge J. Pargen Robertson issued the attached decision. The Respondent filed exceptions and a supporting brief.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the decision and the record in light of the exceptions and brief and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings,[2] and conclusions and to adopt the recommended Order.

ORDER

The National Labor Relations Board adopts the recommended Order of the administrative law judge and orders that the Respondent, Fayard Moving & Transportation, Gulfport, Mississippi, New Orleans, Louisiana, and Houston, Texas, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall take the action set forth in the Order.

[1] On November 2, 1987, the Teamsters International Union was readmitted to the AFL–CIO. Accordingly, the caption has been amended to reflect that change.

[2] The Respondent has excepted to some of the judge's credibility findings. The Board's established policy is not to overrule an administrative law judge's credibility resolutions unless the clear preponderance of all the relevant evidence convinces us that they are incorrect. Standard Dry Wall Products, 91 NLRB 544 (1950), enfd. 188 F.2d 362 (3d Cir. 1951). We have carefully examined the record and find no basis for reversing the findings.

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

J. PARGEN ROBERTSON, Administrative Law Judge. This matter was heard before me on 22 October and 12 November 1987 in New Orleans, Louisiana, pursuant to a complaint issued on 31 July 1987. That complaint was based on a charge filed on 6 July and amended on 5 August 1987. In its answer, Respondent admitted the commerce and jurisdictional allegations. Respondent also admitted that it is an employer engaged in commerce and that Charging Parties are labor organizations within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

The complaint alleges Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) and (5) of the Act by refusing to execute a written contract embodying agreement of the parties.

The parties have had a long history of collective bargaining. Beginning in 1968 when Locals 270 and 991 were certified as representatives of employees in Respondent's Gulfport, Mississippi, and New Orleans, Louisiana facilities, Respondent and the Local Unions have agreed to successive collective-bargaining agreements. The most recent agreement expired on 31 October 1986.

The most recent contract involved bargaining units in New Orleans, Louisiana; Gulfport, Mississippi;[1] and Houston, Texas, of "all local and long distance freight and furniture drivers, packers, loaders and unloaders, warehousemen, truck helpers and mechanics excluding all other employees, including office clericals, supervisors, guards and watchmen as defined in the Act [sic]."

The parties exchanged contract proposals in October 1986. On 16 December 1986, the parties met in New Orleans. According to testimony by Jerry Burnthorn, secretary-treasurer and business agent for Local 991, the parties reached agreement during that meeting. Burnthorn, acting on behalf of all three locals, presented an "interim agreement" to Respondent's president, Ed Fayard. Fayard signed that interim agreement on 6 January 1987.[2] Burnthorn signed the interim agreement on 7 January 1987. The interim agreement provides:

INTERIM AGREEMENT

BETWEEN

TEAMSTERS LOCAL UNION 991,
TEAMSTERS LOCAL UNION 270,
TEAMSTERS LOCAL UNION 988,

AND

FAYARD MOVING AND TRANSPORTATION, INC.

It is agreed that one company wide contract will serve the Mobile, Alabama, New Orleans, Louisiana, and Houston, Texas local unions.

All parties of the contract that expired October 31, 1986 are agreed to except as amended in this letter of agreement and will remain in effect through October 31, 1989.

The Union agrees that the three (3) day sick leave will only be paid for proven illnesses or accident when verified by a doctor, and will not be pyramided or paid when not used.

Fayard Moving and Transportation agrees to keep in effect the Automated Benefits Services group insurance with the following effective rates:

November 1, 1986–$40.60 per week
November 1, 1987–42.90 per week

[1] Although Respondent has a facility in Gulfport, that facility is served by Local 991 out of Mobile, Alabama.

[2] Although Fayard wrote the date January 6, 1986, all witnesses agree that he actually signed the agreement on January 6, 1987.

November 1, 1988–45.00 per week

WAGES

November 1, 1986	No increase
November 1, 1987	$0.25 cents per hour increase 1/4 cents per mile increase
November 1, 1988	$0.25 cents per hour increase 1/4 cents per mile increase

Ed Fayard admitted that he read, then signed, the interim agreement on 6 January 1987. However, Fayard testified that he understood the interim agreement to be nothing more than an agreement to continue to apply the terms of the 1983–1986 collective-bargaining contract, with the specific exceptions noted in the interim agreement, until the parties were able to negotiate a new contract. Jerry Burnthorn, on the other hand, contended that the parties agreed to a contract on 16 December 1986 and that the interim agreement was executed preliminary to execution of the full written contract. That written contract was prepared by Burnthorn in accord with the terms of the interim agreement.

Subsequently, Ed Fayard refused to sign the written contract. Jerry Burnthorn presented the written contract to Ed Fayard on 2 February 1986. Fayard specifically refused to sign the contract when he and Burnthorn met on 19 March 1987. Subsequently, Fayard again refused to sign the complete written contract on 7 May 1987. Present at the 7 May meeting were the business agents of all three locals, Jerry Burnthorn of Local 991, Ed Turner of Local 988, and Wallace Collins of Local 270, along with Ed Fayard's daughter Cindy Piper, who is Respondent's office manager, and Fayard's sister Leta Blake, who is an officer of Respondent.

According to Cindy Piper, the Locals, during the 7 May meeting, agreed to attempt to reconcile Ed Fayard's problems with the contract, through a "side agreement" which would not be included in the written contract. Both Jerry Burnthorn and Ed Turner disputed Piper's testimony. Burnthorn and Turner testified that the Locals never agreed to a "side agreement." Ed Fayard, who also testified about the 7 May meeting, did not testify about a "side agreement."

Conclusions

There is a dispute as to what occurred when the parties met on 16 December 1986 in New Orleans. However, the parties agree that an interim agreement was executed by both Respondent and Jerry Burnthorn. Burnthorn testified, without rebuttal, that he was acting on behalf of all three Locals when he signed the interim agreement.

The Board has consistently refused to permit a party to a written agreement to vary the terms of the agreement by providing a "contemporaneous or prior oral agreement or undertaking." Air-Vac Industries, 259 NLRB 336, 342 (1981).

I am bound to accept the parties' interim agreements as conclusive proof of the parties' understanding. The interim agreement is clear. By refusing to execute the presented collective-bargaining agreement that was prepared in accord with provisions of the interim agreement, Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) and (5) of the Act. See Fashion Furniture Mfg., 279 NLRB 705 (1986); Georjan, Inc., 281 NLRB 952 (1986).

Moreover, I find that the Union did not agree on 7 May to attempt to reconcile Respondent's problems through a "side agreement." Both Jerry Burnthorn and Ed Turner testified credibly that they did not agree to such an arrangement. Additionally, Ed Fayard, who was present during that meeting, never claimed that the Union agreed to a "side agreement." Therefore, I discredit the testimony of Cindy Piper that the Union agreed to treat Fayard's problems in a "side agreement."

Conclusions of Law

1. Fayard Moving & Transportation, Inc. is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

2. International Brotherhood of Teamsters, Chauffeurs, Warehousemen, and Helpers of America, Locals 991, 270, and 988 are labor organizations within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

3. By refusing to execute and sign the collective-bargaining agreement agreed on between it and the Union, Respondent has engaged in and is engaging in unfair labor practices within the meaning of Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act.

4. The above unfair labor practices affect commerce within the meaning of the Act.

The Remedy

Having found that Respondent has engaged in unfair labor practices in violation of Section 8(a)(1) and (5) of the Act, I shall order it to cease and desist therefrom and to take certain affirmative action designed to effectuate the policies of the Act.

I recommend that Respondent be ordered to execute the collective-bargaining agreement agreed on with the Union and to comply with its terms retroactively to 1 November 1986. In addition, the Respondent shall make whole employees in the bargaining units and the Union for losses, if any, suffered, because of Respondent's refusal to sign the agreement in the manner set forth in Ogle Protection Services, 183 NLRB 682 (1970), plus interest as described in New Horizons for the Retarded, 283 NLRB 1173 (1987).[3]

On these findings of fact and conclusions of law and on the entire record, I issue the following recommended[4]

[3] Under New Horizons for the Retarded, interest is computed at the "short-term Federal rate" for the underpayment of taxes as set out in the 1986 Amendment to 26 U.S.C § 6621. Interest accrued before 1 January 1987 (the effective date of the amendment) shall be computed as in Florida Steel Corp., 231 NLRB 651 (1977).

[4] If no exceptions are filed as provided by Sec. 102.46 of the Board's Rules and Regulations, the findings, conclusions, and recommended Order shall, as provided in Sec. 102.48 of the Rules, be adopted by the Board and all objections to them shall be deemed waived for all purposes.

ORDER

The Respondent, Fayard Moving & Transportation, Inc., Gulfport, Mississippi; New Orleans, Louisiana; and Houston, Texas, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall

1. Cease and desist from

(a) Failing and refusing to execute the collective-bargaining agreement agreed on by the Respondent and Locals 991, 270, and 988.

(b) In any like or related manner interfering with, restraining, or coercing employees in the exercise of rights guaranteed them by Section 7 of the Act.

2. Take the following affirmative action necessary to effectuate the policies of the Act.

(a) On request by the Locals, forthwith execute the contract on which agreement was reached with the Union or, if the Union does not request such execution, bargain collectively in good faith, on request, with the Union as the exclusive representative of the employees in the bargaining units and, if an understanding is reached, embody such understanding in a signed contract.

(b) Give retroactive effect to the terms and conditions of employment of the contract, and make whole its employees and Locals for any loss they suffered by reason of Respondent's failure to execute the agreement in the manner set forth in this decision.

(c) Post at its Gulfport, Mississippi, New Orleans, Louisiana, and Houston, Texas facilities copies of the attached notice marked "Appendix."[8] Copies of the notice, on forms provided by the Regional Director for Region 15, after being signed by the Respondent's authorized representative, shall be posted by the Respondent immediately upon receipt and maintained for 60 consecutive days in conspicuous places including all places where notices to employees are customarily posted. Reasonable steps shall be taken by the Respondent to ensure that the notices are not altered, defaced, or covered by any other material.

(d) Notify the Regional Director in writing within 20 days from the date of this Order what steps the Respondent has taken to comply.

[8] If this Order is enforced by a judgment of a United States court of appeals, the words in the notice reading "Posted by Order of the National Labor Relations Board" shall read "Posted Pursuant to a Judgment of the United States Court of Appeals Enforcing an Order of the National Labor Relations Board."

Bill Johnson's Restaurants, Inc. and Myrland R. Helton. Case 28–CA–5041

July 29, 1988

SUPPLEMENTAL DECISION AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN STEPHENS AND MEMBERS JOHANSEN, BABSON, AND CRACRAFT

On April 30, 1980, the National Labor Relations Board issued its Decision and Order[1] in this proceeding finding, inter alia, that the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(4) and (1) of the Act by filing a civil complaint in an Arizona state court with the intent of impeding the Board's processes and punishing the Charging Party and others for exercising their rights guaranteed by Section 7 of the Act.

On November 12, 1981, the United States Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit issued a judgment[2] enforcing the Board's Order in its entirety. The Respondent thereafter sought and was granted certiorari in the United States Supreme Court. The Supreme Court issued its opinion on May 31, 1983, vacating the Board's Order and remanding the case to the court of appeals with instructions to remand the case to the Board for further proceedings consistent with the Court's opinion.[3] The Respondent and the General Counsel then filed statements of position with the Board, and the Respondent filed a supplemental statement in response to the General Counsel's statement. On consideration of the record and the parties' statements in light of the Supreme Court's opinion, the Board makes the following findings and conclusions.

I. FACTUAL BACKGROUND

Myrland R. Helton, a waitress at the Respondent's "Bill Johnson's Big Apple East" restaurant, was discharged on August 8, 1978. She then filed an unfair labor practice charge, alleging that her discharge resulted from efforts to organize a union. On September 20, 1978, the General Counsel issued a complaint alleging that her discharge violated the Act. On that day, Helton, joined by three fellow waitresses and a few nonemployees, picketed the restaurant, carrying signs asking customers to boycott the establishment because it had been charged with unfair labor practices. The Respondent's manager confronted the picketers and threatened to "get even" with them "if it's the last thing I do." The Respondent's president telephoned the husband of one of the picketing waitresses and impliedly threatened that the couple would "get hurt" and lose their home if the wife continued to picket. Nevertheless, the picketing continued on September 21 and 22 when the picketers, in addition to carrying signs, distributed leaflets listing the employees' specific complaints regarding working conditions. On September 25, attorneys for the Respondent filed a complaint in the Superior Court of Arizona alleging that Helton and the other demonstrators had engaged in mass picketing, harassment, blocking ingress to and egress from the restaurant, and creating a threat to public safety.[4] A second count claimed that the leaflet was libelous, alleging that it contained false and outrageous statements published by defendants with malicious intent to injure the Respondent. The complaint sought, inter alia, compensatory and punitive damages.[5]

On September 26, Helton filed an additional unfair labor practice charge with the Board, alleging that the state court suit was filed in retaliation for the employees' protected concerted activities and because she had filed an unfair labor practice charge. The General Counsel thereafter issued a second complaint, asserting that the Respondent's filing of the state court suit violated Section 8(a)(4) and (1) of the Act. The two complaints were consolidated for hearing. The judge, inter alia, found the 8(a)(4) and (1) violations as alleged and, as noted, the Board thereafter adopted the judge's decision, and the Board's decision was subsequently enforced by the Ninth Circuit.

Meanwhile, the parties to the state court suit had cross-moved for summary judgment on the claim and counterclaim. On March 15, 1979, the state court issued an order that granted the defendants' motion for summary judgment on the business interference claims, but left the libel claim for trial. The order further dismissed the abuse-of-process count in the counterclaim, but left the libel count of the counterclaim for trial.

II. THE SUPREME COURT'S OPINION

In vacating the Ninth Circuit's judgment, the Court initially acknowledged that Section 8(a)(1) and (4) are broad remedial provisions and that lawsuits filed by employers may be powerful instruments of coercion or retaliation. Nonetheless, the Court found that overriding these concerns were the first amendment right of access to the courts and the States' compelling interest in maintaining domestic peace. In light of these overriding interests, the Court ruled that the Board may not enjoin

[4] These allegations will be referred to as the Respondent's business interference claims.
[5] The defendants to this suit thereafter filed a counterclaim accusing the Respondent of, inter alia, abuse of process and libel.

a well-grounded lawsuit regardless of the employer's motivation in filing it. Conversely, the Court stated that the Board can enjoin a lawsuit that lacks a reasonable basis if it was filed with the intent to retaliate against employees exercising their rights under the Act.

The Court indicated that when confronted with the allegation that the filing and prosecution of a lawsuit violates the Act, the Board must first determine whether the suit has a "reasonable basis" in law or fact.[6] If the suit lacks a reasonable basis, the Board may proceed with the unfair labor practice proceeding and determine whether the suit was filed with a retaliatory motive. Should the Board determine that a reasonable basis for the suit exists, however, then the Board may not enjoin the suit, but must stay its unfair labor practice proceeding until the state court suit has been concluded. If the state court ultimately finds merit in the employer's suit, the Court stated that the employer should also prevail before the Board because the filing of a meritorious lawsuit, even with a retaliatory motive, is not an unfair labor practice. The Court further indicated, however, that when the state court judgment goes against the employer or the suit is > withdrawn or is otherwise shown to be without merit, the employer has had its day in court, the interest of the State in providing a forum for its citizens has been vindicated, and the Board may then proceed to adjudicate the § 8(a)(1) and § 8(a)(4) unfair labor practice case.[7]

The Court further noted that if the Board found a violation it could order the employer to reimburse the employees for their attorneys' fees and other expenses, as well as any other proper relief that would effectuate the policies of the Act. We shall apply these principles enunciated by the Supreme Court in resolving the unfair labor practice case before us.

III. THE SETTLEMENT AGREEMENT

Subsequent to the Supreme Court's opinion, the parties to the state court lawsuit entered into a settlement agreement that dismissed all remaining claims and counterclaims in the lawsuit with prejudice.[8] That agreement, in pertinent part, provided:

> 1. All parties, by and through their attorneys, agree to execute a stipulation to dismiss with prejudice all claims and counterclaims in the lawsuit entitled Bill Johnson's Restaurants v. Helton et al., Civil No. C-375470, now pending in Maricopa County Superior Court. Each party agrees to bear its own costs and expenses; provided however, that Bill Johnson's Restaurants, Inc. shall pay the reasonable attorneys' fees and costs incurred by defendants in the subject lawsuit, not to exceed the total sum of $8,000.00, as previously required by the NLRB, if and to the extent approved by the Supreme Court of the United States when it renders a decision in Bill Johnson's Restaurants, Inc. v. NLRB, No. 81-2557.

The settlement agreement, by its terms, did not settle the instant unfair labor practice charge, nor did it discuss the effect of the Supreme Court's holding on the unfair labor practice issue.[9]

IV. THE PARTIES' POSITIONS

Following the remand of this proceeding to the Board, the parties submitted statements of position. The General Counsel argues that the Respondent's settlement of the libel claim is equivalent to a withdrawal of that suit. She argues, therefore, that, pursuant to the Supreme Court's decision, withdrawal may be viewed as establishing that the libel suit lacked merit. Alternatively, the General Counsel contends that the Board should now make factual findings in order to determine whether the libel claim had merit because the parties' settlement agreement has precluded a state court adjudication of that claim's merits. She argues that in making these factual findings, the Board should affirm the judge's earlier finding that the statements in the leaflet were true and therefore that the libel claim was without merit. The General Counsel also requests that the Board order the Respondent to make the Charging Party and her fellow employees whole for all legal and other expenses incurred by them in defending against the Respondent's lawsuit, including expenses incurred in relation to their answer and counterclaims.

The Respondent, on the other hand, urges the Board to dismiss the relevant allegations of the complaint and to deny the state court defendants any reimbursement of their legal expenses. Noting that the state court denied the defendants' motion for summary judgment on the Respondent's libel claim, the Respondent argues that it would be inappropriate, in light of the Court's decision, for the Board to find that its suit lacked merit and to order

[6] The Court indicated that the Board could apply the "genuine issue" test used in adjudging motions for summary judgment when making its reasonable basis determinations. 461 U.S. at 745 fn. 11.

[7] 461 U.S. at 747.

[8] As noted above, the only remaining issues in the lawsuit were the Respondent's libel claim and the employees' libel counterclaim.

[9] The agreement is drafted as if the Court's opinion had not issued, even though the agreement was signed by the parties in June 1983 and the Court had issued its opinion on May 31, 1983.

reimbursement. The Respondent also rejects the General Counsel's argument that the settlement agreement demonstrates that its suit lacked merit by noting that a settlement agreement may not be used as evidence of the validity or invalidity of a claim under the Federal Rules of Evidence. It further argues that the General Counsel's alternative argument that the Board should adopt the judge's factual findings that the claim lacked merit must be rejected because the Court specifically found that the judge had improperly decided that issue instead of leaving it for the state court to resolve.

V. CONCLUSIONS

A. Business Interference Claims[10]

We conclude that the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(4) and (1) by filing and prosecuting the business interference claims. As noted above, the state court granted the defendants' motion for summary judgment on that claim. That judgment constituted a final adjudication establishing that that claim lacked a reasonable basis in law or fact. The Supreme Court has advised that we should defer to the state court judgment unless we can provide a cogent explanation for refusing to do so. 461 U.S. at 749 fn. 15. The Respondent has not presented any argument why we should not defer, nor does the record suggest any reason for not doing so.

Furthermore, we find that the record establishes that the Respondent filed its suit in retaliation for the employees' exercise of their Section 7 rights. The administrative law judge considered the intent question and concluded that the Respondent had filed its lawsuit to retaliate against Helton for filing the 8(a)(3) charge and to punish the picketers for engaging in protected concerted activity. 249 NLRB at 165. This conclusion was based on his finding that the Respondent's manager had threatened to "get even" with the picketers.[11] Based on his assessments of demeanor and credibility, the judge also found that the Respondent's president called the husband of one of the picketers and referred to the couple losing their new home and "getting hurt by all this." 249 NLRB at 161–162. We have carefully reexamined the record and now reaffirm the judge's findings and conclusions regarding the Respondent's retaliatory motive in filing the suit.

Accordingly, we find that the two requisite elements of a meritless suit and a retaliatory motive exist for establishing a violation. Pursuant to the Supreme Court's decision, we shall therefore order appropriate relief to remedy the unlawful filing and prosecution of the business interference suit.

B. Libel Claim

The resolution of whether the Respondent's filing and prosecution of its libel claim violated the Act presents a more troublesome issue. The state court's denial of the defendants' motion for summary judgment established that this claim had a reasonable basis.[12] Pursuant to the Supreme Court's decision, the Board was therefore required to stay the unfair labor practice proceeding until the state court suit had been concluded. The state court suit has been concluded through the parties' settlement of that claim. The Supreme Court, however, did not address the effect of a settlement as a means of concluding a suit. Rather, it discussed only the effect of the state court reaching a decision on the claim's merits, the employer withdrawing its suit, or the claim otherwise being shown to be lacking in merit. As explained below, we find that the General Counsel has failed to establish that the Respondent's libel claim was baseless and we will therefore dismiss the complaint as it applies to the filing and prosecution of the libel claim.

We reject the General Counsel's argument that the settlement of the libel claim is equivalent to the withdrawal of the claim and thereby establishes that the claim lacked merit. That result is contrary to Rule 408 of the Federal Rules of Evidence, which states that a settlement agreement may not be used as evidence to establish the validity or invalidity of a claim. Furthermore, finding a violation where the parties have settled the claim would discourage settlements, particularly in situations like this one where the state court had found that the claim presented a genuine issue of material fact.

We next address the General Counsel's alternative contention that as the state court has been precluded from deciding the merits of the libel claim, we should now do so. Contrary to the position of the Respondent, we find nothing in the Supreme Court opinion that precludes us from deciding the [10] In determining whether the filing of the Respondent's lawsuit was an unfair labor practice, we find it necessary to analyze the two claims contained in that suit separately. This approach is suggested in the Supreme Court's opinion, when, after noting that the state court had denied the defendants' motion for summary judgment on the libel claim, the Court indicated with respect to the business interference claims that "if [they] have been finally adjudicated to be lacking in merit, on remand the Board may reinstate its finding that [the Respondent] acted unlawfully by prosecuting these unmeritorious claims." 461 U.S. at 750 fn. 15. The libel claim was still pending in state court when the Court issued its opinion, thus indicating that the Board might arrive at a different conclusion with respect to its reasonable basis and ultimately its merits.

[11] The Respondent's manager also asked for and recorded the names of the picketers who were present, and these individuals were among those named as defendants in the state court suit.

[12] We find that the Respondent did not waive consideration of the state court's denial of summary judgment on this claim by failing to bring the state court's ruling to the attention of the administrative law judge prior to his decision. See 461 U.S. at 749 fn. 15.

merits of this claim in order to resolve the unfair labor practice allegation.[13] Nor does the parties' settlement agreement, which settled only the state suit, preclude us from determining the state suit's merits solely for the purpose of resolving the unfair labor practice case.[14] Nonetheless, we decline the General Counsel's invitation to enter that thicket. Our expertise lies in resolving labor law questions that arise under the Act, rather than deciding claims that arise under state law.[15] Moreover, our limited resources do not permit us to engage in the resolution of state law claims.[16]

Because we decline to act as state court triers of fact and because the General Counsel has not otherwise shown, as required by the Supreme Court's decision, that the Respondent's libel claim lacked merit or was withdrawn, we conclude that no violation of Section 8(a)(4) and (1) of the Act has been proven.[17] Accordingly, we will dismiss the complaint insofar as it applies to the filing and prosecution of the libel claim.

[13] The Court found that the judge had erred by determining that the libel claim lacked merit instead of deciding whether the claim presented a genuine issue that the state court should decide. It further found that the Board must stay its unfair labor practice proceeding until the state court action had concluded. The opinion, however, does not say that the Board should refrain from deciding the merits of the claim when, as here, the state court action has concluded and the state court has not rendered a judgment on the merits of the claim. Our determination of the merits would have no legal effect on the state forum, of course, and would be undertaken solely for the purpose of resolving the unfair labor practice allegation.

[14] By the same token, we find nothing in the Court's opinion that requires us to decide the state court suit in the event that the parties settle the suit. The Court did find that when the state court initially decides that the employer's suit presents triable issues but ultimately determines that the suit lacks merit, the Board can proceed to adjudicate the unfair labor practice. We do not agree with our colleague's assertion in the second paragraph of fn. 2 of his dissent that this finding means that the Board can disregard the trial court's interlocutory determination and substitute its judgment on the suit's merits. Rather, that finding simply reflects the Court's conclusion that the Board is bound by the state court's ultimate determination of the suit's merits. In the same way, the Court clearly held that the Board is bound by the state court's determination that the suit has merit because the Board must then dismiss the unfair labor practice complaint even if the suit was filed with a retaliatory intent. 461 U.S. at 747. In sum, we do not believe that the Court indicated anywhere in its decision that the Board should decide the merits of the employer's lawsuit filed in the state court.

[15] In this regard, we note the distinction that exists between a reasonable-basis determination, which the Court specifically authorized us to undertake, and a determination of the merits of a state claim. The former involves the limited inquiry of whether a genuine issue exists, whereas the latter requires the Board to conduct a trial on the merits under the legal standards and procedures that the state court would apply.

[16] Although "willing to entertain the possibility that the Board might someday be presented with a case so fraught with complex state law issues [that the Board] should decline to give relief," our dissenting colleague states that the determination of this libel claim is not beyond our expertise because it is a state claim governed by a Federal standard. He then concludes that we should therefore decide the merits of the libel claim by relying on the findings of the administrative law judge, which were adopted by the Board and enforced by the Federal circuit court. We question the wisdom in doing so. Although we may be able to decide certain state law claims, the fact remains that the Board is not a court of general jurisdiction. We do not decide cases that are pursued through the state court systems. Rather, Congress has delegated power to us to decide cases that arise under the Act. That is where our expertise lies. We also note that our colleague's standard, that the state suit be "so fraught with complex state law issues" before the Board would not decide it, provides insufficient guidance to the parties in determining whether the Board will or will not hear such cases. Conversely, our decision not to decide these state law claims provides the parties in future cases with the necessary guidance to aid their resolution of those cases.

[17] In light of our finding that the General Counsel has not shown that the Respondent's libel claim lacked merit or that the Respondent withdrew that claim, we need not decide whether the Respondent filed its libel claim with a retaliatory motive.

VI. REMEDY

Having found that the Respondent's filing and prosecution of the business interference claims violated the Act, we shall order the Respondent to cease and desist from engaging in such conduct. In accordance with the Supreme Court's decision, we shall order the Respondent to reimburse the employees for all attorneys' fees and other expenses that they incurred in defending against the wrongful business interference suit. Those expenses were incurred solely because the Respondent instituted its lawsuit, an action that we have found violated the National Labor Relations Act. In order to vindicate our interest in enforcing the Act, we have the statutory authority pursuant to Section 10(c) to authorize such relief. That authority does not exist, however, with respect to the counterclaims filed by the employees. In filing those counterclaims, the employees sought to avail themselves of those remedies that the State has provided to compensate the injuries suffered as a result of abusive process and libel. The issue of whether to award legal expenses associated with those counterclaims is therefore solely one for the state forum to decide in enforcing the laws of its State. No Federal interest is implicated. Consequently, we deny the General Counsel's request to order the Respondent to reimburse the employees for those expenses incurred in filing their counterclaims.

ORDER

The National Labor Relations Board orders that the Respondent, Bill Johnson's Restaurants, Inc., Phoenix, Arizona, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall

1. Cease and desist from

(a) Filing or maintaining a baseless lawsuit against employees in retaliation for their engaging in protected concerted activities.

(b) In any like or related manner interfering with, restraining, or coercing employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them by Section 7 of the Act.

2. Take the following affirmative action necessary to effectuate the policies of the Act.

(a) In the manner set forth in the remedy portion of the Supplemental Decision, reimburse the Charging Party, Myrland R. Helton, and all other named party defendants, for legal expenses up to a maximum of $8000 incurred in defense of the business interference claim of its lawsuit styled as Bill Johnson's Restaurants v. Myrland R. Helton, No. C-375470, in the Superior Court of the State of Arizona, in and for the county of Maricopa.

(b) Post at each of its restaurants located in Phoenix and Mesa, Arizona, copies of the attached notice marked "Appendix."[18] Copies of the notice, on forms provided by the Regional Director for Region 28, after being signed by the Respondent's authorized representative, shall be posted by the Respondent immediately upon receipt and maintained for 60 consecutive days in conspicuous places including all places where notices to employees are customarily posted. Reasonable steps shall be taken by the Respondent to ensure that the notices are not altered, defaced, or covered by any other material.

(c) Notify the Regional Director in writing within 20 days from the date of this Order what steps the Respondent has taken to comply.

CHAIRMAN STEPHENS, concurring and dissenting in part.

When, as a consequence of employees exercising their rights under Section 7, their employer files a suit in state court against them, the Board may enjoin the prosecution of that suit only on a two-fold finding that (1) the employer is acting out of retaliatory motives, and (2) there is no reasonable basis in fact or law for the suit. This is the holding of the Supreme Court's opinion which remanded the instant proceeding back to us for further consideration. At that time, the Respondent's suit was still pending in an Arizona superior court. Although the Respondent's business interference claim against its employees had been dismissed on a motion for summary judgment, its libel claim, as well as the employees' counterclaim for libel, was awaiting trial, the state court having denied the parties' cross-motions for summary judgment.

Events, however, soon overcame the case. Within the month following the Supreme Court's May 1983 decision, the parties executed a settlement agreement that provided for dismissal with prejudice of the entire state proceeding and for the payment of up to $8000 by the Respondent to the employees to compensate for attorney's fees and court costs. Interestingly, the settlement did not attempt to dispose of the Board proceeding. Thus, as of this juncture, the question before the Board is no longer whether we should enjoin a pending state court suit, but whether the Board can order remedial relief against the Respondent for a retaliatory suit which was terminated, not by a final adjudication by a state court, but rather by a settlement.

I agree with my colleagues that the record indisputably supports a finding of retaliatory motive by the Respondent in filing suit on the business interference count, and I further find such a motive in its filing of the libel claim. I also join my colleagues in concluding that the business interference claim, which did not survive a motion for summary judgment, was baseless and was therefore an unfair labor practice which we should remedy. However, I part company with the majority's conclusion that we should refrain from considering whether the libel claim lacks merit. The Board should address the question and on finding that the state claim was groundless and filed for retaliatory motives, an appropriate remedy should be ordered. Furthermore, while I concur with my colleagues on the effect to be given to the settlement agreement, I believe some elaboration is warranted.

As my colleagues properly concede, there is nothing in the Supreme Court's opinion that precludes us from considering the libel issue. Indeed, the Court held that the Board could "proceed to adjudicate" the unfair labor practice issues if "judgment goes against the employer in the state court . . . or if his suit is withdrawn or is otherwise shown to be without merit." Bill Johnson's Restaurants v. NLRB, 461 U.S. 731, 747 (1983) (emphasis added). They stay their hand, however, because of the fear that we would be entering a "thicket" of state law claims. I am willing to entertain the possibility that the Board might someday be presented with a case so fraught with complex state law issues we should decline to give relief even though the possibility exists that the respondent's lawsuit is both baseless and unlawfully motivated. But that is surely not this case, and I cannot conclude that we should decline to consider the issue here simply because we can speculate that other very different cases might arise in the future.

Although the libel claim at issue here is a claim under state law, it is one that—as a substantive matter—is governed by Federal standards rooted in a Federal labor policy that has been defined in part by Board decisions. Thus, in Linn v. Plant Guard Workers, 383 U.S. 53 (1966), the Supreme Court held that the National Labor Relations Act did not completely preempt state court libel actions arising out of labor disputes; but the Court set out a Federal standard for determining whether a particular libel could be found to be actionable in such cases. This standard—a requirement that the statements in question be found to have been made with actual malice in the sense that they were "published with knowledge of their falsity or with reckless disregard of whether they were true or false"—was based on the Court's earlier first amendment decision in New York Times Co. v. Sullivan, 376 U.S. 254 (1964), and on the standards that the Board has applied in determining whether alleged defamations constitute conduct unprotected by the Act. Linn, supra, 383 U.S. at 61, 65.[1] A state court that substitutes state common law principles for that standard and permits a state law remedy for speech that would be protected under Federal law is properly reversed. Letter Carriers v. Austin, 418 U.S. 264, 281–287 (1974). Thus, I cannot see any basis for concluding that the determination whether the Respondent's libel claim has merit is beyond our "expertise," as my colleagues suggest.

In fact, because the administrative law judge lacked the guidance subsequently provided by the Supreme Court in this case concerning when the Board may consider the merits of a retaliatory state court suit, the judge has already effectively decided the merits of the libel claim. He found that the allegations that the Respondent claimed were libelous were, in fact, true. 249 NLRB at 162–163.[2] Affirming the decision that the prosecution of the libel claim was an unfair labor practice, the court of appeals held that, although there was some ambiguity in the picketing waitresses' leaflet concerning whether all their listed grievances against the Respondent had been made the subject of Board charges, there was no evidence at all to show that "the picketers made the statements with reckless disregard for the truth or falsity of the statements." 660 F.2d at 1343. It further held that the Respondent's suit lacked any "reasonable basis in fact." Ibid.

It is clear to me, therefore, that although there is no state court adjudication either for or against the Respondent, and although the Respondent settled, rather than withdrew, its libel claim, that claim is one that has been "otherwise shown to be without merit." Bill Johnson's, supra, 461 U.S. at 747. The General Counsel has therefore met the requirements approved by the Court for finding that the filing and prosecution of a lawsuit is an unfair labor practice: it was brought for a motive unlawful under the Act and it is lacking in merit. I would find the violation and provide the appropriate remedy, i.e., reimbursement for the costs of defending against the claim.

On the separate issue of what effect to give to the parties' settlement, I agree with my colleagues in striking a middle ground that rejects both the General Counsel's and the Respondent's respective contentions, but I would make some additional observations. First, to hold, as the General Counsel asserts, that a settlement is tantamount to an admission of nonmerit (particularly on the heels of a judicial finding that material issues of fact or law exist) would, as the majority reasons, tend to discourage the resort to settlements as a means to resolve disputes. However, I would suggest that the rule we announce today, which rejects the Respondent's argument that the settlement of the state suit should automatically be given preclusive effect regarding the Board proceeding, does create a certain disincentive to settlement. A Board respondent may well ask itself what advantages there are to settle its state claims short of final adjudication if it must face further litigation of the matter before the Board. Perhaps the way around this problem is to pursue a strategy which the Respondent here curiously did not follow: attempt to resolve both the state court litigation and the Board proceeding in one fell swoop, taking into account the standards which the Board applies in approving settlements.[3]

Consideration of the state and Federal claims together, for settlement purposes, not only recognizes

[1] The Court has since clarified Linn by explaining that it was "grounded in federal labor policy, though the suit had constitutional overtones." Babbitt v. Farm Workers, 442 U.S. 289, 309 fn. 16 (1979).

[2] It is true that the Supreme Court declared that here "[i]t was not the ALJ's province to make . . . factual determinations" regarding the meritoriousness of the libel claim as well as the one for business interference. See part V of the Court's opinion, 461 U.S. at 748. But, contrary to the Respondent, I do not read the Court's restriction on the scope of the Board's factual inquiry in deciding whether to enjoin a pending state suit (i.e., limited to whether the employer's evidence raises a genuine and material issue of fact) to be applicable once the suit is settled.

Similarly, while the Court also suggested that the decision of a state court on the question whether a lawsuit presents triable factual issues is entitled to deference, 461 U.S. at 749 fn. 15, I do not believe that the Arizona superior court's finding of triable issues on the libel claim at the summary judgment stage precludes the Board from finding that the suit lacks merit. Again, the reason turns on the status of the state litigation at the time the Board proceeds with the unfair labor practice case: When the Board seeks to enjoin a pending state suit, the trial court's finding of a triable issue should normally lead the Board to suspend its own proceedings, as the Court said. However, once the state action is concluded either by a final judgment or withdrawal of the suit, the General Counsel may then consider whether to continue prosecution of the Board case. As the Court itself stated, "If judgment goes against the employer in the state court . . . the interest of the State in providing a forum for its citizens has been vindicated, and the Board may then proceed to adjudicate the § 8(a)(1) and § 8(a)(4) unfair labor practice case." 461 U.S. at 747. It is entirely conceivable that the employer may have initially withstood a defense motion for summary judgment by establishing existence of triable facts, only to have final judgment entered against the employer. The fact that the Court would still allow the Board to proceed against the employer in such a case must logically mean that the Board can at some point disregard a trial court's interlocutory determination that the suit may have merit and make its own determination of the merits of the employer's state suit.

the State's interest in resolving private disputes short of full-blown litigation, but also protects the important and distinct interest that the Federal Government has in enforcing its labor laws. It is, of course, arguable that the Board's action against the Respondent is similar to the common law action for malicious prosecution available under state law.[4] The general rule applied in such actions is that a settlement of the underlying suit will automatically bar the malicious prosecution action.[5] The theory is that, in settling the initial suit, the plaintiff in the malicious prosecution case is presumed to concede the existence of probable cause for the former action and therefore is not entitled to prevail on his or her action. Whatever the validity of that rule in the state law context (and however the Board action may resemble one for malicious prosecution), it should not be applied in the instant case to foreclose the Board from vindicating the Act's policies against an employer's taking coercive, retaliatory action against its employees for the exercise of their statutory rights. As appears to be borne out by the void in the settlement agreement here, there is no assurance that this Federal interest will be taken into account when the parties agree simply to dismiss the claims and possible counterclaims in the employer's state lawsuit. A defending employee may well be glad simply to see the state suit dismissed, without regard to the Labor Act's policies of deterring such misconduct in the future and of making the aggrieved employee whole for his or her losses. Thus, the result that we reach in this case today with respect to the settlement issue, does not represent a retreat from the Board's strong policy favoring settlements. I would view it as simply insisting that all the appropriate interests be consciously considered in compromising the claims.

[4] See Bill Johnson's Restaurants, supra, 461 U.S. at 747 fn. 14, noting that "[t]he Board's power to take such action [against retaliatory lawsuits] is not limited by the availability to injured employees of a state-court malicious prosecution or other action."

WE WILL NOT file or maintain baseless lawsuits against employees in retaliation for their engaging in protected concerted activities.

WE WILL NOT in any like or related manner interfere with, restrain, or coerce you in the exercise of the rights guaranteed you by Section 7 of the Act.

WE WILL reimburse Myrland R. Helton, and all other named party defendants, for legal expenses up to a maximum of $8000 incurred in defense of the business interference claim of our lawsuit styled as *Bill Johnson's Restaurants v. BILL JOHNSON'S RESTAURANTS, INC.

Northern Illinois Terrazzo & Tile Company and Tile, Marble, Terrazzo Finishers, Shopworkers & Granite Cutters International Union, Local No. 47, AFL–CIO. Case 30–CA–9578

July 29, 1988

DECISION AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN STEPHENS AND MEMBERS JOHANSEN AND BABSON

On January 20, 1988, Administrative Law Judge Michael O. Miller issued the attached decision. The Respondent filed exceptions and a supporting brief. The General Counsel filed an answering brief.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the decision and the record in light of the exceptions and briefs and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings, and conclusions as modified,[1] and to adopt the recommended Order.

ORDER

The National Labor Relations Board adopts the recommended Order of the administrative law judge and orders that the Respondent, Northern Illinois Terrazzo & Tile Company, Rockford, Illinois, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall take the action set forth in the Order.

[1] The Respondent excepted, inter alia, to the judge's finding that the Union's March 20, 1984 letter to the Respondent was unambiguous. In adopting the judge's finding that the letter did not operate as a notice to terminate the area 1 agreement, we find that the letter in itself may have been ambiguous but that any ambiguity was easily clarified by reference to the area 1 agreement in the Respondent's possession.

The Respondent also excepted to the judge's finding that the Union's June 14, 1984 letter to the Respondent did not prevent the area 1 agreement from rolling over on May 31, 1985, because it was untimely. We agree with the judge that this letter did not prevent the agreement from rolling over on May 31, 1985. In doing so, however, we find that the language of the letter, which simply refers to current changes in wages and benefits pursuant to the new association agreement, cannot be construed as a notice to terminate or as a request to modify the rolled-over contract as of a date almost 1 year later.

We, therefore, agree with the judge that the cases cited by the Respondent, Champaign County Contractors Assn., 210 NLRB 467 (1974), and Oakland Press Co., 229 NLRB 476 (1977), are inapposite, although not for the same reason. Thus, regardless of the timeliness of the Union's letter, in those cases unlike here, the language of the documents could be construed as expressing an effective notice to terminate an existing contract.

Chairman Stephens notes that the Respondent has implicitly conceded that, if its argument based on the March 1984 letter is rejected, then it would be bound by the area 1 agreement at least until May 31, 1985.

Paul Bosanac, Esq., for the General Counsel.
Greg A. Cheney, Esq., of Rockford, Illinois, for the Respondent.
James Judziewicz, of Milwaukee, Wisconsin, for the Charging Party.

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

MICHAEL O. MILLER, Administrative Law Judge. This case was heard in Milwaukee, Wisconsin, on October 26, 1987, based on an unfair labor practice charge filed by Tile, Marble, Terrazzo Finishers, Shopworkers & Granite Cutters International Union, Local No. 47, AFL–CIO (Local 47 or the Union), on April 24, 1987, and a complaint issued by the Regional Director for Region 30 of the National Labor Relations Board (the Board) on June 17, 1987. The complaint alleges that Northern Illinois Terrazzo & Tile Company (Respondent) violated Section 8(a)(1) and (5) of the National Labor Relations Act (the Act), by refusing to furnish the Union with information necessary and relevant to collective bargaining. Respondent's timely filed answer denies the commision of any unfair labor practices.

All parties were afforded full opportunity to examine and cross-examine witnesses, argue orally, and submit briefs. Briefs, which have been carefully considered, were submitted by the General Counsel and the Respondent.

Based on the entire record, including my observation of the demeanor of the witnesses, I make the following

FINDINGS OF FACT

I. THE RESPONDENT'S BUSINESS AND THE UNION'S LABOR ORGANIZATION STATUS—PRELIMINARY CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

Respondent is a corporation with an office and place of business in Rockford, Illinois, where it is engaged as a construction industry employer in the business of hard tile contracting. Jurisdiction is not in issue. The complaint alleges, Respondent admits, and I find and conclude that Respondent is, and has been at all times material, an employer engaged in commerce and in operations affecting commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act.

The complaint alleges, Respondent admits, and I find and conclude that the Union is, and has been at all times material, a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

II. THE UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICE

A. The Union and its Jurisdiction

The Union, with about 100 active members, represents employees who perform tile, hard tile, marble, and terrazzo work, assisting tile layers, terrazzo mechanics, and marble masons in the State of Wisconsin. James Judziewicz is its business representative, president, secretary, and treasurer.

For collective-bargaining purposes, the Union has divided Wisconsin into two areas. Area 1 includes all the State except the counties in the southeast corner. Within area 1, the Union bargains with the Madison Area Ceramic Tile Contractors Association for a contract that covers hard tile, terrazzo, and marble work. In 1984, that Association had seven to nine members; it now has five to seven. About 30 independents, employers who are not members of the Association, also sign the area agreement.

Area 2 encompasses the southeastern portion of the State, encompassing Milwaukee, Sheboygan, Racine, Kenosha, and adjacent counties. Within area 2, the Union negotiates with the six-member Milwaukee Contractors Association for three separate agreements covering hard tile, ceramic tile, and terrazzo. Twenty to twenty-five independent employers also sign the area 2 agreements.

At issue is whether Respondent was party to the area 1 contract after its May 31, 1984 expiration date.[1]

B. Respondent's Relations with the Union

As noted, Respondent is a ceramic tile, terrazzo, and marble contractor with its business located in Rockford, Illinois. It has a work force of 15 to 20 employees, only 1 or 2 of whom may be working in Wisconsin, within the jurisdiction of Local 47, at any given time. In the course of its business, it contracts to provide either materials or labor, or both. Its president is Louis D'Agnolo.

In 1981, Judziewicz learned that Respondent was performing hard tile work on a Beloit, Wisconsin shopping center within area 2. On January 24, 1981, he requested that Respondent sign the area 2 agreement, enclosing a copy of that contract, a map of the Union's jurisdiction, the wage scales, and remittance forms. The contract was returned signed by D'Agnolo on Feburary 2, 1981. That contract had a term of June 1, 1980, through June 1, 1982, but provided, in article XIX, that it would continue "from year to year thereafter, unless terminated by written notice (by certified mail) given by either party to the other not less that ninety (90) days prior to said expiration date, or any anniversary thereof." (Jt. Exh. 1; G.C. Exh. 2.)

Similarly, on September 29, 1981, having noted that Respondent was performing work within area 1 at the University of Wisconsin, in Platteville, Judziewicz asked Respondent to sign the 1981–1984 area 1 contract. Respondent signed and returned that agreement on November 8, 1982. The area 1 contract had a May 31, 1984 expiration date and, in article XV, included the same continuation language as the area 2 agreement. (G.C. Exh. 4.)

On January 24, 1984, D'Agnolo signed the 1982–1984 Terrazzo Helpers' agreement for area 2. Although the contract contained, in article XXIV, the same continuation language as the 1980–1982 Tile Helpers' agreement, D'Agnolo specified in writing on the signature page that Respondent was only bound through the June 30, 1984 expiration date. (G.C. Exh. 5.)

C. 1984 Negotiations and Renewals

On March 20, 1984, the Union sent notices of contract termination to various contractors, including Respondent. Although that notice did not specify by area the contract to which it pertained, it expressly referred to the 1982–1984 contract that expired on June 30, 1984, which set forth its termination language in article XXIV. Comparison of that letter with the various contracts establishes that it could only have been referring to the area 2 Terrazzo Helpers' agreement, referred to above. (R. Exh. 1; G.C. Exh. 5.)

Sometime in 1984, the Union also sent timely notices of contract termination to the employer associations in areas 1 and 2; other than the March 20, 1984 letter referred to above, no such notices were sent to the independent employers in either area. Sometime prior to June 8, 1984, agreement was reached with the Madison Area Tile Contractors (area 1) and, on June 8, notice of that agreement and its improved benefits was sent to the independent contractors who had signed the prior agreement, including Respondent. (G.C. Exh. 10.) Similarly, the Union and the Milwaukee Contractors Association reached agreements covering the ceramic, hard tile, and terrazzo work in area 2.

On June 14, 1984, the Union sent a letter to Respondent and other independents, requesting that they sign and return offer sheets for both the area 1 and area 2 agreements that had been reached with the employer associations. (G.C. Exhs. 7a–d.) Either shortly before or soon after he received that letter, D'Agnolo had an early morning telephone conversation with Judziewicz. In that conversation, D'Agnolo stated that he would sign the area 2 contract, but would discuss a contract in area 1 at such time as he had work within that area. He told Judziewiez that he would not sign an area 1 agreement at that time because he often found himself competing at a disadvantage with nonsignatory contractors when he was working in area 1. D'Agnolo signed the offer sheet and contract for the Tile Helpers in area 2, but did not sign either an offer sheet or a contract with the Union for area 1.[2]

On November 29, 1984, Judziewicz sent Respondent a letter listing the hourly wage and benefits rates applicable to the area 1 contract "effective December 1, 1984 through May 31, 1985 as per the current 1984–1987 Working Agreement." He sent Respondent a similar letter setting forth the area 1 wages and benefits for the period of June 1, 1985, through May 31, 1986, on May 24, 1985. There is no indication in this record that Respondent replied to these letters or implemented any of the changes.

D. The Requests for Information

About March 1986, Judziewicz learned that Respondent was working on a project near Stevens Point, Wisconsin, within area 1. He called D'Agnolo and was told that Respondent was only supplying materials. In that conversation, as Judziewicz recalled it,[3] D'Agnolo

[1] The complaint alleged refusals to furnish information with respect to work performed in both areas 1 and 2. The parties reached a stipulation with respect to area 2 and that is no longer at issue.

[2] Judziewicz did not recall any such conversation, but he did not expressly deny that it had occurred. Noting that Judziewicz referred to a telephone conversation of the prior week in his June 14 letter, and noting further that he admitted that his coverage of the entire State of Wisconsin spread him very thin, I must conclude that D'Agnolo's recollection is more accurate than that of Judziewicz.

[3] D'Agnolo disputed the existence of this phone conversation, but it is consistent with the correspondence that followed.

denied that Respondent had a contract with the Union in area 1. Judziewicz suggested that he check his files.

On March 7, 1986, Judziewicz wrote Respondent, advising that the Union considered Respondent bound to the terms of the area 1 working agreement and expected Respondent to comply with its terms. The Union offered to provide Respondent with the names of contractors who were signatory to that agreement with whom it could subcontract for labor. On March 11, Respondent's attorney, Greg Cheney, replied, again denying the existence of any contractual relationship and suggesting that the Union take its contentions to the AFL–CIO Jurisdictional Disputes board. On March 13, Judziewicz sent Cheney a copy of article XV of the area 1 agreement, the "roll-over" clause. On March 21, Cheney replied to the Union's lawyer, Matthew Robbins, asserting that Judziewicz's letter of March 20, 1984, had ever been reached. (G.C. Exhs. 11(a)–(d).)

On March 26, 1986, Robbins wrote Cheney, asserting that the March 20, 1984 letter only pertained to the area 2 contract; the 1981–1984 area 1 agreement, he wrote, was never terminated and continued in effect from year to year. He demanded compliance with the terms of that agreement. On April 4, 1986, Cheney demanded documentation to support the Union's claim. (G.C. Exhs. 11(e)–(f).)

On May 28, 1986, the Union filed a grievance alleging that Respondent had violated the subcontracting provisions of the area 1 agreement. On the same date, it also wrote Respondent, asserting that its belief that Respondent had violated the agreement derived from Respondent's "conduct of subletting work covered by our agreement to a non-signatory contractor." Further asserting a need based on its collective-bargaining responsibilities, the Union demanded the following information for the period of June 1, 1984, to the present:

> Payroll records, tax forms, and travel expense information; time cards for all employees; history of subcontracting; all contracts with others to perform hard or composition tile work; records pertaining to the purchase of materials to fulfill committments to customers; and billings and receipts for contracted work. [G.C. Exhs. 11(g)–(h).]

On June 25, 1986, Cheney supplied the Union with copies of the subcontracting agreement between Sjostorm & Sons, Inc., the general contractor on the Stevens Point project, and Wausau Tile, Sjostorm's subcontractor for the furnishing and installation of ceramic and 5-percent guarry tile. Also provided was the agreement between Respondent and Wausau Tile in which Respondent contracted to share profits or losses on that job and to provide materials. That contract stated:

> It is the intent that all labor be furnished through WAUSAU, but if for some reason the progress schedule cannot be met, it is hereby agreed that both parties will do whatever is necessary to properly man the job. [G.C. Exh. 11(i).]

On March 5, 1987, the Union again demand to meet with respect to its grievance and repeated its demand for information. In the letter (G.C. Exh. 12), the Union asserted that its belief that Respondent had violated both the area 1 and area 2 agreements emanated from work done by Respondent on Beloit College and the Rock County Correctional Institution. At hearing, the Union also asserted that other contract violations by Respondent, at least one of which had been the subject of a grievance settled favorably to the Union, gave it cause to believe that Respondent was violating its contractual obligations.

Respondent did not provide the Union with the requested information.

E. Analysis and Conclusions

1. The continuation of a collective-bargaining relationship in area 1

In John Deklewa & Sons, 282 NLRB 1375, 1377–1378 (1987), the Board overruled earlier precedent governing 8(f) cases[4] and held:

> (1) a collective-bargaining agreement permitted by Section 8(f) shall be enforceable through the mechanisms of Section 8(a)(5) . . . and (4) upon the expiration of such agreements, the signatory union will enjoy no presumption of majority status, and either party may repudiate the 8(f) bargaining relationship.

See also W. B. Skinner, Inc., 283 NLRB 989 (1987), in which the Board, finding no repudiation of an 8(f) agreement, found Section 8(a)(5) violated by the employer's refusal to furnish requested information.

Respondent, by virtue of a prehire agreement, was party to the 1981 through May 31, 1984 area 1 agreement with the Union. That contract provided that it would contiue in force and effect after May 31, 1984, unless written notice was given by either at least 90 days in advance of the termination date. The first question to be resolved here is whether that relationship did, in fact, continue after May 31, 1984. The General Counsel asserting that neither party gave timely notice to the other of an intent to terminate or modify that agreement, argues that it did. Respondent contends that the Union terminated the agreement as of either May 31, 1984, or May 31, 1985. The record compels me to agree with the General Counsel.

Respondent's first contention is that the Union's letter of March 20, 1984, was ambiguous and was reasonably construed by D'Agnolo as terminating the area 1 and area 2 agreements. This construction it without merit. That letter, although not expressly specifying by area the agreement to which it applied, twice refers to the 1982–1984 agreement in the singular and identifies it by its 2-year term, its expiration date, June 30, 1984, and its duration of agreement article within that contract, which provides for termination or automatic renewal, article XXIV. Only the area 2 Terrazzo Helpers' agreement bears those identifying characterisfics. The area 1 agreement had a 3-year term, June 1, 1981, through May 31, 1984, and only 15 articles; the duration of agreement article was article XV. I find no ambiquity in the March 20 letter, which might have lead D'Agnolo to act to his detriment in reliance on his interpretation of it. At most, there was a unilateral mistake as to the intent of this letter caused by D'Agnolo's failure to read it properly and to compare it with the contracts in his files. Such a unilateral mistake cannot support abrogation of the collective-bargaining relationship.[5]

Respondent also contends that the Union's actions, in sending Respondent the offer sheets for area 1 and area 2 on June 14, 1984, establish that Judziewicz also believed that the prior area 1 agreement between Respondent and the Union had been timely terminated. I cannot agree. Judziewicz explained that he regularly let the agreements with the independent contractors "roll over" and then subsequently sought their voluntary consent to the terms of the new agreements that had been negotiated with the Associations because he did not have the time to negotiate with each of them. He preferred the certainty of the continuation of the old agreements to the possible loss of the Employers as a signatory contractor. Considering the nature of the industry and the number of small contractors involved, such an explanation does not appear contrived or implausible.

Further, Respondent asserts that if the 1981–1984 contract rolled over, the Union's June 14, 1984 letter constituted a request to modify that rolled-over agreement and thus prevented it from again rolling over or renewing on its next anniversary date, May 31, 1985. This contention, while interesting, is without merit. In Connecticut Power Co., 217 NLRB 766 (1984), the Board held that a party incurs no bargaining obligation when it proposes a midterm modification of a contract, which contains no reopener language. The other party may accept or reject the proposed modification, but may not compel the proposing party to bargain over it or any other matter. Here, Respondent was free to reject the Union's proposal, but was not free to treat it as terminating the agreement or opening that agreement for further negotiations.[6]

The Union's rejected request that Respondent execute a new offer sheet on June 14, 1984, did not prevent the 1981–1984 agreement from rolling over again on My 31, 1985, when neither party served a timely notice of termination.

Finally, Respondent claims that D'Agnolo's statements to Judziewicz around June 14, 1984, constituted a repudiation of the area 1 agreement as of either May 31, 1984, or May 31, 1985, under the Deklewa principles. Deklewa holds that either party may repudiate an 8(f) agreement on its expiration. D'Agnolo told Judziewicz that he would discuss future contracts when he again had work in area 1. That statements is hardly a repudiation of their existing agreement. Moreover, it came during the term of the rolled-over agreement, and not on its expiration, and was hot the written notice required by the contract.

Accordingly, I conclude that Respondent and the Union had a continuous, unrepudiated collective-bargaining relationship and collective-bargaining agreement in area 1 after May 31, 1984, and through at least May 28, 1986, when the Union made its request for information.

2. The request for information

On May 28, 1986, the Union requested information from Respondent that would show whether Respondent had performed, or was performing, work within area 1, and whether Respondent had met, or was meeting, its contractual obligations to the Union with respect to such work. The Union's request was based on information it had received that indicated Respondent was, in fact, performing such work and on prior instances where Respondent had worked within the Union's jurisdiction without notifying the Union that it was doing so.

The General Counsel contends, and Respondent does not appear to dispute, that the Union is entitled to receive the requested information.[7] I agree. In W. B. Skinner, supra, 293 NLRB at 990, a case involving an unrepudiated 8(f) contract, the Board held that a union that suspected the employer was not fulfilling its contractual obligations was entitled to information necessary to police that agreement. The Board stated:

> It is well settled that a labor organization, in its capacity as a collective-bargaining representative, is entitled, on appropriate request, to information from the employer that is needed for the proper perfromance of its duty to police compliance with a collective-bargainiong agreement. NLRB v. Acme Industrial Co., 385 U.S. 432 (1967). Certain data, such as wage and related information pertaining to employees in the bargaining unit, is presumptively relevant because such data "concerns the core of the employer-employee relationship." Curtiss-Wright Corp v. NLRB, 347 F.2d 61 (3d Cir. 1965). In addition, if requested information relates to an existing contract provision, it thus is "information that is demonstrably necessary" to the union "if it is to perform its duty to enforce the agreement." A. S. Abell Co., 230 NLRB 1112–1113 (1977).

The information requested by the Union pertains to article II, union security; article III, hours of work; article IV, wages (including travel and overnight expenses); and article XI, general and miscellaneous provisions (including hiring and subcontracting restrictions) of the rolled-over agreement.' It is thus information that is both presumptively relevant and necessary to the Union's policing of that agreement.

[5] I note that when D'Agnolo spoke with Judziewicz about the offer sheets for both areas, which Judziewicz had sent to D'Agnolo about June 14, 1984, D'Agnolo did not contend that the Union had terminated the area 1 contract or the collective-bargaining relationship. According to his own testimony, which I credited, D'Agnolo merely stated that he would discuss future contracts with Judziewicz at such time as he had work within area 1. This tends to establish that D'Agnolo was not relying on the March 20 letter at that time.

[6] The cases cited by Respondent are inapposite. In Champaign County Contractors Assn., 210 NLRB 467 (1974), the union timely furnished the employer with a copy of the Federal Mediation and Conciliation Service notice of contract termination and this was deemed adequate notice of termination. In Oakland Press Co., 229 NLRB 476 (1977), the Board found a timely notice to amend a contract to constitute a termination notice, thus satisfying the contract's termination clause. In neither case had there been an untimely proposal to modify an agreement.

Based on all the foregoing, I find and conclude that the Union was entitled to the information requested in its May 28, 1986, and March 5, 1987 letters and that Respondent's refusal to furnish that information violated its obligation to bargain with the Union in good faith, in violation of Section 8(a)(5) of the Act.

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. By refusing, during the extended term of its 1981–1984 area 1 agreement with the Union, to supply the Union with relevant information that was related to the wages and other benefits of unit employees and necessary to the Union's duty to enforce compliance with its agreement, the Respondent has engaged in an unfair labor practice within the meaning of Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act.

2. The unfair labor practice affects commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

THE REMEDY

Having found that the Respondent engaged in an unfair labor practice, I shall recommend that it be ordered to cease and desist thereform and take certain affirmative action necessary to effectuate the policies of the Act. I shall recommend that Respondent be required to provide the Union with the information requested in the Union's letters of May 28, 1986, and March 5, 1987. Inasmuch as compliance with this recommended Order appears to be neither difficult nor complex, I decline to recommend the inclusion of a visitatorial clause in the recommended Order.

On these findings of fact and conclusions of law and on the entire record, I issue the following recommended[8]

ORDER

DECISION ON REVIEW AND DIRECTION OF ELECTION

BY CHAIRMAN STEPHENS AND MEMBERS BABSON AND CRACRAFT

On October 6, 1987, the Regional Director for Region 11 issued a Decision and Direction of Election in the above-entitled proceeding in which he found appropriate for collective bargaining a systemwide unit of drivers and mechanics that is broader than the Petitioner's requested single-facility unit.[2] The Regional Director therefore directed an election among the drivers and mechanics at the Employer's terminals in LaPlata, Maryland; Toano, Virginia; and Eden, North Carolina.[3]

In accordance with Section 102.67 of the Board's Rules and Regulations, the Petitioner filed a timely request for review of the Regional Director's decision. The Petitioner contended that a unit limited to the Eden terminal is appropriate based on the existence of local autonomy, the absence of substantial interchange, and the geographic distance between the terminals. The Employer filed a statement in opposition to the Petitioner's request for review. The Board granted the request for review by telegraphic order dated November 27, 1987.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the entire record in this case and has decided to reverse the Regional Director's finding that only a systemwide unit is appropriate.

The Employer is a Maryland corporation engaged primarily in the interstate and intrastate transportation and distribution of beverages. From its terminals in LaPlata, Eden, and Toano, the Employer operates approximately 51 trucks. The LaPlata terminal, which also is the Employer's corporate headquarters, opened in 1974 and has 66 employees. The Eden terminal, which is near the Miller Brewery, opened in June 1987 and has 14 employees. The Toano terminal, which is near the Anheuser-Busch Brewery, opened in July 1987 and has 23 employees.[4] The LaPlata terminal is about 250 miles from the Eden terminal and 115 miles from the Toano terminal. The Eden terminal is about 220 miles from the Toano terminal. All three terminals are located near interstate highways and major transportation arteries. There is no history of collective bargaining at any of the terminals.

The Employer maintains all corporate records, including personnel files, at the LaPlata terminal. In addition, all corporate officers and directors are employed at LaPlata. The president formulates policies, procedures, and benefits that are uniformly administered at all three terminals, and purchases equipment for each terminal. The vice president is responsible for the operation of the Employer's centralized payroll and accounting office at LaPlata. The operations manager implements corporate policies, oversees the Employer's operations, and has final authority over the hiring of drivers and the disciplining of employees other than for safety-related reasons. The Employer's two safety officers implement safety rules, ensure compliance with Federal and local government regulations, administer safety tests to and conduct background checks on new hires, and make final decisions on the disciplining of employees for safety-related matters. The director of maintenance oversees the preventive maintenance of all the Employer's trucks, assigns to mechanics jobs involving major repairs, monitors major repairs, and makes final decisions on the hiring and disciplining of all mechanics.[5] Regarding the Employer's operations, there is a central dispatch system at LaPlata that schedules the movement of drivers and equipment.

The terminal managers of the Eden and Toano terminals oversee the daily paperwork, take fuel readings that are forwarded to LaPlata, and serve as the Employer's liaisons with the Miller and Anheuser-Busch Breweries, respectively. Virgil Chambers, the terminal manager at Eden, conducts the

[1] On November 1, 1987, the Teamsters International Union was readmitted to the AFL–CIO. Accordingly, the caption has been amended to reflect that change.

[2] The Petitioner requested a unit of drivers and mechanics employed by the Employer at its Eden, North Carolina terminal. The unit found appropriate by the Regional Director is as follows:

> All over-the-road and local drivers, driver mechanics, and mechanics employed by the Employer at its LaPlata, Maryland, Toano, Virginia, and Eden, North Carolina locations; but excluding all office clerical employees, casual employees, guards and supervisors as defined in the Act.

[3] No election was held because the Petitioner did not submit an expanded showing of interest. In this regard, the Petitioner contended at the hearing that its showing of interest was limited to the Eden, North Carolina terminal because Virginia and Maryland are outside of its territorial jurisdiction. Citing John Sundwall & Co., 149 NLRB 1022 (1964), the Regional Director found, however, that the Board has consistently refused to predicate an appropriate unit finding upon the scope of a local union's territorial jurisdiction.

[4] Although the terminal facility at Toano is relatively new, the Employer has operated trucks from parking lots in the area since 1975.

[5] There is some specialized equipment at LaPlata for work involving complicated mechanical repairs.

initial screening for Eden's new hires.[6] The terminal managers at both Eden and Toano assign routine work, such as trailer checks, to mechanics; approve overtime; issue oral warnings; and are consulted with respect to major disciplinary decisions that are made by company officials at LaPlata.[7] The Eden terminal is open for operation 24 hours a day, 5 days a week. Chambers works 8 or 9 hours per day and talks with the Employer's president, Jameson, at least once each day.

The Employer hires individuals from the Eden area to work at the Eden terminal, and employees at Toano and LaPlata are hired from their respective areas. Each terminal employs "road drivers" who operate "sleeper equipment" and are on the road for a week at a time, and "local drivers" who work regular hours and drive only during their shifts. Each terminal also employs driver/-mechanics who operate trucks and perform repairs; the Employer's only "straight mechanics" are at LaPlata. The Employer has uniform job qualifications at all three terminals.[8] A single employee manual/driver handbook is applicable to all employees. Regarding wages, all drivers are paid a flat amount based on the number of loads transported, and all mechanics are paid by the hour based on experience. All employees share uniform benefits, including vacations and holidays.

With respect to job duties, Toano mechanics perform less complicated repairs than do Eden mechanics, who in turn perform more basic repairs than LaPlata mechanics. All employees except for Eden mechanics wear uniforms.[9] Regarding drivers, Toano drivers also load the trucks at the Anheuser-Busch Brewery, while employees of the Miller Brewery load the trucks that are then picked up by Eden drivers. In terms of driver destinations, Jameson testified that due to government regulations that limit daily driving times per driver to 10 hours, local Eden drivers generally drive to either Toano or LaPlata and back, transferring their loads to driver/mechanics at those terminals for delivery to customers. Additional transfers are caused by the fact that Eden drivers make relatively short trips in order to accommodate the particular needs of the Miller Brewery. Further, both local and road drivers stop at other terminals in order to refuel. Regarding the employees' contact with the other terminals, Jameson testified that over 80 percent of the time local or road drivers leaving from the Eden terminal go to or through one of the other terminals. Jameson further estimated that an Eden driver would remain at Toano or LaPlata for about an hour, or long enough to check and drop off the trailer, contact central dispatch, and hook up another trailer for the return trip to Eden. Jameson also testified that 80 percent of the time LaPlata road drivers go through Eden, and that LaPlata local drivers frequently pass through Toano.[10]

The record indicates that two drivers were permanently transferred between LaPlata and Toano at their requests, but that as of the time of the hearing, the Employer had not required any transfers. In addition, although the Employer's equipment is assigned to a specific terminal, equipment has been transferred due to breakdowns and was transferred for the startup of the Eden terminal.

It is well established that, when considering a multifacility operation, a single-facility unit is presumptively appropriate for collective bargaining. This presumption, however, can be rebutted by a showing of functional integration so substantial as to negate the separate identity of the single-facility unit. In making this determination, the Board considers such factors as centralized control over daily operations and labor relations, skills and functions of the employees, general working conditions, bargaining history, employee interchange, and geographical location of the facilities in relation to each other. Sol's, 272 NLRB 621 (1984).

In this case, the Regional Director found that the Employer's operations are integrated and that management and labor relations are centrally controlled, with the Eden terminal manager making only routine decisions on day-to-day matters. The Regional Director further found that all employees have similar skills and working conditions. Although acknowledging the lack of current evidence of interchange between the terminals, the Regional Director noted that the three-terminal system is relatively new; there were two transfers between LaPlata and Toano's predecessor location; and on over 80 percent of the runs a driver will stop at one of the other terminals for a vehicle check, to

[7] Although the central dispatch office sends particular drivers and trucks to the breweries that the Employer services, the Miller Brewery usually calls the Eden terminal directly if a truck that was left at the brewery is ready to be picked up. The Employer's president, John G. Jameson, testified that in such a case the Eden drivers on duty generally decide among themselves who should pick up the truck. Jameson conceded, however, that the terminal manager would have the authority to assign the work in the event of a dispute among the drivers.

[8] Drivers and driver/mechanics must meet certain government regulations, have 2 years' experience and a clean driving record, and pass a physical. Mechanics are required to have experience.

[9] Jameson attributed the differences in mechanics' responsibilities at the various terminals and the lack of uniforms for the drivers at Eden to the "start-up" nature of the Eden and Toano terminals.

[10] Maynard L. Smith, a driver/mechanic from Eden, testified that he had never driven a load to either the LaPlata or Toano terminals. Smith also testified that he has never had contact with LaPlata and Toano local and road drivers who stop at Eden to inspect their trucks.

refuel, or to drop off a trailer. Relying on these factors and citing Dayton Transport Corp., 270 NLRB 1114 (1984), the Regional Director found the evidence sufficient to rebut the presumption favoring the single-facility unit.[11]

We find, contrary to the Regional Director, that the presumptive appropriateness of the single-facility unit has not been rebutted. In this case there is no bargaining history among the unit employees, and no labor organization seeks to represent the employees on a broader basis. See United Artists Communications, 280 NLRB 1056 (1986). Additionally, we find that the Eden terminal manager makes more than routine day-to-day decisions. In this regard, although central management has the final authority with respect to hiring and major disciplinary decisions, the Eden terminal manager conducts the initial screening for new hires and is consulted with respect to major disciplinary decisions. Cf. Penn Color, Inc., 249 NLRB 1117, 1118 (1980).

Most importantly, we also find that there is no evidence here of substantial or significant employee interchange between the three terminals. The Employer's generalized testimony that 80 percent of Eden local or road drivers pass to or through one of the other terminals does not convince us that the drivers here have the same frequency of "interchange" as in Dayton Transport.[12] While at the other terminals, the Eden drivers do not, as in Dayton Transport, temporarily transfer to jobs at those terminals. They may exchange trailers; they do not interchange work. In this case, two employees were transferred between LaPlata and Toano on their requests. The Board has held, however, that employee interchange made at the convenience of employees is "not entitled to much weight in determining the scope of the appropriate unit."[13] 249 NLRB at 1119 (citing Renzetti's Market, 238 NLRB 174 fn. 8 (1978)). Therefore, we find that here there is no substantial evidence of employee transfers, and that there is only generalized testimony about employee contacts.

Finally, although the geographic separation of the terminals is not determinative in view of the nature of the Employer's operation, Dayton Transport, above, we find that this factor gains significance when, as here, there are other persuasive factors that support a single-facility unit.

Therefore, relying particularly on the lack of significant employee interchange, the absence of any bargaining history among the unit employees, and the fact that no labor organization seeks to represent the employees on a broader basis,[14] we find that the Petitioner's requested single-facility unit is an appropriate unit.

Accordingly, we shall reverse the Regional Director and direct an election in the following unit, which we have found appropriate:

> All over-the-road and local drivers, driver mechanics, and mechanics employed by the Employer at its Eden, North Carolina, location; but excluding all office clerical employees, casual employees, guards and supervisors as defined in the Act.

[11] Dayton Transport also involved an employer engaged in the transport of commodities. In that case the Board, reversing the Regional Director, found that there was sufficient evidence to overcome the presumptive appropriateness of the requested single-facility unit. Specifically, the Board relied on the employer's centralized management, the similarity of skills and shared community of interest among employees, and the frequency of interchange of drivers on a short-term or temporary basis. Regarding the latter, the Board found that drivers from one terminal would drop loads at the next terminal to be picked up by a driver there, and would thereafter be dispatched on another run from the intermediate terminal. The Board found that such instances of driver "interchange" between the employer's three terminals occurred about 400–425 times in the past year. The Board in Dayton Transport also found that the nature of the employer's business rendered the distance between the terminals less critical to a determination of the proper unit scope.

[12] In this regard we note that Smith, the only employee witness, testified that he has never driven a load to an intermediate terminal and has never had contact with the Toano and LaPlata drivers who stop at Eden.

[13] The Employer has filed a motion for leave to adduce additional evidence to prove that since the hearing it has eliminated all local driver positions at the Eden terminal and that there have been several incidents involving the transfer of employees among the three terminals. The Employer submitted Jameson's affidavit with its motion. Jameson stated that the Employer decided to eliminate Eden local driver positions in October 1987. Regarding transfers, Jameson stated that Eden local driver Light was transferred to an Eden road driver position; Eden local drivers Mabe and Carter were terminated on November 9, 1987, after refusing transfers to local driver positions in LaPlata; LaPlata road driver Pace was transferred to a Toano local driver position; and LaPlata road driver Tillet was transferred to a road driver position in Toano.

We deny the Employer's motion. In this regard, even accepting the allegations in Jameson's affidavit as true, such evidence would be insufficient to warrant a different result.

[14] These factors were also significant in Penn Color, above, and NLRB v. Foodland, Inc., 744 F.2d 735 (10th Cir. 1984), enfg. 261 NLRB 995 (1982), in which the Board found single-facility units appropriate for collective bargaining.

DECISION AND ORDER

BY MEMBERS JOHANSEN, BABSON, AND CRACRAFT

On October 30, 1986, Administrative Law Judge James F. Morton issued the attached decision. The Respondent filed exceptions and a supporting brief,[2] and the General Counsel filed a brief in support of the judge's decision, an answer to the Respondent's exceptions, and a cross-exception.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the decision and the record in light of the exceptions and briefs and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings,[3] and conclusions only to the extent consistent with this Decision and Order.

The complaint alleges, and we find, an arbitrary failure of the Respondent to inform employees it represents that it had agreed with their Employer that the employees were not covered by a pension plan. Although we agree with the judge's statement that the Respondent's conduct in secretly exempting the employees from pension coverage and allowing the employees to believe for 10 years that they were covered constitutes "an egregious breach of its fiduciary duty," we do not adopt the remedy provided by the judge.

We find that the unlawful act was a failure to inform about pension coverage—not a failure to provide that coverage. The authority of the Board to fashion appropriate remedial orders pursuant to Section 10(c) of the Act does not extend to imposition of punitive or penal remedies.[4] In ordering the Respondent to provide pension coverage comparable to that which the employees thought they were being provided, the judge imposes a punitive order. Although punitive damages may be appropriate in some forum in the unique circumstances of this case, the Act does not designate the Board as the appropriate forum.

Based on the Respondent's failure to inform employees regarding their exclusion from pension coverage, we shall order the Respondent to reimburse the effected employees the difference between the actual cost to employees to obtain comparable pension coverage individually had they been informed of the lack of coverage in April 1976 and the cost of obtaining such coverage currently. This remedy is consistent with the Board's 10(c) authority to order a violator of the statute to "take such affirmative action . . . as will effectuate the policies of [the] Act." This remedy is also consistent with Section 10(c)'s "requirement that a proposed remedy be tailored to the unfair labor practice it is intended to redress."[5] Based on the complaint and the issues that were litigated, the Respondent's only obligation was to inform employees of its inability to negotiate pension coverage for them—the General Counsel did not allege failure to provide that coverage itself.

The judge cites O.K. Machine & Tool Corp., 279 NLRB 474 (1986). In that case the Board reversed the judge's remedy requiring the respondent to reimburse employees directly for pension contributions unlawfully withheld. The Board required that these funds be directed to the pension fund rather than to the individual employees. The judge here recognized that O.K. Machine does not directly support the award herein, as he only provided a "cf." citation. We fail to see any analogy.

Perhaps a more closely analogous case is Teamsters Local 282 (Transit-Mix Concrete), 267 NLRB 1130 (1983), enfd. 740 F.2d 141 (2d Cir. 1984), cited by the judge in his analysis section. The respondent union there arbitrarily failed to inform employees of an arbitrator's decision requiring that they contact their employer at least once a year while on layoff in order to maintain their seniority. The Board, with court approval, ordered the respondent to (1) request that the arbitrator reopen the proceedings to provide for notice to employees and a retroactive grace period for employees who were dropped from the seniority list; (2) post

[1] On November 2, 1987, the Teamsters International Union was readmitted to the AFL–CIO. Accordingly, the caption has been amended to reflect that change.

[2] The Respondent also filed a motion to reopen the record and motion for oral argument. The General Counsel filed an opposition. The Respondent's motion for oral argument is denied as the record, exceptions, and briefs adequately present the issues and the positions of the parties. The Respondent's motion to reopen the record to permit introduction of evidence not available at the time of trial is denied as there is no showing that the documents were previously unavailable nor is there an adequate explanation of why the documents could not have been located at the time of the hearing and, in any event, the documents do not alter our decision in this matter.

[3] The Respondent has excepted to some of the judge's credibility findings. The Board's established policy is not to overrule an administrative law judge's credibility resolutions unless the clear preponderance of all the relevant evidence convinces us that they are incorrect. Standard Dry Wall Products, 91 NLRB 544 (1950), enfd. 188 F.2d 362 (3d Cir. 1951). We have carefully examined the record and find no basis for reversing the findings.

copies of the arbitration award at its meeting halls and publish them in its newspaper; and (3) make whole those employees who lost work by payment of an amount equal to that which they would have earned. In our view the monetary award in Transit-Mix was properly "designed to recreate the relationships that would have been had there been no unfair labor practice."[6]

The judge's remedy in the present case goes one step further than recreating what "would have been." Given the way the General Counsel drafted the complaint, there is no basis for finding that the Respondent should have provided pension coverage. Had the Respondent satisfied the alleged duty of fair representation, there would still have been no pension coverage. No violation of the Act occurred when the Employer and the Respondent agreed to exclude the affected employees. Employees affected by this lack of coverage would have had to find alternative coverage. The judge's remedy requires the Respondent to go beyond the consequences of its unlawful action and is thus punitive. In contrast, in Transit-Mix the consequences of the union's unlawful act was to deprive employees of benefits to which they had an affirmative entitlement.[7]

ORDER

The National Labor Relations Board orders that the Respondent, International Brotherhood of Teamsters, Chauffeurs, Warehousemen and Helpers of America, Local Union No. 469, AFL–CIO, Newark, New Jersey, its officers, agents, and representatives, shall

1. Cease and desist from

(a) Inducing employees to become members or to change their employment status by assuring them of contractual pension coverage while permitting their Employer to avoid such coverage for them.

(b) In any like or related manner restraining or coercing employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them by Section 7 of the Act.

2. Take the following affirmative action necessary to effectuate the policies of the Act.

(a) Reimburse the owner-drivers of Coastal Tank Lines who were employed at its Woodbridge (Avenel) terminal in the manner set forth above in this decision.

(b) Post at their business office, meetings halls, and at all places where notice to members are customarily posted copies of the attached notice marked "Appendix."[8] Copies of the notice, on forms provided by the Regional Director for Region 22, after being signed by the Respondent's authorized representative, shall be posted by the Respondent immediately upon receipt and maintained for 60 consecutive days in conspicuous places including all places where notices to members are customarily posted. Reasonable steps shall be taken by the Respondent to ensure that the notices are not altered, defaced, or covered by any other material.

(c) Mail to each owner-driver a copy of the attached Appendix. Copies of the notice shall be provided by the Regional Director for Region 22, and shall be signed by the Respondent's authorized representative.

(d) Notify the Regional Director in writing within 20 days from the date of this Order what steps the Respondent has taken to comply.

IT IS FURTHER ORDERED that the allegation in paragraph 12 of the complaint is dismissed.

[6] Franks v. Bowman Transportation Co., 424 U.S. 747, 769 (1976).

[7] The judge also cites Service Employees Local 3036 (Linden Maintenance), 280 NLRB 995 (1986), in which the Board ordered a make-whole remedy for the failure to process a grievance. As we have explained, however, the judge's remedy here made the employees more than whole for the failure to inform.

Member Cracraft notes that she would find a remedy such as the one given in Local 3036, supra, to be speculative and punitive, unless the General Counsel showed the grievance was meritorious.

[8] If this Order is enforced by a judgment of a United States court of appeals, the words in the notice reading "Posted by Order of the National Labor Relations Board" shall read "Posted Pursuant to a Judgment of the United States Court of Appeals Enforcing an Order of the National Labor Relations Board."

APPENDIX

NOTICE TO MEMBERS
POSTED BY ORDER OF THE
NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS BOARD
An Agency of the United States Government

The National Labor Relations Board has found that we violated the National Labor Relations Act and has ordered us to post and abide by this notice.

WE WILL NOT induce employees to join our union or to change their employment status by assuring them that they are covered by a pension fund under a collective-bargaining agreement when, in fact, they are not.

WE WILL NOT in any like or related manner restrain or coerce you in the exercise of the rights guaranteed you by Section 7 of the Act.

WE WILL reimburse all owner-drivers of Coastal Tank Lines who were employed at its Woodbridge (Avenel), New Jersey terminal for the difference between the actual cost to employees to acquire comparable pension coverage individually had they been informed of the lack of such coverage in April 1976 and the cost of obtaining such coverage currently.

INTERNATIONAL BROTHERHOOD OF TEAMSTERS, CHAUFFEURS, WAREHOUSEMEN AND HELPERS OF AMERICA, LOCAL UNION NO. 469, AFL–CIO

Gary A. Carlson, Esq., for the General Counsel.
Timothy R. Hott, Esq. (Hott, Margolis & Hernandez), of Jersey City, New Jersey, for the Respondent.

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

JAMES F. MORTON, Administrative Law Judge. The complaint alleges that International Brotherhood of Teamsters, Chauffeurs, Warehousemen and Helpers of America, Local Union No. 469, AFL–CIO (Respondent), has engaged in unfair labor paractices in violation of Section 8(b)(1)(A) of the National Labor Relations Act (the Act). Specifically, Respondent is alleged to have arbitrarily failed, for almost a 10-year period, to inform employees it represents that it had agreed with their employer that they were no longer to be covered by a pension plan. Respondent is also alleged to have arbitrarily failed to process a grievance of one of those employees over the failure of their employer to contribute to the pension fund on behalf of the grievant. Respondent's answer placed those allegations in issue and averred, inter alia, that the provisions of Section 10(b) of the Act bar further proceedings in this case.

I heard this case in Newark, New Jersey, on 4 and 5 August, 1986.

On the entire record, including my observation of the demeanor of the witnesses, and after due consideration of the briefs filed by the General Counsel and by Respondent, I make the following

FINDINGS OF FACT

I. JURISDICTION AND LABOR ORGANIZATION STATUS

The pleadings establish, and I find, that Coastal Tank Lines, Inc. (Coastal) is engaged in the business of transporting freight. Its operations meet the Board's standard for the assertion of jurisdiction.

The pleadings also disclose that Respondent is a labor organization as defined in Section 2(5) of the Act.

II. THE ALLEGED UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

A. Background

In or about 1969, Coastal had a freight terminal in Woodbridge, New Jersey. Drivers on its payroll were represented by Respondent. Coastal also used the services there of about 24 owner-operators who were unrepresented. It is this latter group of drivers who are involved in the instant case.

In early 1976, Coastal expanded its operations at the terminal by its purchase of a competitor, P. B. Mutrie Motor Transportation, Inc. and by adding Mutrie drivers to the unit represented by Respondent. Coastal also took steps then to restructure the arrangement it had with the owner-operators.

B. Initial Contract Covering the Owner-Operators

Coastal posted a notice at the Woodbridge terminal informing those owner-operators that it would meet with them in late January of that year to discuss the impact of the Mutrie merger. That meeting was held at a restaurant close to the Woodbridge terminal. Present at that meeting for Coastal were its area supervisor, Don Woods, and its terminal manager, Glen Austin. No one from Respondent was at the meeting. The Charging Party, Alex Carlucci, testified about what transpired at that meeting; no one from Coastal testified. Carlucci's account, Which I credit, describes that meeting, as follows.

Woods told the approximately 24 owner-operators present then that, when the merger with Mutrie took place in about March 1976, all the owner-operators would be required to become members of Respondent. Carlucci and many other owner-operators voiced objections to joining Respondent. They asked what they were going "to get out of it." Woods responded that they would be covered by the health, welfare, and pension plan provided for in Coastal's and Mutrie's contracts with Respondent and that they would enjoy job security and all the other benefits provided for in those contracts.

About a week later, Coastal's terminal manager informed the owner-operators that William Johnson, Respondent's recording secretary then, wanted to meet with them at his office. Virtually all the owner-operators went to Respondent's offices in early February 1976. According to the testimony of the Charging party, Carlucci, Johnson assured them then that, on their becoming members, they would be covered under the drivers' collective-bargaining agreement for all benefits, including health, welfare, and pension. Johnson testified that he could have had six or eight conversations with Carlucci about the merger but he did not "remember what the substance of them [was]." In response to clearly leading questions, Johnson indicated by his answers that the owner-operators had agreed then to be represented by Respondent; he denied that he made any promises to them to induce them to become members of Respondent. I credit Carlucci's testimony over the vague, conclusory account offered by Johnson.

Carlucci's further testimony as to a meeting at the Woodbridge terminal on 16 or 17 February 1976, which testimony I credit, discloses that various Coastal officials, including Woods, met with Respondent's recording secretary, Johnson, and with about 13 owner-operators. The owner-operators informed Woods and Johnson that they were reluctant to become members of Respondent but that they would join, provided they were guaranteed a contract, the same as that covering the "company drivers."

Several days later, according to Carlucci, a meeting was held at Respondent's office. Present then were Woods and other Coastal officials, Carlucci as temporary steward for the owner-operators, the steward for the company drivers, John Maxwell, and lastly, Johnson, who conducted the meeting. The first item of business had to do with the dovetailing of the Coastal and Mutrie company drivers onto one seniority roster and details of a contract covering them. When those matters were resolved, the participants addressed the concerns of the owner-operators. As to those, Woods stated that Coastal had had a change of mind and decided that it would not give the owner-operators the health, welfare, and pension benefits provided for in the contract covering the company drivers. Carlucci further testified that he then informed Johnson that the owner-operators would not become members of Respondent and that they might, instead, picket the Woodbridge terminal when the merger took place. As noted above, no Coastal official testified. Johnson's testimony was vague, and did not directly controvert Carlucci's account. I credit Carlucci's testimony.

Carlucci filed an unfair labor practice charge in early 1976 against Coastal alleging that the dispatch system at Woodbridge, when the merger was to take effect, would unlawfully discriminate in favor of drivers represented by Respondent. On 11 March 1976 according to Carlucci, the approximately 24 owner-operators met with Johnson who informed them that he had been in contact with Woods. The owner-operators insisted that they had to have a "confirmed agreement that [Coastal] would pay for health, welfare and pension." Johnson made several telephone calls to Woods and then informed the owner-operators that they "have a contract." Carlucci was elected permanent steward and he indicated that the owner-operators had to get written "specific language" on the whole contract. Carlucci requested withdrawal of the unfair labor practice charge he had filed and his request was approved. Johnson testified for Respondent that Coastal did not agree to Respondent's bargaining demand that the owner-drivers be covered by a pension plan. If, by that testimony, Johnson meant that he never had any of the discussions as related above by Carlucci, I do not credit it. His testimony was conclusory and was given in the form of a summary response to a leading question. I credit Carlucci's account.

In early June 1976, Carlucci obtained from Respondent a copy of the collective-bargaining agreement covering the regular drivers at Woodbridge. Under that contract, Coastal agreed to contribute to a pension plan on behalf of those "company drivers." Carlucci also secured from Respondent then a copy of an addendum to that contract which provided that the owner-operators would be covered by the terms of the contract. That contract, by its terms, was scheduled to expire on 31 October 1976.

The owner-operators at Woodbridge since mid-1976 have been referred to as "owner-drivers" to reflect that, insofar as their driving duties were concerned, they were carried on Coastal's regular payroll as its employees.

C. The Implementation of the Pension Plan for the Owner-Drivers

On 21 April 1976, Carlucci received a computer printout sheet from Coastal which showed the Coastal had made a payment of $27.60 to a health and welfare plan and another payment of $98.61 to a pension plan. The printout sheet also disclosed that those moneys were deducted from Carlucci's wages. Carlucci immediately protested to Johnson and to Coastal's terminal manager. Johnson, in Carlucci's presence, telephoned Woods and then informed Carlucci that the deductions had been made in error because Coastal had ageed in its contract with Respondent to absorb the full costs of these plans. Johnson assured Carlucci that he would have his money back in a week. A week later, Carlucci received reimbursement for the sums deducted.

Since then and until December 1985, Carlucci and other owner-drivers regularly received from Coastal computer printouts reflecting that payments were being made on their behalf for health, welfare, and pension coverage. The February 1979 issue of Coastal's employee newsletter contained an article that stated that its owner-drivers receive the same wages and benefits as its regular drivers. Coastal's regular drivers at Woodbridge were covered by the pension plan.

D. The Termination of Pension Coverage

Johnson, who was Respondent's recording secretary in 1976, testified that Coastal had never agreed to provide pension coverage for the owner-drivers and thus he offered no explanation as to the circumstances under which that coverage could have ended. For the reasons set out above, I do not credit Johnson's testimony. No one from Coastal testified as to the negotiations governing pension coverage for the owner-drivers. Counsel for the General Counsel stated at the hearing that he had no knowledge as to the circumstances under which Coastal and Respondent had agreed not to provide pension coverage for the owner-drivers. The General Counsel acknowledges that there was such an agreement; the complaint alleges that, on an unknown date in April 1976 Respondent entered into an agreement whereby the owner-drivers would not be covered by the pension plan provisions.

To establish that the owner-drivers were not covered by the pension plan, the General Counsel placed in evidence various letters, copies of which had been furnished to Carlucci when he had first inquired shortly before he filed the unfair labor practice charge in this case, as to the status of his pension account.

The first letter, dated 2 September 1977, was signed by Coastal's vice president of administration, Woods, and was addressed to Johnson, as president of Respondent. Woods wrote that he wished to clarify the negotiated labor agreement to reflect that Coastal had agreed "that no pension contributions were to be made by [Coastal] for owner-operators."

The second letter, dated 16 November 1977, was signed by the attorney for the pension fund and was addressed to Coastal's attorney. That letter stated that the pension fund cannot accept any payments made by Coastal on behalf of the owner-drivers because there is no written agreement therefor and, further, that contributions previously received on their behalf by the pension fund will be returned. There is nothing in the record before me which explains the circumstances under which this letter or those pertaining to the first letter was written.

The third letter, dated 8 February 1978, was signed by the pension fund's administrator and was addressed to Coastal at its terminal, since removed to Avenel, New Jersey. In that letter, Coastal was advised that its "overpayments" to the pension fund, by reason of its contributions on behalf of owner-operators, would be returned. Coastal was also informed that it was delinquent as to certain contributions for the owner-operators to the separate health and welfare fund.

The next letter is dated 21 February 1978 and was written by Coastal's vice president, Woods, to the administrator of the pension fund. In it he stated that Coastal erroneously paid pension contributions for the owner-drivers and that, "as negotiated . . . [they] were not to participate in the Pension program."

The next letter is dated 2 March 1978 and is addressed to Respondent and to attorneys. It is signed by the pension fund administrator and states that 11 owner-operators, named therein, were being informed that day by separate letters that pension credits for them were being removed based on the 16 November 1977 letter from counsel. Carlucci was not one of those 11. Attached to that 2 March letter was a form letter, also dated 2 March. This form letter had a blank space for the addressee. The body of the letter recited that a copy of the 16 November 1977 letter (described above) was enclosed, that that letter sets forth the reasons why the pension fund cannot accept contributions made by Coastal on behalf of the owner-drivers, and that accrued pension credits were rescinded. No evidence was proffered that that letter was sent to any of the owner-drivers. No attempt was made by Respondent to explain why the names of only 11 of the approximately 24 owner-drivers then were contained in the body of the 2 March letter addressed to Respondent. For that matter, no evidence was proffered that Coastal ever made the contributions referred to therein. The pension fund's records were not proffered to show that it ever credited that account of any owner-driver of Coastal for contributions made by Coastal.

No evidence was offered by Respondent to show that Carlucci, until December 1985, had been informed by it that he was not covered by the pension plan.

E. The Renewal Agreements

The General Counsel offered testimony to show that, in all the negotiations for the collective-bargaining agreements that succeeded the first one covering the owner-drivers, the Respondent led Carlucci to believe that he and the owner-drivers continued to be covered by the pension plan. Respondent offered testimony to show exactly the opposite. The testimony bearing on this matter is now set out.

On the expiration of the first contract on 31 October 1976 covering the owner-drivers via the addendum thereto, as discussed above, a renewal contract was entered into for a 3-year period, 1976–1979. An addendum thereto provided for coverage thereunder for the owner-drivers. The only significant change from the first contact was that the owner-drivers agreed to pay 40 percent of the health and welfare premiums. Carlucci testified, and I credit his account, that the principal negotiators, including himself, had agreed that all provisions of the prior contract, which were unchanged, continued in effect. As noted above, he and other owner-drivers continued to receive regular computer printouts from Coastal which disclosed health, welfare, and pension coverage. On the expiration of the 1976–1979 contract, another 3-year renewal agreement, 1979–1982, was entered into along virtually identical lines.

When the 1979–1982 contract was about to expire, Coastal made it known that it was considering closing its Avenel terminal. However, a contract for 1982–1985 was reached. It provided that all wages, hours, and other conditions of employment of owner-drivers were set forth therein. There was no express reference to pension coverage; there was a provision that Coastal would pay $139.33 for health and welfare and that each owner-driver would contribute the balance of the cost of that plan. Article 12 of the 1982–1985 agreement provides that:

> Employees who are covered by this contract and who are receiving either wages or benefits more advantageous than provided for by this Agreement, shall continue to pay such benefits during the terms of this agreement.

The word "pay" in this extract is, from the context, obviously an error; the word intended has to be "receive."

F. The Closing of the Avenel Terminal

In November 1985, Coastal locked out the drivers at the Avenel terminal. The owner-drivers there picketed for a short while but became disillusioned apparently because Coastal was going bankrupt. It was then that Carlucci first inquired about his status with the pension fund and when he was given copies of the letters discussed above. Carlucci filed a grievance with Respondent covering Coastal's failure to make contributions on his behalf to the pension fund. Respondent presented the grievance to Coastal. Its vice president wrote on 6 January 1986 to advise Respondent that the grievance was denied "as having no contractual support." Respondent wrote to request a meeting to discuss that grievance and two others. The meeting was held on 26 February 1986. At that meeting Coastal's representatives advised that Coastal had never agreed to contribute to the pension fund on behalf of the owner-drivers to Avenel; Respondent informed Carlucci at that meeting that it had been agreed back in 1978 that there was no pension fund in effect for those owner-drivers.

G. The Limitation of Actions Defense

Respondent, by its answer, has averred that Carlucci knew, or in the exercise of reasonable diligence should have known, as early as 1982 and even before then, that there was no pension fund provided for owner-drivers in any agreements between Coastal and Respondent. In its brief, Respondent relies on the copy of the form letter dated 2 March 1978, discussed above in subsection D. At the hearing, it proffered the testimony of an owner-driver, Wayne Langdon. He testified initially that, when he became an owner-driver in March 1977, he told the steward then (he stated he did not recall if it was Carlucci or the assistant steward) that he thought he was covered by a pension plan but was informed, in response, that he had "no pension." Langdon was not asked to, and he did not, explain why he believed he was covered by a pension plan. Later in his testimony, he related that he received regular computer printouts from Coastal each of which had a printed statement thereon reflecting contributions by Coastal on his behalf to the pension fund. He testified that he asked Coastal why that statement appeared on his printouts and that he was told that the statement was there because of a clerical mistake. Langdon did not testify that he questioned Carlucci or the assistant steward about the statement being on his printout sheets. although that would seem most likely for him to do so because he had testified that he was of the belief initially that he had pension coverage and had been informed by one of them that he had no such coverage. Nor did Langdon testify why he did not pursue his initial inquiry to Coastal when he continued to receive printout sheets with that statement. On cross-examination, Langdon stated that he had crossed a picket line set up by the owner-drivers and that, as a result, Carlucci threw him out of a union meeting being held concerning the owner-drivers.

Langdon's account is not persuasive. It appears to be improbable on critical aspects and inherently unlikely on others. Perhaps it is for those reasons that Respondent's brief makes no reference about Langdon's testimony. In any event, I do not credit Langdon's testimony.

H. Analysis

The initial question to be decided is whether the complaint allegations are time barred under Section 10(b) of the Act. Respondent has the burden of supporting that position by affirmative evidence. See Harvard Folding Box Co, 273 NLRB 841 (1984). Respondent states in its brief that "at least a dozen owner-operators did receive" notice in 1977 that they were not covered by the pension plan. In support of the quote, Respondent referred only to an exhibit offered by the General Counsel, i.e., the letters furnished Carlucci in late 1985 by Respondent when he inquired about the status of the pension account. There is no probative evidence before me that any of the owner-drivers received such notice. As noted above, Respondent had offered the testimony of Wayne Langdon apparently in support of its contention there that Carlucci was on notice in March 1977 that there was "no pension" for the owner-drivers at Avenel. That testimony was not credited, as observed above. In the absence of any credible evidence in support of the 10(b) defense urged by Respondent. I reject it.

The complaint alleges that Respondent, for unfair, arbitary, and invidious reasons, and in breach of the fiduciary duty it owed to the owner-drivers at Woodbridge (Avenel) whom it represents, failed to inform them it had agreed with Coastal that they would not be covered by a pension plan. The credited evidence disclosed that the owner-operators at Woodbridge changed their status in 1979 to that of owner-drivers and became members of Respondent on the assurances of Respondent that they had contractual guarantees of pension coverage. The testimony also discloses that Respondent had then made an arrangement with Coastal whereby Coastal was exonerated from making contributions to the pension fund for those owner-drivers, called for by the contract; a contract that called for Coastal to make the same contributions for them that were being made for the company drivers at Woodbridge.

Respondent, as the bargaining representative of the unit of owner-drivers at Woodbridge (now Avenel) is charged with a fiduciary responsibility to protect the interests of those employees, a duty it must discharge in complete good faith and honesty of purpose. Ford Motor Co. v. Huffman, 345 U.S. 330 (1953). Respondent, by having kept secret from these owner-drivers from virtually the onset of their joining Respondent in 1976 until the end of 1985 its agreement with Coastal in 1976 to exempt Coastal from its contractual obligation to make pension contributions for those owner-drivers and thereby allowed them to continue for almost 10 years in the belief that they were covered by the contractual pension fund, has committed an egregious breach of its fiduciary duty. In Teamsters Local 282 (Transit-Mix Concrete), 267 NLRB 1130 (1983), enfd. 740 F.2d 141 (2d Cir. 1984), the labor organization there was found to have committed an unlawful breach of its duty of fair representation by not having informed unit employees of a favorable seniority award and by not having offered a rational basis for its conduct. In the case before me, the credited evidence establishes that Respondent, when the owner-operators were at the bargaining table in 1976, negotiated a pension plan for them but, almost simultaneously and somehow away from the bargaining table, it privately forgave Coastal its duty to make the contractual contributions to that plan. The owner-operators, unaware of the latter arrangement, then joined Respondent as members and became owner-drivers of Coastal, accepting the attendant changes in their pay. Respondent's conduct is more egregious than the conduct found unlawful in Transit-Mix, supra. See also Service Employees Local 3036 (Linden Maintenance), 280 NLRB 995 (1986), for another case where conduct, less egregious than that in the instant case, was held to be violative of the Act. Respondent's conduct, even without a showing that there was a sinister reason behind it, is patently unlawful. I find that Respondent's failure to disclose to the owner-drivers its agreement with Coastal whereby Coastal was relieved of the obligation to contribute to the pension fund constituted a violation of Section 8(b)(1)(A) of the Act.

The complaint further alleges that Respondent unlawfully failed to process Carlucci's grievance against Coastal respecting the pension fund contributions. The General Counsel did not pursue this allegation in the brief filed with me. I find no merit in this allegation. Respondent's brief cogently observes "curiously" that the alleged refusal is "particularly odd in view of the . . . finding that Coastal had no such obligation," a reference to the dismissal of Carlucci's unfair labor practice charge against Coastal in Case 22–CA–14321.

REMEDY

To remedy so patent a breach by Respondent of its fiduciary obligations, I find it necessary to provide that the owner-drivers involved here shall be made whole by requiring Respondent to arrange to provide them, as closely as possible, with pension coverage equivalent to that which they would have enjoyed had contributions been made to the pension fund in accordance with the contract terms as the driver-owners knew them to be. Because it appears that the fund may not be able to accept contributions from nonemployers or employers not under contract, it may be necessary for Respondent to arrange for the owner-drivers to obtain coverage directly or Respondent may provide coverage through a recognized institution. Cf. O.K. Machine & Tool Corp., 279 NLRB 474 (1986). Any controversy arising out of this remedial provision can be resolved at the compliance stage.

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. Respondent is a labor organization as defined in Section 2(5) of the Act

2. By having committed a breach of its fiduciary responsibility toward the owner-drivers of Coastal by leading them to believe they had contractual pension coverage while also exonerating Coastal from making the requisite contributions to the pension plan itself, Respondent has violated Section 8(b)(1)(A) of the Act.

3. The unfair labor practices found in paragraph 2 above affect commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

4. The Respondent did not unlawfully fail or refuse to process Carlucci's grievance as alleged in paragraph 12, 14, 15, and 16 of the complaint.

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

JESSE KLEIMAN, Administrative Law Judge. On a charge filed on 19 November 1986 by Juan Dominguez (Dominguez or the Charging Party), the General Counsel of the National Labor Relations Board by the Regional Director for Region 29, issued a complaint and notice of hearing on 30 January 1987, against Amalgamated Industrial Union, Local 76B and its Divisions, Local 92—Local 76 (Local 76B Division) of the United Furniture Workers of America, AFL–CIO (the Respondent or the Union), alleging that the Respondent had engaged in certain unfair labor practices in violation of Section 8(b)(1)(A) of the National Labor Relations Act (the Act). On 19 May 1987 the Respondent duly filed an answer denying the material allegations in the complaint. The Respondent's answer also contained the following affirmative defenses:

As And For A First Affirmative Defense

Failure to state a cause of action on behalf of Julio Delgado and Rogelio Rodriguez inasmuch as they have not been named as complaining parties in the Complaint and have not charged the [Union] with comitting any wrongful acts with respect to the Union's representation of their rights and interests in the subject arbitration, which is that basis of the instant complaint.

Second Affirmative Defense
Lack of Jurisdiction
Third Affirmative Defense
Statute of Limitations

A hearing was held before me in Brooklyn, New York, commencing on 19 May 1987 and ending 10 July 1987, comprising 11 trial days. All parties were afforded full opportunity to appear, to introduce evidence, to examine and cross-examine witnesses, to argue orally on the record, and to file briefs. Both the General Counsel and the Respondent filed briefs. In its brief the Respondent moves for dismissal of the complaint in its entirety for failure of proof. For the reasons appearing hereinafter, I grant the Respondent's motion to dismiss the complaint.

On the entire record and the briefs of the parties and on my observation of the witnesses, I make the following

I. THE BUSINESS OF THE EMPLOYER

Office Furniture Service, Inc. (the Employer) is a New Jersey corporation with its principal office and place of business located at 47–44 31st Street, Long Island City, in the borough and county of Queens, city and State of New York,[1] where it is, and has been at all times material, engaged in the business of manufacturing, refinishing, polishing, repairing, and servicing office furniture for wholesale and retail sale and rental, to firms in New York, New Jersey, and Connecticut. In the course and conduct of the Employer's business operating during the preceeding 12 months, these operations being representative of its operations at all times material, the Employer derived gross revenues in excess of $4 million, part of which comprised revenues of approximately $460,000 in retail sales, and purchased and received at its above facility goods and materials valued in excess of $50,000 directly from firms located outside the State of New York. The complaint alleges, and although the Respondent denies this allegation, I find that the Employer is now, and has been at all times material, an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act.

[1] The Employer occupies the 10th floor of a commercial building located at this address and its various departments such as the carpentry shop, the welding shop, the sheet metal shop, the upholstery shop, and the refinishing shop are all situated on this floor.

II. THE LABOR ORGANIZATION INVOLVED

The complaint alleges, the Respondent admits, and I find that Amalgamated Industrial Union Local 76B and its Divisions, Local 92—Local 76 (Local 76B Division) of the United Furniture Workers of America, AFL–CIO is now, and has been at all times material herein, a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act. The complaint also alleges, the Respondent admits, and I find that at all times material, by virtue of Section 9(a) of the Act, the Respondent has been and is now the exclusive bargaining representative for the purposes of collective bargaining with respect to rates of pay, wages, hours of employment, and other terms and conditions of employment, of all employees of the Employer in a unit appropriate for the purposes of collective bargaining composed of, "All employees engaged in any and all work that may be necessary in the manufacture and assembly of furniture in all of its branches and all other production work in its plant, excluding clerical help, designers, artists executives and supervisory employees."[2] Additionally, the complaint alleges, the Respondent admits, and I find that at all times material the Respondent and the Employer have maintained and enforced a collective-bargaining agreement covering wages, hours, and other terms and conditions of employment of the Employer's employees in the unit described above and containing therein a grievance and arbitration procedure. Moreover, the complaint alleges, the Respondent admits, and I find that Luis Torres is, and has been at all times material, a business representative of the Respondent, acting on its behalf, and an agent thereof.[3]

III. THE ALLEGED UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

The complaint alleges that about 10 September 1986, the Respondent by certain acts and conduct represented discharged employees Juan Dominguez, Julio Delgado, and Rogelio Rodriguez in a "grossly negligent manner at their arbitration" for reasons that were unfair, arbitrary, invidious and a breach of the fiduciary duty owed the employees it represents, and by such acts and conduct the Respondent has restrained and coerced these employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed in Section 7 of the Act, and has thereby engaged in unfair labor practices affecting commerce within the meaning of Section 8(b)(1)(A) and Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act. The Respondent denies these allegations.

A. The Evidence

1. Background

The Employer maintains a furniture refinishing department as part of its business operations. About March or April 1986, the Employer was approached by one of its major customers, Citibank, regarding an office furniture refinishing job. Michael Marshak, the Employer's president, testified that acceptance of this job would require overtime work by the refinishing department employees in order to meet projected delivery dates and, therefore, although his inclination was to decline the job, he first met with these employees to ascertain whether they were willing to take on this work and the overtime required.[4] The refinishing employees unanimously agreed that the Employer should accept the Citibank job because it meant "steady work and a lot of overtime," and the Employer did so. Employed in the refinishing department at the time were Jorge Zapata, the department foreman, Juan Dominguez, Julio Delgado, Rogelio Rodriguez, Luis Osorio, Thomas Lofton, and possibly an employee named Castillo or Salla.[5] Marshak added that as the delivery dates of the Citibank job approached, it became necessary to have the refinishing department employees work overtime on Saturday, 10 May 1986.

2. The 12 May 1986 incidents

Testifying as a witness for the Respondent, Marshak related that on Monday, 12 May 1986, Delgado failed to report for work. Knowing that he had to deliver part of the refinished furniture to Citibank by 6 p.m. on Tuesday, 13 May 1986, and being concerned that Delgado's absence would cause the other refinishing department employees to fall behind on this work, Marshak asked Zapata, Dominguez, and Rodriguez to work overtime that Monday, which these employees agreed to do. However, both Dominguez and Rodriguez, testifying as witnesses for the General Counsel, denied that Marshak had asked them on 12 May 1986 to work overtime that day. Dominguez testified that on Monday, Zapata, not Marshak, had asked him if he could work overtime, not for that day but on the following day, Tuesday, 13 May 1986, because the Employer had a "large job that had to be done." Rodriguez testified that he had not been approached by anyone that Monday regarding overtime work. The evidence shows that Dominguez and Rodriguez left work on 12 May 1986 at 4:30 p.m., their normal quitting time, Rodriguez testifying that he had done so on Zapata's instruction.[6] Moreover, concerning this, another of the Respondent's witnesses, Union Shop Steward Elmo DeSilva, testified that on Tuesday, 13 May 1986, he was advised by Zapata that on Monday, 12 May 1986, Marshak had asked Zapata, Dominguez, and Rodriguez to work overtime that day, but that Dominguez and Rodriguez had failed to do so although they had promised Marshak that they would. According to DeSilva, Zapata also told him that Marshak was angry about this and Zapata thought that there would be trou-

[2] The Employer employs between 60–70 employees in its business operations.

[3] The parties also stipulated that Jorge Zapata, foreman of the Employer's refinishing department, is a supervisor within the meaning of Sec. 2(11) of the Act.

[4] Neither the collective-bargaining agreement between the Employer and the Union nor the Employer's work rules and regulations require employees to work overtime. Overtime work is voluntary and is paid on the basis of "time and a half."

[5] Dominguez, Delgado, and Rodriguez, the employees who are the subject of the instant case, were all discharged on 16 May 1986, having commenced their respective employment with the Employer on 14 March 1978, 14 July 1980, and in 1973. Dominguez testified that his duties encompassed "painting, spraying, everything," and it is not unreasonable to assume that Delgado and Rodriguez performed the same type of work.

[6] It should be noted that Zapata did not appear as a witness in this proceeding. However, Marshak did testify that Zapata had suffered a stroke in May 1987 and was still hospitalized at the time of this hearing.

ble for Dominguez and Rodriguez because they had not worked overtime the previous day.

3. The 13 May 1986 incident

According to the testimony of Dominguez, Delgado, and Rodriguez, on Tuesday, 13 May 1986, as they were about to leave the Employer's shop to cash their paychecks and buy lunch for themselves and Zapata, they were met by Marshak, who using Zapata as an interpreter, requested that they work overtime that day, which they all agreed to do.[7] This conversation occurred at 12 noon and since it concluded about 12:20 p.m. they requested Marshak's permission to leave the premises at that time to go to the bank and the restaurant, which permission Marshak gave stating that there was "no problem." They then left the shop together.

Dominguez, Delgado, and Rodriguez drove to the bank in Rodriguez' van to cash their paychecks. Traffic was heavy and the bank was crowded, therefore it was about 1 p.m. when they left the bank and went to a Chinese restaurant to buy lunch. On the way they had a flat tire, and Rodriguez' spare tire was not inflated. Rodriguez took the spare to a gasoline station a few blocks away, inflated the tire, and returned to the car. After Rodriguez changed the tire, they continued on to the restaurant where they purchased lunch and to a liquor store for a bottle of whiskey for Zapata. On returning to the shop they met Marshak at the building elevators, and Rodriguez apologized for their late return.[8] According to Dominguez, Marshak told them that "[I]t was fine . . . that we had left late and that there was no problem." Marshak and the three employees then rode the elevator to the 10th floor where the Employer's shop is located.

On entering the shop, Dominguez, Delgado, and Rodriguez went to the timeclock area to punch in, it now being 1:40 p.m.[9] When they discovered that their timecards were not in the usual place, they asked Zapata if he knew where their timecards were and Zapata responded that they were going to have a problem because of their late return from lunch. Dominguez, Delgado, and Rodriguez worked overtime that day until 6:30 p.m. and when they went to "punch out" they noticed that their timecards had previously been "punched in" by someone at 2:18 p.m.[10]

The witnesses for the Respondent gave a somewhat different version of what occurred that Tuesday, 13 May 1986. Marshak testified that after learning that morning that Dominguez and Rodriguez had not worked overtime the previous day, he met with Zapata, Dominguez, Delgado, and Rodriguez in the refinishing department and again explained that a partial delivery of refinished furniture was due Citibank that evening at 6 p.m. and that at some cost, delivery trucks were waiting at both ends to pick up and deliver the furniture. Marshak told them that he was very upset about their failure to work the extra hours the previous day as they had agreed to do and both Dominguez and Rodriguez apologized for not having done so, with Dominguez offering as an excuse that he had an emergency that Monday that prevented him from doing overtime work.[11] After the employees promised to work overtime that Tuesday and for the rest of the week, Marshak admitted that he was satisfied. Marshak stated that he had specifically held this meeting at 11:45 a.m. in order not to interrupt the men at their work, and not at a later time because Dominguez and Delgado "characteristically" left the shop for an early lunch on occasion. Both Marshak and DeSilva testified that this meeting ended about 12 noon.[12]

[7] Tuesday is this Employer's payday and these employees normally use their half hour lunchbreak from 12 to 12:30 p.m. to cash their paychecks at a bank and to purchase their lunches, which they then eat at their work stations.

[8] While Rodriguez testified that he had also advised Marshak that they were late in returning because of a flat tire, Dominguez and Delgado testified that Rodriguez had merely apologized to Marshak for their late return without giving a reason.

[9] Their testimony with regard to the time it took between incidents from the time they left to the time they returned during that lunch period was somewhat evasive and guarded, especially that as given by Dominguez.

[10] Dominguez, Delgado, and Rodriguez testified that employees were not required to punch out when they left the shop to cash their checks on Tuesdays, payday, but were required to punch in when they returned. However, Delgado testified that on occasion he punched out when he went out for lunch and punched in on his return. Moreover, while Marshak and DeSilva maintained that the Employer required all employees to punch in and out whenever they left the shop for the lunch or to cash their paychecks, DeSilva testified that on occasion he had failed to punch out on leaving the shop, but he did punch in on returning. DeSilva's testimony also shows that as a welder employee he performed work for the Employer outside the shop and he would leave the building for periods of time aside from his lunchbreak or to cash his paycheck.

[11] Significantly, Dominguez acknowledged on cross-examination that, "It's possible," that he had told Marshak during their conversation on Tuesday, 13 May 1986, that he had failed to work overtime on Monday, 12 May 1986, because an emergency had prevented him from doing so. When they asked what the emergency was about, Dominguez could not remember. Furthermore, when the administrative law judge asked Dominguez why he would give Marshak a reason for not having worked overtime on Monday, when he had previously in his testimony denied having been requested to do so, Dominguez seemed evasive and did not directly answer this question. Thereafter, on redirect examination by the General Counsel, Dominguez again admitted that it was possible that he told Marshak that an emergency had prevented him from working overtime on Monday, and now remembered that the emergency involved "trouble with my feet." When Dominguez was once again questioned why he would tell Marshak about his inability to work overtime on Monday when not asked to do so, his answers were, as before, evasive and unresponsive. Finally, on further redirect examination by the General Counsel, Dominguez testified, "At no time did I tell him that I didn't work overtime because I had an emergency." In connection therewith, I have considered the possibility that Dominguez misunderstood the questions posed by myself, Chetrick, and Rodriguez because of translation difficulties and/or the questions themselves, but the record does not support this.

Moreover, the time factor in Marshak's story is more plausible than that given by the three employees in that it would reasonably not take 20 minutes for Marshak to ask and receive the employees' agreement to work overtime that day, while it might take 15 minutes for an apology, an explanation, and then being asked and agree to work overtime, this needing translation between the parties.

[12] DeSilva testified that on Tuesday, 13 May 1986, at about 11:45 a.m., he observed Marshak talking to Zapata, Dominguez, Delgado, and Rodriguez in the refinishing department. He walked over noticing that Marshak was angry and speaking in a loud voice, with Zapata translating his remarks into Spanish for the employees. Marshak told them that they had promised to work overtime the previous day, Monday, and had failed to do so. According to DeSilva, Dominguez and Rodriguez apologized to Marshak for this, Delgado having been absent from work that Monday. The employees agreed to work overtime that Tuesday and Marshak seemed to have accepted their apology and their promises to work the Marshak continued that sometime thereafter he left the shop and on his return to the building met Dominguez, Delgado, and Rodriguez at the elevators, each of them carrying a "shopping bag." The time was approximately 2:15 p.m. Rodriguez explained to Marshak that they were late returning from lunch because they had had a flat tire on the way. They all then entered the elevator and went up to the 10th floor. On the shop floor they met Zapata and DeSilva, both of whom were "very agitated" and when he observed timecards in Zapata's hand he instructed Zapata to "punch in" the timecards for these employees, which Zapata did. The time was then 2:18 p.m.[13] Marshak also told DeSilva to find out what actually had happened and then left the area. Marshak stated that because of their failure to work overtime on Monday, 12 May 1986, their late return from lunch on Tuesday, 13 May 1986 (approximately 2-1/2 hours late), and their failure to call in when they had the flat tire to advise the Employer that they would be late in returning from lunch, he decided either on that day, Tuesday, or the next day, Wednesday, 14 May 1986, that he was going to fire these employees.[14] Marshak added that he told DeSilva of his plans to discharge Dominguez, Delgado, and Rodriguez and advised DeSilva to apprise Torres of his decision.

DeSilva testified that after he returned from lunch that Tuesday at 12:25 p.m., Zapata came to the welding area where he worked at "a little after 2:00" that afternoon and asked him if he knew where Dominguez, Delgado, and Rodriguez were. Zapata had three timecards in his hand that he identified as belonging to these employees, and when DeSilva could not tell Zapata their whereabouts, Zapata walked away towards the timeclock area. Soon thereafter Marshak, Dominguez, Delgado, and Rodriguez stepped out of the elevator and Marshak told DeSilva that he was angry at these employees because they had returned from their lunchbreak so late, and he requested that DeSilva and Zapata find out the reason for their late return.[15] Zapata now "punched in" the timecards of Dominguez, Delgado, and Rodriguez, the time being after 2:15 p.m.

DeSilva continued that he and Zapata questioned the three employees regarding their late return and Rodriguez explained that they had a flat tire along the way which caused their lateness. Zapata told the employees that he did not believe their story and when DeSilva checked Rodriguez' hands for grease or dirt smudges, since Rodriguez indicated that he had changed the tire, Rodriguez' hands were clean. Despite the professed skepticism by DeSilva and Zapata, Dominguez, Delgado, and Rodriguez stuck to their story of the flat tire. DeSilva related that he repeated their account of what had occurred to Marshak who angrily stated, "[I]t's bullshit, that didn't happen." Marshak also said that they were constantly doing this, were conspiring against the Employer, and that he had had just about enough, "They're out. I'm firing them." DeSilva added that he asked Marshak to reconsider his decision to fire them but that Marshak was adamant about this.

DeSilva testified that he called Torres at the union office the next day, Wednesday, 14 May 1986, to report this incident but Torres was not there. On Thursday, 15 May 1986, Torres returned his call and, after DeSilva had explained what happened on the previous Tuesday, Torres arranged to meet with DeSilva at the shop on Friday morning, 16 May 1986.[16] The evidence shows that Dominguez, Delgado, and Rodriguez worked overtime on Wednesday of that week,[17] and worked their regular hours 8 a.m. to 4:30 p.m. on Thursday, since Zapata had informed them that there was no overtime work that day.

4. What occurred on 16 May 1986

Testifying as a witness for the Respondent, Torres related that he appeared at the Employer's shop at 10:30 a.m. on Friday, 16 May 1986, and asked DeSilva for a complete account of what had occurred. DeSilva explained that Dominguez, Delgado, and Rodriguez had gone out to lunch on Tuesday, 13 May 1986, at 12 noon and had not returned to the shop until "2:18," and that Marshak was "really mad" and very upset about this and wanted to discharge them. DeSilva also told Torres that Marshak had not fired them on the spot because he wanted to complete the Citibank job before he did so. Torres and DeSilva then went to Marshak's office to discuss the matter. Marshak reminded Torres that he had previously complained to the Union about the latenesses and absences of these three employees and that the Union had done nothing about it. Marshak emphasized that he was through accepting such conduct on the part of these employees and was going to discharge them. Marshak also told Torres that he had asked these employees to work overtime on 12 May 1986 but, after agreeing to do so, they left the shop at their regular quitting time, 4:30 p.m.[18] Torres requested that Marshak suspend these employees for 3 days instead of firing them, but Marshak refused. Torres then advised Marshak that the Union was prepared to take the matter of these discharges to arbitration.[19] According to Torres, he and DeSilva left Marshak's office and spoke to Dominguez, Delgado, and Rodriguez who repeated their account of extra hours needed to complete the job. DeSilva added that when he left the shop at noon for lunch he met Dominguez, Delgado, and Rodriguez and they all went down in the elevator together and left the building, then parting company.

[13] The timecards in evidence of Dominguez, Delgado, and Rodriguez, show a punch in time for that day of 2:18 p.m.

> We didn't get through with the job. I had drivers who were there on the job till 10 o'clock at night. The sum and substance was the job cost us a couple thousand bucks extra. Citibank was not happy with the situation.

[15] Rodriguez testified that when he tried to explain to Marshak why they had been late in returning from their lunchbreak, he spoke to Marshak in English and he did not know if Marshak understood what he was saying. Rodriguez speaks some English but his main language is Spanish.

[16] Torres testified similarly about this conversation.

[17] Dominguez testified that he was late for work on Wednesday, 14 May 1986, and had unsuccessfully attempted to notify the Employer that he would be in late that morning.

[18] This particular testimony was elicited only after Torres' recollection had been refreshed by leading questions by the Respondent's counsel.

[19] Marshak testified similarly about the conversation but added that he had given Torres the Union's copy of the discharge letter during this meeting.

what occurred on 13 May 1986.[20] Torres advised them that the Union was going to contest their discharge at an arbitration hearing and the employees then returned to work.

DeSilva's account of their conversation with Marshak was similar but more detailed. He testified that Marshak was angry, spoke in a loud voice, banged on the table, and at times became livid with rage. When Torres told Marshak that the Union would oppose the discharges, Marshak responded that he did not care and was prepared "to fight" any union action in this regard. Moreover, when Torres and DeSilva advised the three employees that the Employer was going to fire them, they protested the discharge as unfair because their lateness was due to the flat tire.

Dominguez, Delgado, and Rodriguez all testified that on Friday, 16 May 1986, at the completion of their workday, 4:30 p.m., DeSilva gave them letters of termination from the Employer, and both he and Zapata advised the three employees to take the letters to Torres at the Union.[21] They denied that Torres had spoken to them earlier that day.

5. What happened thereafter

On Monday, 19 May 1986, Dominguez, Delagado, and Rodriguez went to the Union's office to speak to Torres about their being fired. They testified that they told Torres the details of what had occurred leading up to their discharge. Dominguez and Rodriguez denied having been asked to work overtime on Monday, 12 May 1986, as stated in the letter of discharge, Delgado advised that he was absent from work that Monday, and all three employees maintained that their discharges were unfair because a flat tire had been the cause of their late return from lunch on Tuesday, 13 May 1986. They stated that after Torres had listened to their accounts of what had happened, he told them that there was nothing to worry about because the Union had faced similar problems before, and after taking "the case to Court . . . had won and the Employer had had to rehire the employee." Torres said that the Union's attorney would handle the matter and they would have to be patient because the arbitration process would take "more or less one, two months . . . two, four months, I don't know how many." The three employees related that Torres had also told them that they had a "75 to 80 percent chance of winning," and then instructed them to apply for unemployment insurance benefits in the meantime. Dominquez, Delgado, and Rodriguez gave Torres their home addresses and telephone numbers and told him that if he could not contact them by telephone then to write them letters.[22]

Torres testified that the three employees appeared at the Union's offices that day about 4:30 p.m. They showed Torres the dismissal letters and Torres told them that the Union had not as yet received its copy of the letter. After they gave Torres an account of what had happened, Torres advised them that the Union would take their case to arbitration, which could take anywhere from a matter of days to months. At first Torres denied that he had made any comment to them regarding their chances of winning the arbitration case. However, when he was confronted with a statement he had made in an affidavit given to a Board agent during the investigative stage of this proceeding that, "I recall telling them that we have a good chance to win the case," he then acknowledged that, "It's possible I said it yes."

Harold Chetrick, the Union's attorney for the past 20 years, and called as a witness for the Respondent, testified that a few days after 16 May 1986 he received a telephone call from Torres regarding the discharges by the Employer of Dominguez, Delgado, and Rodriguez. Torres gave Chetrick a detailed account of the events leading up to the discharge of these employees and Chetrick asked Torres to meet with him to review the collective-bargaining agreement and then decide how to proceed. Chetrick recounted that he then called DeSilva who related a similar version of what had happened as given previously by Torres. A few days later Torres and Chetrick met at Chetrick's office and reviewed the collective-bargaining agreement, which provides for the arbitration of disputes of grievances that cannot be satisfactorily adjusted otherwise. Torres had previously mentioned to Chetrick that these employees had lateness and absentee problems, and when Torres raised this issue in the context of the arbitration, Chetrick opinioned that, because the Employer "never brought them to arbitration" on these prior matters, "all of those disputes involving lateness have been satisfactorily adjusted" within the meaning of the grievance provisions of the bargaining contract. Chetrick told Torres that "[A]s I see it the only issue involved here is whether or not they should be discharged because they came back late from lunch on that day of May 13th, understanding what happened on May 12th . . . [I]s the drastic remedy of discharge warranted . . . . As far as I was concerned this was the basis of the discharge and I felt that that was unfair, on the basis of [what had occurred]."

[20] Torres first testified that in their account of what happened the employees had said that they returned from lunch at 2 p.m. Subsequently he testified that, "They didn't tell me what time."

[21] Marshak testified that he had prepared the discharge letters on Thursday, 15 May 1986. The letter of discharge is dated 15 May 1986, is addressed to the Union, involves "Juan Dominguez, Julio Delgado and Roger Rodriguez," and reads:

> On May 12th, these three were asked to work overtime on a job and all agreed. Yet at 4:30 each punched out. On May 13th, Tuesday at 11:45, I had a meeting with these three and expressed my concern that because they didn't work, a very important job would be put in jeopardy. They all expressed concern and reassured me they would work overtime until the job was complete.
> The same afternoon these three left the building for lunch with out punching out and did not return to work until 2:18 (one hour and 18 minutes late without a call). Each man had a shopping bag in his hand as if he had been shopping.
> On May 14th, the next day, both Mr. Delgado and Mr. Dominguez were late to work. All three have a history of lateness and warnings. As a result of their indifferent attitude to their jobs, to myself and the company, we have no alternative but to release these people from our employ. Our inability to make any impression, coupled with their constant lateness, and theft of time leave me no choice. In addition to the violation in the contract, the example they set for the other employees in the company is very poor.

Chetrick testified that because the basis of their discharge was their late return from lunch on 13 May 1986, he "had no intention of permitting anything to come in involving latenesses, because that is not the issue at this particular arbitration." Chetrick stated that his legal opinion was that the Employer had fired the three employees "because of what happened on May 12th and May 13th," and that the Employer's mention in the letters of discharge about their "indifferent attitude to the job, and . . . their constant latenesses" was merely "windowdressing" to "bolster up the main theme by just showing their general conduct otherwise." Chetrick related that because Marshak seemed to accept the apologies of Dominguez and Rodriguez for not having worked overtime on 12 May 1985 and "was satisfied" by their offers to work overtime the rest of the week, and because their late return from lunch on 13 May 1986 was occasioned by a flat tire suffered on their way to purchase their lunch, the discipline of discharge was unfair. Chetrick added that this was "My legal opinion, my decision, and that was my approach to the case."[23]

Chetrick commenced the arbitration proceeding by letter dated 2 June 1986 sent to the New York State Mediation Board as provided for under terms of the collective-bargaining agreement between the Employer and the Union. By letter dated 18 July 1986 the Mediation Board notified the Union that it had selected Thomas Knowlton as the arbitrator in the matter, and that Knowlton would contact the parties involved to set a hearing date.

Chetrick testified that because the arbitration involved "a very simple issue" he saw no reason to interview the grievants beforehand and therefore did not do so. Chetrick stated:

> Should they be fired because they went out at twelve and came back at two or 2:18, that was the issue, and I felt that no arbitrator should fire a person based on that afternoon, and I felt that the latenesses were not a subject of this arbitration and I was not going to allow them in because they had all been adjusted beforehand. They were not the subject of this, and obviously I didn't want to get that in because that would be more fuel. The arbitrator would say hey, look at the records that these guys had. I knew what Marshak was going to try to do, and now look what he did. This was the straw that broke the camels back. This was deception, this was betrayal, this was backstabbing, and I knew a phrase that Marshak always used in every arbitration, conspiracy. Conspiracy to do him harm. So I did not think it was necessary, really, there was nothing that they could add that would be of help to me, and the fact that there were other people that had been late and they were still working, so what. Those other people, even with their latenesses had not committed this, according to Marshak, dastardly deed of betrayal and what happened on May 12th and May 13th, and I didn't want to get that in. I felt the less in the better.

Dominguez, Delgado, and Rodriguez spoke to Torres again on 25 May 1986 at the union offices, inquiring concerning when the arbitration hearing would take place. Rodriguez testified that Torres asked them to be patient and told them that "it could take a long time." Dominguez testified that Torres had said it would take "approximately a month or two to go to trial." These employees again gave Torres their current home addresses and telephone numbers. During the month of June 1986, Dominguez spoke to Torres on the telephone "about 5 times" and Torres' response was always that this matter took time and to be patient. Delgado related that he had called Torres four times during that month but Torres was unavailable to speak to him each time, and Torres never returned his calls. Rodriguez unsuccessfully attempted to contact Torres twice in June 1986. Torres stated that he spoke to Dominguez over the telephone two or three times prior to the arbitration hearing and that it was his procedure to return all calls made to him while he was away from his desk, as soon as possible.

According to their testimony, Dominguez and Rodriguez met with Torres in mid-July 1986 to inquire about the status of their case. Torres told them that "this took time and to wait." Torres again told them that they had a 75-percent chance of winning the arbitration and that the Union had a good lawyer. Torres denied telling them anything about their chances of winning the case. Rodriguez recounted that he also went alone to the union offices in July to speak to Torres and that Torres reiterated that the employees should be patient, and that the Union's attorney was working on the case. Torres also advised Rodriguez that Marshak "needed Julio Delgado and myself to go back to work" and Rodriguez said that he would be happy to do so. Torres told him he would call him if he had further news about this. Delgado stated that he telephoned Torres on four occasions in July 1986, but was unable to speak to him.

Moreover, Dominguez testified that he attempted to contact Torres by telephone at least five times in August 1986 but was unsuccessful in doing so. Delgado testified that he also had tried to speak to Torres on the phone in August 1986 but was unable to reach him. Finally Dominguez and Delgado went to the Union's offices in August 1986 and in a conversation with Torres were told that the arbitration hearing might take place "in the next few days." Delgado testified that Torres told them that they had to be patient, this takes time but not to worry because they were going to win the case, that they had a "75–80 percent chance of winning." Rodriguez testified that he was out of the country for the month of August 1986 returning to the United States on 31 August 1986.

The Union sent letters to Dominguez, Delgado, and Rodriguez dated 3 September 1986 notifying them that the arbitration hearing was scheduled for Wednesday, 10 September 1986 at 400 Broome Street, New York City, New York, on the fourth floof. Dominguez acknowledged that he received this letter on 8 September 1986, Delgado's letter was returned to the Union by the U.S. Post Office as undeliverable because Delgado was "Not [23] Torres' account of this meeting was very brief and rudimentary concerning detail but did confirm that such a meeting took place and the topic of conversation.

Known" at the address the letter was sent to,[24] and Rodriguez testified that he did not receive the letter until after the arbitration took place.[25] Dominguez testified that on receipt of the letter he called Rodriguez "so that he could call Julio Delgado." Rodriguez told him that he had not received a copy of the letter. Dominguez stated that, on 9 September 1986, he telephoned Torres and asked him to explain the contents of the letter because he could not read English. After Torres advised him of the date and place of the arbitration hearing, Dominguez asked Torres to contact Delgado and Rodriguez because they had not received copies of this letter. Torres replied that he would do so. Torres' account of this telephone conversation was that Dominguez told him that he had received the letter indicating the hearing's time, date, and place and then Torres advised him that the Union had sent similar letters to Delgado and Rodriguez. Moreover, Chetrick testified that prior to the date of the arbitration hearing, he had called Torres and inquired whether the three employees had been notified regarding the hearing date and Torres had answered that they were.

6. The arbitration hearing

Chetrick testified that on 10 September 1986 he arrived at the New York State Board of Mediation offices at 400 Broome Street, New York City, New Y[illegible] at 9:35 a.m. and found Torres, DeSilva, and Dominguez already there. They waited in the reception area a while for the arrival of Delgado and Rodriguez. Thereafter Marshak and the Employer's attorney arrived, "a fellow named Mr. Krupnick." Chetrick related that he now took Torres, DeSilva, and Dominguez into an anteroom library where he questioned Dominguez about the events of the week of 12 May 1986, leading up to his discharge, using Torres as interpreter. According to Chetrick, Dominguez acknowledged that he had been asked to work overtime on Monday, 12 May 1986, which he agreed to do, but an emergency with his feet prevented him from doing so. Dominguez also told him that Delgado had been absent from work that Monday. Dominguez related to Chetrick that he and Rodriguez had apologized to Marshak the next day for not working overtime on Monday and after they told Marshak that they would positively work overtime for the remainder of that week, Marshak appeared to be satisfied and said that "everything was fine." Dominguez recounted what had happened when the three employees went out to lunch, had a flat tire, and returned from their lunchbreak "at two, a little after." Dominguez told Chetrick that while he did have a lateness problem, the Employer had never taken him to aribitration for lateness. Additionally, Dominguez told Chetrick that there was no requirement by the Employer that employees "punch out" when they left the shop for lunch, about only to "punch in" when they returned. Chetrick spent "thirty, thirty-five minutes" questioning Dominguez.

Chetrick stated that Dominguez' account of what had occurred during the week of 12 May 1986 was consistent with what Torres and DeSilva related had happened that week and, therefore, "As far as I was concerned my strategy remained intact and I was going to approach the arbitration in exactly the manner that I had determined ahead of time."

Chetrick testified that after returning to the hearing room, they found that neither the arbitrator nor Delgado nor Rodriguez had appeared and Chetrick called the arbitrator's office and was told that Knowlton was on his way to the arbitration hearing. Chetrick also called the Union's office and was apprised that Rodriguez had mistakingly gone there instead of directly to the hearing. Rodriguez was instructed to come immediately to the arbitration hearing, which he did.[26] Knowlton now arrived and Chetrick explained that only one of the grievants was present and another was definitely on his way there. When Rodriguez finally arrived, Chetrick requested time to confer with him, which Knowlton granted, and he, Rodriguez, Torres, DeSilva, and Dominguez went to the anteroom library where Chetrick asked Rodriguez "the same general questions" he had previously posed to Dominguez. With Torres acting as interpreter, Rodriguez gave answers to these questions, which were similar to those as given by Dominguez previously.

Chetrick then asked Rodriguez if he knew where Delgado was and Rodriguez replied that he did not know. Chetrick maintained that it was now that he learned for the first time that the Union's letter to Delgado regarding the date, time, and place of the arbitration hearing had been returned to the Union as undelivered, and that the Union had been unable thereafter to get in touch with Delgado. Chetrick testified that he decided to proceed with the arbitration despite Delgado's absence, and when Knowlton inquired about this, he advised Knowlton that the Union would make every effort to locate Delgado and then "let [Knowlton] know where he stands."[27]

Chetrick's account of what then occurred at the arbitration hearing was, in substance, that the hearing was held in an informal manner. The parties agreed that the issue involved in the matter was whether "the facts justify the discharge of these two people." Marshak read an opening statement over Chetrick's vehement but unsuccessful objection, which stated that these employees had promised to, then failed to, work overtime on Monday, 12 May 1986, and then had returned excessively late [24] While the letter to Delgado was properly addressed, the Union had failed to include his apartment number. Torres testified that after Delgado's letter was returned to the Union as undelivered, he made several attempts to reach Delgado at his sister's telephone number, but nobody answered the phone.

[25] Rodriguez testified that he had advised the Union that his address was 3032 Atlantic Avenue, Brooklyn, New York. The Union sent his letter to Rodriguez' old address, 87-27 114th Street, Jamaica, New York.

[26] Dominguez testified that he had called Rodriguez that morning, 10 September 1986, and told him that the arbitration hearing was scheduled for that day, also giving him the address at which the hearing was to be held.

[27] Knowlton testified that he made inquiry about the absence of Delagado to both the Union and the Employer, "since it is highly unusual that a grievant is not present," and was informed by the Union that Delgado "had been properly notified of the date and place of hearing." Because Delgado never appeared at the arbitration hearing, Knowlton requested that the Union and Chetrick let him know the reason for Delgado's absence.

from lunch on Tuesday, 13 May 1986, this being done notwithstanding the fact that the Employer had an important refinishing job to complete. Marshak made reference to the lateness records of these employees and his forebearance in not taking them to arbitration over this, and in payment for his goodness, they had betrayed him and conspired among themselves to cause him problems. Chetrick objected to the introduction of any evidence relating to the latenesses and absences of these employees and although such evidence was admitted by the arbitrator, Chetrick brought out that all such prior latenesses had been "always adjusted satisfactorily" between the Employer, the Union, and the employees, without resort to arbitration and without prior layoff or discharge. Marshak admitted on cross-examination that he had discharged these employees because of the "scenario of May 12th and May 13th" and that the Employer had introduced records of their prior latenesses "to show the background of these people." Chetrick indicated that there were some contentious and unfriendly exchanges between him and the Employer's attorney, Krupnick. He added that none of the witnesses were sworn and any "testimony" given was not under oath.

Chetrick continued that he decided not to call either Dominguez or Rodriguez as witnesses because he did not want to open a "Pandora's box" of questions by the Employer's attorney as to their latenesses, "if I started to talk about latenesses, which I did not feel, I'd be waiving the very defense that I thought was critical to the case based on the collective bargaining agreement." Chetrick therefore closed his case with a summation that these employees had been fired because they failed to work overtime on 12 May and returned from lunch late on 13 May and maintained that the arbitrator had to decide on "[W]hether the drastic remedy of discharge is warranted based on this." Chetrick added that the arbitration hearing ended on an unfriendly basis between the Union and the Employer. Knowlton again asked about Delgado and Chetrick told him that the Union would attempt to contact Delgado and Chetrick would then notify Knowlton whether Delgado was to be included in the arbitration award. Chetrick then left the building, leaving Torres, Dominguez, and Rodriguez in conversation together.

The testimony of Torres, DeSilva, and Marshak was, in substance, similar in nature to that given by Chetrick. Both Torres and DeSilva testified that Chetrick had questioned Dominguez and Rodriguez as to the events that preceded their discharges and Marshak testified that he had been in an adjacent room with his attorney and overheard some of what was said during Chetrick's conversation with Dominguez. Torres stated that Dominguez had told Chetrick that he had been asked to work overtime on Monday, 12 May 1986, but could not do so. However, Torres recounted that Rodriguez had denied being asked to work overtime that Monday when Chetrick questioned him about this. Torres stated that the arbitrator was not told that Delgado had been absent from work on Monday, 12 May 1986. DeSilva related that most of the talking at the hearing was done by "Marshak's lawyer" and Chetrick. DeSilva testified that during the hearing Torres "once in awhile . . . would lean over to Dominguez and say something to him," and that "a couple of times [Torres] reached over and touched [Rodriguez] and he said something to him . . . . He was speaking Spanish." Torres added that near the end of the hearing the arbitrator asked if Delgado should be included in the award and Chetrick responded yes. Torres also asked Dominguez and Rodriguez at the conclusion of the hearing, to tell Delgado if they saw him, to contact Torres at the Union.

Knowlton's account of what happened at the arbitration was similar to Chetrick's except much less detailed and with less recall. Knowlton testified that he raised the question of the need for an interpreter because the grievants "were obviously Spanish speaking." Knowlton was told by Chetrick that there was a person at the hearing who was bilingual and who could translate if needed. The grievants themselves did not request an interpreter. Statements were made by the Company, its attorney, the Union, and Chetrick, but Knowlton could not remember if the grievants testified or if Marshak answered questions. The parties respective positions on the issue involved in the arbitration was conveyed to Knowlton by their attorneys.

Knowlton related that, as told to him at the hearing, the grievants had agreed to work overtime with regard to an important refinishing job. They had failed to do so and had thereby jeopardized the job's delivery date. The Union agreed that this is what had occurred. The following day these employees took an extended lunch period, which additionally angered the Employer. The grievants had gone to cash their paychecks and had a flat tire along the way, resulting in their late return from lunch. These details were again not challenged by the Union. Knowlton stated that while he admitted the grievants attendance records into evidence, he paid little attention to them in deciding the matter. After Knowlton was asked to and did read the discharge letter in evidence (G.C. Exh. 4) he was asked:

> Q. Sir, after you read the letter, if you had heard testimony of the three grievants to the contrary of what's in this letter might your decision in the award have been different?
> A. If I believed their testimony possibly.

Moreover, Knowlton characterized the conduct of the hearing as follows:

> It was informal. It was partly because perhaps I was late. It did not follow some of the usual pattern in which the employer states its case and the union answers. Because, A, there was not to many people there. B, I had the impression that neither attorney had had too much experience with arbitration.[28]

The account of what transpired at the aribitration hearing as given by Dominguez and Rodriguez differed substantially from that given by the Respondent's wit-

[28] Knowlton is 78 years old and appeared to be frail in constitution. He acknowledged that the hearing had been conducted by him in a "very informal manner." From Knowlton's testimony I received the impression that he felt deeply the realization that he had perhaps not exercised sufficient control of this arbitration hearing as was his usual practice.

nesses. Dominguez and Rodriguez testified that on their respective arrivals at the arbitration hearing, Chetrick had not questioned them about the events leading up to their discharge on 16 May 1986.[29] Both Dominguez and Torres stated that they asked Torres to translate what was being said at the hearing[30] and had requested the opportunity to testify regarding what had happened, but Torres failed to comply with these requests, although he initially told Dominguez, "Let's see. If it's possible, we'll see."[31] Moreover, the tenor of their testimony appeared to imply some cooperation or collusion between the Employer and the Union in this matter, to the detriment of these employees.[32] After the hearing they spoke to Torres and asked him why they had not been called as witnesses to tell their story and why Torres had not translated what went on during the hearing and Torres responded that "[E]verything was finished and that everything . . . had been said . . . why did we have to testify?" Dominguez and Rodriguez also inquired regarding when the arbitrator's decision would be forthcoming and Torres said it would take "ten days to two months."

6. What happened thereafter

By letter dated 2 October 1986, Knowlton asked Chetrick to "let me know what has been decided with respect to [Delgado's] inclusion in the case."[33] Chetrick testified that he then contacted the Union by letter inquiring about Delgado, and the Union's response by letter was to the effect that they were trying to locate him but were unsuccessful to date. Chetrick stated that he then telephoned Knowlton but Knowlton was not there and Chetrick told the arbitrator's secretary, Josephine, that the Union was still attempting to contact Delgado but had been unable to do so.[34] "Several days" after Knowlton had written to Chetrick regarding Delgado, Knowlton issued his "Opinion and Award" in the arbitration case. Chetrick sent a copy of the decision to the Union and the Union forwarded copies to Dominguez, Delgado, and Rodriguez.

While Knowlton testified that he did not pay "too much attention" to the grievants' attendance records "in his final analysis," the "Opinion and Award" is replete with references to this. The decision reads:

> All three of the grievants were discharged on or about May 15th for various problems arising from their attendance records coupled with their departure from work without notice after they had agreed to work overtime to finish a particular job . . . . The time-record of each of the grievants indicates frequent absences and/or latenesses in reporting. There had been discussion between the Employer, Mr. Marshak, and each of the three men regarding their attendance.

The decision then relates what occurred on 12 and 13 May 1986 (as discussed earlier) and concludes:

> Mr. Marshak had informed the Union of his difficulties with all three of the grievants with respect to their attendance on a number of occasions but these "warning letters" quite obviously did not have the desired effect. In my opinion, there was sufficient cause for the discharge of each of the men.

Moreover, there was much testimony and numerous exhibits introduced into evidence in the instant case regarding the attendance records of Dominguez, Delgado, and Rodriguez and of other employees. In substance this evidence shows that these employees did have lateness and absenteeism problems but so did some of the other employees, at least two of whom worked in the Employer's refinishing department, Osorio and Lofton. I also note that the testimony of Dominguez, Delgado, and Rodriguez regarding their attendance was at times evasive, guarded, and inconsistent with other documentary evidence in the record, such as warning notices and their timecards.

B. Analysis and Conclusions

1. Credibility

The resolution of some of the issues in this case requires a determination of the credibility of the respective witnesses. After carefully considering the record evidence, I have based my findings on my observation of the demeanor of the witnesses, the weight of the respective evidence, established and admitted facts, inherent probabilities, and reasonable inferences that may be drawn from the record as a whole.[35] I tend to credit the account of what occurred here, as given by the Respondent's witnesses, and the General Counsel's witness, Arbitrator Knowlton, although I noted some inconsisten-

[29] However, on cross-examination, after denying consistently that Chetrick had spoken to him at all at the arbitration hearing, Dominguez admitted that "Through Torres a few words were spoken," mainly he told Chetrick and Torres that he wanted to testify at the hearing. Dominguez then testified that he had said nothing to Chetrick because he supposed that Torres had told Chetrick the full story of their discharge.

[30] However, in an affidavit given to a Board agent during the investigative stage of this proceeding, Rodriguez stated that, "The lawyers spoke in English and Torres didn't translate for us. I didn't ask him to translate for me." Rodriguez explained this inconsistency as an incorrect translation of what he told the Board agent.

[31] Dominguez testified that he, Delgado, and Rodriguez had made the same request to Torres when they met with him on 19 May 1986 at the Union's office.

[32] Dominguez testified that during the arbitration Marshak, Krupnick, and Chetrick left the room and then returned subsequently and spoke to the arbitrator. He also testified that after the hearing ended, Chetrick, Torres, and Krupnick had a conversation off to the side and when they returned they were laughing. DeSilva testified that near the end of the arbitration hearing, the arbitrator and the two lawyers left the room for a discussion among themselves. Torres testified that at one point during the hearing Chetrick and the arbitrator stepped out of the room.

[33] The letter specifies no time limit within which Chetrick was to notify the arbitrator about Delgado's status in the matter. Knowlton acknowledged that it may have been an error on his part not to set forth such a date in his letter and before issuing his decision that included Delgado.

[34] Knowlton testified that he had received no reply from Chetrick regarding his letter of 2 October 1986 and although Chetrick had told him subsequently, after he had issued his decision, that Chetrick had spoken to his secretary on the telephone soon after receipt of the letter and told her the Union was continuing its search for Delgado, Knowlton's secretary did not recall such a telephone call from Chetrick.

cies in their testimony as given, primarily in that of Luis Torres. However, on the whole their testimony was given in a forthright manner, was generally corroborative and consistent with each other, and most importantly, apparently consistent with other uncontroverted evidence in the record and therefore most believable. Although I do not discredit all the testimony of the General Counsel's witnesses, yet I found that their testimony, especially that of Juan Dominguez, was at times guarded, defensive, and evasive, especially on cross-examination, and contained inconsistencies with regard to other uncontradicted evidence in the record.[36]

2. The Respondent's affirmative defenses

a. Failure to state a cause of action regarding Delgado and Rodriguez

The Respondent alleges in its amended answer that the General Counsel has failed to state a cause of action on behalf of Julio Delgado and Rogelio Rodriguez, "inasmuch as they have not been named as complaining parties in the complaint and have not charged the [Union] with committing any wrongful acts with respect to the Union's representation of their rights and interests in the subject arbitration which is that basis of the instant complaint." However, paragraphs 10 through 15 of the complaint clearly and specifically set forth "a cause of action" on behalf of Dominguez, Delgado, and Rodriguez and allege wrongful acts and conduct by the Union against all three in violation of Section 8(b)(1)(A) of the Act.[37]

In view of the above I assume that the Respondent means that the General Counsel, in not naming Delgado and Rodriguez in the title caption of the complaint thereby, failed to state a cause of action on their behalf. As the United States Court of Appeals for the Seventh Circuit stated in American Newspaper Publishers Assn. v. NLRB, 193 F.2d 782, 800 (7th Cir. 1951):

> All that is requisite in a valid complaint before the Board is that there be a plain statement of the things claimed to constitute an unfair labor practice that the Respondent may be put upon his defense.[38]

Moreover, it is not uncommon and has been accepted by the Board and the courts, that the title caption of a Board complaint list only the name of the party filing the charge, although allegations in the charge and thereafter the complaint set forth the names of other aggrieved parties therein against whom unlawful acts and conduct has allegedly been perpetrated, and for which remedial action is sought.

From all the foregoing, I find and conclude that the Respondent's "First Affirmative Defense" is without merit and is rejected.

b. Lack of jurisdiction

The Respondent asserts in its brief in elaboration of this, its second affirmative defense in its amended answer, that the "Board must meet volume standards which [the] Board has imposed upon itself as a minimum for exercising jurisdiction" and therefore, because the General Counsel has alleged in the complaint that during the past year, "the Employer derived gross revenues from retail sales in excess of [$500,000]"[39] and "purchased and caused to be transported and delivered to its Long Island City place of business, products, goods and materials valued in excess of [$50,000],"[40] the General Counsel must meet both these standards in order that the Board exercise its jurisdiction in this matter. The Respondent is mistaken in this assertion.

The Board has determined that where a single-integrated enterprise is engaged in both retail and nonretail operations, it will assert jurisdiction where the employer's operations meet either the retail or nonretail standard provided that either aspect is not "de minimis."[41] According to the record evidence the Employer derived gross revenues during the past year of $4 million of which $460,000 was derived from retail sales. "De minimis"? No way! Since the Employer does a gross volume of business exceeding $500,000, I find that it meets the Board's retail jurisdictional standard, and this would be sufficient for the Board to assert jurisdiction herein.[42]

Moreover, the Employer purchased goods and materials from California and Canada in excess of $50,000 during the past year, which were delivered to its Long Island City, New York place of business. Thus the Employer meets the Board's $50,000 direct inflow stand-

[36] A significant inconsistency was Dominguez' professed denial that he had not been asked by Marshak to work overtime on Monday, 12 May 1986. On direct examination he testified that he had never been asked by Marshak to work overtime for that Monday, but instead was requested by Zapata to work overtime for the next day, Tuesday. Then he testified on cross-examination that it was possible that on Tuesday he had apologized to Marshak for not having worked overtime the previous day, Monday, and gave as his reason for his failure to do so, that he had an "emergency." Then on redirect examination, after some effort on the part of counsel for the General Counsel, he stated that no one had ever asked him to work overtime for Monday. The question remains why Dominguez would admit having apologized to Marshak for not working overtime on 12 Monday 1986 if he had not been asked to do so, unless he was in actuality requested to work overtime that day.

Moreover, the testimony of Dominguez, Delgado, and Rodriguez with regard to their incidence of lateness and absences was less than candid, to say the least, and even less accurate regarding their receipt of oral and written warning notices. Their timecards and other documentary evidence in the record did not substantiate or corroborate their testimony thereon.

Additionally, their account of the time it took at each step of the way concerning the incident that occurred during their lunchtime on Tuesday, 13 May 1986, was less than believable and was fraught with evasiveness, their testimony was guarded and, in the case of Dominguez, was given in a somewhat defensive and at times hostile manner.

[37] Moreover, the charge filed herein alleges a failure and refusal by the Union "to represent Juan Dominguez, Rogelio Rodriguez and Julio Delgado, regarding their discharge by Office Furniture Service, Inc., for reasons that are arbitrary, invidious and capricious."

[38] Also see Curtiss-Wright Corp. v. NLRB, 347 F.2d 61 (3d Cir. 1965), in which the court stated, "The propriety of a pleading is today judged by its effectiveness as a mechanism for giving an adverse party notice of the claim upon which relief is sought."

ard[43] and it would assert jurisdiction on this basis. It should be noted that the Board would assert jurisdiction of this Employer under either jurisdictional standard notwithstanding the General Counsel's allegations in the complaint, and I therefore find that the Respondent's "Second Affirmative Defense" is without merit.

c. Statute of limitations—the 10(b) period

Section 10(b) of the Act provides:

> That no complaint shall issue based upon any unfair labor practice occurring more than six months prior to the filing of the charge with the Board and the service of a copy thereof upon the person against whom such charge is made.

Filing with the Regional Director and service on the Respondent both must occur within the 6-month period in order for the charge to be timely. Section 10(b) is a statute of limitations and is not jurisdictional in nature. It is an affirmative defense that must be pleaded and, if not timely raised, waived.[44] The Respondent has timely raised such a defense.

The Respondent contends in its brief that:

> Inasmuch as a copy of the charge in the instant proceeding, allegedly filed by Dominguez on November 19, 1986 was not served upon the Respondent by certified mail on November 20, 1986, the action on behalf of Juan Dominguez is now time barred by the six-month statute of limitations.

The Respondent also contends, "[T]hat it has, unquestionably, been denied minimum procedural due process." I do not agree.

Section 102.14 of the Board's Rules and Regulations provides:

> Upon the filing of a charge, the charging party shall be responsible for the timely and proper service of a copy thereof upon the person against whom such a charge is made. The regional director will, as a matter of course, cause a copy of such charge to be served on the person against whom the charge is made, but he shall not be deemed to assume such responsibility for such service.

As indicated above, filing with the Regional Director and service on the Respondent both must occur within the 6-month period in order for the charge to be timely. Filing occurs when the charge is actually received by the Regional Director or other Board agent. In contrast, service on the Respondent occurs when the charge is placed in the mails or is hand delivered.[45] Moreover, Section 102.111(a) of the Board's Rules and Regulations provides in part:

> Charges . . . may be served personally or by registered or certified mail . . . and the return post office receipt . . . when registered or certified and mailed . . . shall be proof of service of the same.

The Respondent denied receipt of a copy of the charge filed with the Board in its amended answer to this complaint allegation, at the hearing, and in its brief. General Counsel's Exhibit 1(a–i) contains an affidavit of service of designated agent, Lillie Lampkin, which certifies that she served a copy of the charge on the Respondent by "postpaid certified mail" on 20 November 1986. Moreover, this exhibit also contains a green return receipt card for certified mail which shows a delivery date of "12/12/86" and which is addressed to the Respondent. Significantly, the return receipt card is signed by a Ms. "Pietri" who is admittedly one of the Respondent's secretaries. Under the Board's Rules and Regulations the above is sufficient to establish a prima facie case as regards the allegation in the complaint that the Respondent was served with a copy of the charge filed with the Board. The burden of proof now shifts to the Respondent to refute this. Additionally, as regards this issue as it impacts on the Respondent's 10(b) affirmative defense, the Respondent has the burden of proving such a defense.

In its brief the Respondent "[directs the Court's attention] to the fact that the green return receipt card does not have a stamp from the post office which is always present." However, return receipt cards do not always have a post stamp thereon, as evidenced by other green return receipt cards in evidence for certified mail regarding service of a copy of the complaint and notice of hearing herein on Chetrick and Delgado, and service of a copy of an order rescheduling the hearing on Chetrick.[46] The Respondent also maintains that, "Moreover, it is quite difficult to imagine that a particular item sent by certified mail, return receipt requested, would be signed for some twenty-three to thirty days after it was first sent." Yet the Respondent provides a possible explanation for this occurring in its own argument. The evidence shows that during the period from 20 November 1986 through 12 December 1986, the Respondent moved its union offices from Manhattan to Queens in the city of New York. The time lapse in delivery could well be explained by the need of the U.S. Post Office to transfer the certified letter from the Board containing the charge, from the old to the new office location post office for delivery. Additionally, as mentioned by the General Counsel in her brief, the Respondent did not deny that it received some document by certified mail that is represented by the return receipt card in question, but claims that there is no certainty that this card indicates that the document was the charge filed in this case. Aside from the corresponding numbers on the return receipt card and the covering letter mailed along with the charge in the same envelope as is done in the normal course of the Board's Regional Office procedure, the Respondent offered no proof that this return receipt card represented some other document served on it by the Board.

The complaint alleges that the acts and conduct which comprise the unfair labor practices allegedly committed herein occurred on 10 September 1986. The charge was filed with the Board on 19 November 1986 and a copy of the charge was sent to the Respondent by certified mail on 20 November 1986, both services occurring well within the 6-month statute of limitations period. Incidently, actual delivery of the charge was accomplished on 12 December 1986, also within the 10(b) period. In view of the above, I find that the Respondent has failed to sustain its burden of showing that Section 10(b) of the Act bars consideration of the charges herein alleging unlawful conduct on its part, or that its third affirmative defense has any merit.[47]

From all the foregoing, I find and conclude that the Respondent has failed to sustain its burden of establishing the above affirmative defenses, that these affirmative defenses are without merit, and that the Respondent's request to dismiss the complaint on such grounds is denied.

3. The duty of fair representation

Section 8(b)(1)(A) of the Act makes it an unfair labor practice for a labor organization to "restrain or coerce" employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them in Section 7 of the Act, "Provided, that this paragraph shall not impair the right of a labor organization to prescribe its own rules with respect to the acquisition or retention of membership therein."[48] Section 7 of the Act protects the right of employees to engage in union or other concerted activities or to refrain from such activities. The rights protected by Section 7, however, are limited by the principle of exclusive representation set forth in Section 9(a) of the Act.[49] In view of the restraints imposed on individual employee rights by the principle of exclusive representation, the Courts and the Board have imposed on labor organizations a reciprocal obligation of the Act to fully and fairly represent all the employees.[50] As the Supreme Court of the United States stated in Vaca v. Sipes, 386 U.S. 171, 177, 190 (1967):

> It is now well established that, as the exclusive bargaining representative of the employees . . . the Union [has] a statutory duty fairly to represent all of those employees, "and that this duty" includes a statutory obligation to serve the interests of all members without hostility or discrimination toward any, to exercise its discretion with complete good faith and honesty, and to avoid aribitrary conduct. . . . A breach of the statutory duty of fair representation occurs only when a union's conduct toward a member of the collective bargaining unit is arbitrary, discriminatory or in bad faith.[51]

A labor organization that fails to live up to this obligation unjustifiably restrains employees in the exercise of their Section 7 rights and thereby violates Section 8(b)(1)(A) of the Act.[52] The duty of fair representation gives employees a correlative right under Section 7 to be represented without arbitrary, irrelevant, or invidious discrimination by their exclusive representative.[53] Moreover, it is also clear that the duty of fair representation extends to the investigation and representation of a grievance.[54] At the same time, however, the Board and the Courts have recognized that unions must necessarily be allowed a "wide range of reasonableness" in servicing their constituencies,[55] i.e., processing grievances, but in the exercise of that discretion, a union must act in "good faith, with honesty of purpose, and free from reliance on impermissible consideration."[56] Accordingly, a union

[47] As to the Respondent's assertion that it was denied "minimum procedural due process," this assertion must fail in view of the above, and because the Respondent was served a copy of the complaint advising it of the "things claimed to constitute an unfair labor practice that the Respondent may be put upon his defense." American Newspaper Publishers Assn., supra. Moreover, as evidenced by the record, the Respondent was fully aware of the unfair labor practices alleged against it, appeared at the hearing apparently fully prepared to defend against these allegations, and at no time during the hearing offered any proof that would establish that it had been denied its due-process rights.

[48] The purpose of and policy behind Sec. 8(b)(1)(A), as set forth in Sec. 10(b) of the Act, is "to protect the rights of individual employees in their relations with labor organizations."

[49] Sec. 9(a) of the Act provides:

> Representatives designated or selected for the purposes of collective bargaining by the majority of the employees in a unit appropriate for such purposes, shall be the exclusive representatives of all the employees in such unit for the purposes of collective bargaining in respect to rates of pay, wages, hours of employment, or other conditions of employment.

[52] In its landmark decision in Miranda Fuel Co., 140 NLRB 181 (1962), the Board held at 185:

> Viewing these mentioned obligations of a statutory representative in the context of the "right" guaranteed employees by Section 7 of the Act "to bargain collectively through representatives of their own choosing" we are of the opinion that section 7 thus gives employees the right to be free from unfair or irrelevant or invidious treatment by their exclusive bargaining agent in matters affecting their employment. This right of employees is a statutory limitation on statutory bargaining representatives, and we conclude that Section 8(b)(1)(A) of the Act accordingly prohibits labor organizations, when acting in a statutory representative capacity, from taking action against any employee upon considerations or classifications which are irrelevant, invidious, or unfair.

Although Miranda was reversed in 326 F.2d 172 (2d Cir. 1973), the Second Circuit rejecting the Board's premises that a violation of the duty of fair representation constituted an unfair labor practice, the United States Supreme Court approved the doctrine in Vaca v. Sipes, supra. See U.S. Postal Service, 240 NLRB 1198 (1979), enfd. in pertinent part 618 F.2d 1249 (8th Cir. 1980); Laborers Local 300 (Memorial Park), 235 NLRB 334 (1978).

does not violate the duty of fair representation where it refuses to process a grievance pursuant to a reasonable interpretation of the collective-bargaining agreement[57] and/or a good-faith evaluation regarding the merits of the complaint.[58] However, the Supreme Court in Vaca v. Sipes explicitly held that a union will breach its duty of fair representation when it has "arbitrarily ignored a meritorious grievance or processed it in a perfunctory fashion."[59]

Once a union undertakes to present an employee's grievance, the obligation to represent him fully and fairly includes the duty to act as an advocate for the grievant.[60] Moreover, as the Board stated in Teamsters Local 355 (Monarch Foods), 229 NLRB 1319, 1321 (1977), enfd. 597 F.2d 388 (4th Cir. 1979),

> However, the issue here is not whether the Respondent discharged its obligations with maximum skill and adeptness, but whether, in undertaking its efforts, it dealt fairly. The duty of fair representation does not require that every possible option be exercised or that a grievant's case be advocated in a perfect manner.

Thus a union is not liable under the duty of fair representation for mere negligence, poor judgment, ineptitude, forgetfulness, or inadvertence.[61]

The Board as well as a majority of the courts have held that a union can violate its duty of fair representation absent any evidence of bad faith if it is shown that the union acted in a perfunctory or arbitrary manner.[62] As the United States Court of Appeals for the Fourth Circuit explained in Griffin v. Auto Workers, 469 F.2d 181, 183 (1972):

> Without any hostile motive of discrimination and in complete good faith, a union may nevertheless pursue a course of action or inaction that is so unreasonable and arbitrary as to constitute a violation of the duty of fair representation. A union may refuse to process a grievance or handle the grievance in a particular manner for a multitude of reasons, but it may not do so without reason, merely at the whim of someone exercising union authority.

But, as the Board stated in Teamsters Local 692 (Great Western), 209 NLRB 446, 448 (1974):

> . . . it is clear that negligent action or nonaction of a union by itself will not be considered to be arbitrary, irrelevant, invidious, or unfair so as to constitute a breach of the duty of fair representation violative of the Act. Something more is required. [Emphasis added.]

And, in Miller v. Gateway Transportation Co., 616 F.2d 272 (7th Cir. 1980), the Seventh Circuit Court, citing Griffin stated:

> We note also that the duty of fair representation is of special importance when a grievance for wrongful discharge is involved. As the Fourth Circuit said, "A union must especially avoid capricious and arbitrary behavior in the handling of a grievance based on a discharge—the industrial equivalent of capital punishment." Griffin v. Auto Workers, 469 F.2d 191 (4th Cir. 1970).

The complaint alleges that the Respondent represented Juan Dominguez, Julio Delgado, and Rogelio Rodriguez in a grossly negligent manner at their arbitration by, inter alia, engaging in the following conduct:

> (a) failing to give proper notice of said arbitration to employee Delgado so that he could participate in his defense;
> (b) proceeding with the arbitration on behalf of Delgado and failing to respond to the Arbitrator's inquiry as to whether or not he should rule upon Delgado's discharge notwithstanding Respondent's knowledge that Delgado had not received notice of the arbitration;
> (c) Failing to conduct a complete investigation and to conduct a complete defense with respect to all of the Employer's stated bases for the discharge of the three named employees;
> (d) failing to provide an interpreter and/or to translate for the named discharged employees, who did not speak English or understand English; and
> (e) failing to present as witnesses any of the discharged employees to testify as to the circumstances which resulted in their discharges, notwithstanding that they were the only witnesses competent to testify to said events and circumstances.

The General Counsel alleges in her brief that:

> [I]n the instant case, not only did Respondent fail to conduct any investigation, but also failed to act as advocate for the three employees once it was at the arbitration. . . . In the instant case Respondent either conducted no investigation, or if it did conduct one it only got the employer's version.[63]
> Therefore, the only meeting which the three employees had with the Respondent which appeared to have the look of an investigation was the one which took place on May 19 when the three employees met with Torres at his office. . . . In view of the fact that Respondent chose to completely ignore the version of the facts which was presented by the three employees, and to accept the uncorroborated version of the Employer, although there were questions of credibility, the May 19 meeting was tantamount to no investigation at all.

I do not agree.

The credited evidence shows that on 13 May 1986 after Dominguez, Delgado, and Rodriguez returned late from lunch, Marshak asked Zapata and DeSilva to find out the reason for their late return. On questioning these employees it was disclosed that they had returned late because of a flat tire experienced while driving to a restaurant to buy lunch. It should be remembered that DeSilva is the Union's shop steward and presumably at the shop to protect the interests and rights of union member employees under the collective-bargaining agreement, and I find nothing in the record to counter this. Torres and DeSilva met with Marshak on 13 May 1986, after DeSilva had apprised him of the Employer's intent to discharge the three employees, and they sought to change the Employer's mind about firing them.[64] Moreover, DeSilva had previously attempted to save their jobs on 13 May 1986 when he reported to Marshak what the employees had told him and Zapata was the reason for their late return, and DeSilva asked Marshak not to fire them.[65] On 19 May 1986, Dominguez, Delgado, and Rodriguez met with Torres at the Union's office and repeated their account of what had occurred the previous week leading up to their discharges.

Soon thereafter, Torres contacted the Union's attorney, Chetrick, and explained the circumstances of the discharges of Dominguez, Delgado, and Rodriguez. Chetrick then contacted DeSilva and got his account of what happened. Next Chetrick met with Torres at Chetrick's office to review the discharges in the context of the collective-bargaining agreement and to decide what the Union's course of action would be. In view of the admittedly poor lateness and absenteeism records of these three employees and mentioned in the Employer's discharge letter, Chetrick suggested that the Union's strategy at the arbitration be to oppose any attempt by the Employer to rely on their poor attendance records as justification for its discharge of the three employees as being immaterial, on the grounds that the Respondent's failure to grieve their prior incidents of lateness and/or absences, in effect, amounted to a "satisfactory adjustment" thereof within the meaning of the grievances and arbitration clause of the collective-bargaining agreement between the Employer and the Union. Therefore the Union would maintain at the arbitration hearing that the only issue presented therein for resolution was whether the incidents involving overtime work on 12 May 1986, and the employees late return from lunch on 13 May 1986, warranted and merited the extreme discipline of discharge.[66]

Additionally, credited evidence shows that just prior to the opening of the arbitration hearing on 10 September 1986, Chetrick met with Dominguez and then Rodriguez that morning and, with Torres interpreting, obtained their account of what had occurred the week of 12 May 1986 leading up to their being fired on 16 May 1986. He also asked them about their attendance records. Thus, except for Delgado, whose rendition of what had occurred could reasonably be presumed to be the same as that given by Dominguez and Rodriguez, and who did not appear at the hearing, the Union had obtained the stories of all the persons who were involved in or privy to the events leading to the firing of the three employees and who could be considered as potential witnesses at the arbitration hearing in the Union's behalf.

Under the circumstances present here, I cannot find that the Union failed to conduct "any investigation . . . or if it did conduct one it only got the employer's version." Given DeSilva's account of what he observed and heard of the conversation between Marshak, Zapata, Dominguez, Delgado, and Rodriguez on 13 May 1986 before the employees left for lunch, and his account of what transpired after the employees returned late from lunch,[67] and having heard Torres and DeSilva repeat [63] The General Counsel questions the validity of the testimony of Torres and DeSilva that they met with the three employees on Friday, 13 May 1986, and advised them that they might be fired and also "got their version of what happened on May 13," as unsupported by the facts since DeSilva later that day, after giving them their discharge letters, told them to take the letters to the Union and speak to Torres. However, it is not implausible that DeSilva, even after he and Torres met with the employees earlier that day, would tell them to take the letters to Torres in order to have the Union process their grievances to arbitration, as Torres in DeSilva's presence had advised Marshak and the employees that the Union intended to do.

[64] In Communications Workers Local 3217 (Southern Bell), 243 NLRB 85 (1979), the Board noted that the union had sought to have the discipline imposed on the employee (suspension) lifted or reduced and considered this as part of the evidence that the union's efforts on behalf of the employee "rose above a perfunctory and arbitrary treatment of the employee's matter." Also see Teamsters Local 355 (Monarch Foods), supra.

[66] Under the circumstances present in this case, I do not find Chetrick's strategy as to how he would proceed at the arbitration to be so arbitrary or unreasonable as to constitute gross negligence.

[67] As indicated earlier, DeSilva was the Union's shop steward and presumably "on the Union's side" in the arbitration proceeding. Moreover, the General Counsel offered no supportable evidence, nor do I find any preponderance of evidence showing that the Union was antagonistic towards these employees prior to and at the arbitration hearing, or that it was motivated by the employees' exercise of any protected concerted activity, or that there was any personal hostility on the part of union officials towards them. See Auto Workers Local 417 (Falcon Industries), 245 NLRB 527 (1979); Buffalo Newspaper Guild Local 26 (Buffalo Courier), 220 NLRB 79 (1975); Electronic Workers Local 483 (Automotive Plating Corp.), 170 NLRB 1234 (1968).

what these employees had told them had happened regarding their discharges, the Union and Chetrick could reasonably conclude as to what had actually occurred, notwithstanding any discrepancies in the employees' account thereof or any change in their stories subsequently. I do find that the General Counsel has failed to sustain its burden of showing that the Respondent's investigation of the three grievants' matter in this case was perfunctory or careless.[68]

With regard to the allegation in the complaint that the Respondent failed to present as witnesses any of the discharged employees to testify as to the circumstances that resulted in their discharges "notwithstanding that they were the only witnesses competent to testify to said events and circumstances," I do not agree that this constituted "gross negligence" or "arbitrariness." As stated by the Board in Teamsters Local 542 IBT (Golden Hill Hospital), 223 NLRB 533 (1976):

> In presenting the case to the arbitrator, the attorney supplied by the Union at all times represents the union as well as the grievants. It is for the attorney to determine what evidence is to be presented in support of the claim that the employer has violated the contract. A grievant has no special right to dictate what arguments are to be made or what testimony is to be sought.

The arbitration was conducted in a "very informal" manner as acknowledged by Knowlton, the arbitrator.[69] Marshak and the Respondent's attorney presented the Employer's side of what occurred in the form of unsworn statements as testimony. Although Chetrick did ask questions of Marshak regarding his assertions, there was not the give and take of direct and cross-examination under oath. The Union presented its version of what happened similarly, with Chetrick making its main presentation in the form of a comprehensive statement in defense of the grievants. Thereafter, although not too clear in the instant record, the Respondent's attorney asked questions of both Torres and DeSilva. This was in truth and fact a "very informal" arbitration hearing.

Moreover, although Dominguez and Rodriguez were presumably the most knowledgeable witnesses to the events that transpired, having been participants therein, DeSilva also had first-hand knowledge of what had happened and, additionally, Torres possessed material and relevant information as to what had transpired by virtue of his investigation of the grievances of these employees. Importantly, because DeSilva's account of what he heard and observed was significantly contrary in part to the grievants' story of what occurred on 12 and 13 May 1986, Chetrick's decision not to call Dominguez and Rodriguez as witnesses at the arbitration does not appear to be so "arbitrary" and grossly negligent as to constitute a perfunctory treatment of the conduct of their grievance. I do not find this to constitute a violation of the Respondent's duty of fair representation and therefore violative of the Act.[70]

The complaint also alleges that the Respondent failed "to provide an interpreter and/or to translate for the named discharged employees, who did not speak English or understand English." The question of an interpreter was raised by the arbitrator at the hearing. However, I believe that this was brought up in the context of the need for an interpreter in the event Dominguez or Rodriguez were to be called as witnesses or to give statements. Chetrick told Knowlton that Torres was bilingual and could act as an interpreter if need be. Chetrick's decision not to have them make statements negated this. As to Torres' failing to advise Dominguez and Rodriguez concerning what was being said, because the hearing was being conducted in English, there is some testimony in the record that Torres did on occasion "lean over" and speak to Dominguez in Spanish. However, Torres' testimony concerning this was inconsistent and unclear,[71] and I believe actually that he said little to them by way of translating what was being said in English at the arbitration.[72] My own observation of Dominguez and Rodriguez during the instant hearing was that they do understand some English, enough to be generally aware of what goes on around them, but insufficient

The General Counsel in her brief also points to the fact that the Respondent did not request and inspect the timecards and/or work history of all the Employer's employees or to compare the three discharged employees' lateness records with those of other employees whose latenesses were equal to or greater in number, as evidence of the Respondent's "arbitrary" and grossly negligent handling and processing of the grievances of the three discharged employees. Again I do not agree. While it might be anticipated that the Employer would submit the attendance records of Dominguez, Delgado, and Rodriguez at the arbitration hearing to bolster its justification for discharging these employees, and it may be argued that in the interest of thorough preparation for the arbitration hearing the better course of action might have been to counter this with the similarly poor or worse attendance records of other employees especially in the refinishing department, this might well constitute hindsight. Chetrick's strategy and presentation of the grievants' case at the arbitration was based on a reasonable determination that they had been discharged mainly because of what occurred on 12 and 13 May 1986, the failure of Dominguez and Rodriguez to work overtime that Monday, and all three employees late return from lunch on Tuesday. His apparently spirited attempts to preclude the Employer from offering evidence at that hearing of their attendance records, as being irrelevant and immaterial, was consistent therewith. While another lawyer might have proceeded somewhat differently in the arbitration matter, this does not mean that Chetrick's handling of it, as he did, constituted gross negligence, or was "arbitrary" in nature.

[70] Chetrick also offered as explanation, for not calling Dominguez and Rodriguez as witnesses or to have them make statements at the arbitration hearing, that this would have opened "a Pandora's box" of testimony involving their latenesses and/or absences that he did not want to happen and that would be contrary to his "trial plan" therein. That someone else would have proceeded differently in the presentation of a grievant's case is no reason for finding that an attorney's own handling thereof was "arbitrary" or "perfunctory."

[71] In his sworn statement given to a Board agent, Torres denied that Dominguez had asked him to translate what was occurring at the arbitration hearing, although he did testify herein that both Dominguez and Rodriguez had done so. I did not believe Torres in this instance.

[72] However, a detailed interpretation of what was going on during the course of the actual proceedings, while Torres Dominguez and Rodriguez were in the hearing room, might well have caused some disruption of the hearing, annoyance to the other parties there, or possibly conflict with Torres' absorption and attention regarding what was going on. In truth this is conjecture on my part as an aside only.

to provide comprehension of the technicalities and nuances present in an administrative proceeding or were they to be required to testify therein. This is not to say that perhaps Torres should have attempted to translate in brief in general terms what was being said and/or occurring at the time. Be that as it may, I do not find this omission on the part of the Union to rise to the level of "grossly negligent" behavior or to constitute such unreasonable or arbitrary conduct as to be violative of the Respondent's duty of fair representation.

From all the foregoing, I find and conclude that the General Counsel has failed to meet her burden of establishing that the Respondent breached its duty of fair representation regarding Juan Dominguez and Rogelio Rodriguez by its "arbitrary" and/or perfunctory processing of their grievances. I therefore recommend that the 8(b)(1)(A) allegations in the complaint regarding them be dismissed.[73]

The complaint alleges, in addition to the Respondent's failure to conduct a complete investigation and a complete defense, etc., regarding Dominguez, Delgado, and Rodriguez, as hereinbefore discussed, that the Respondent also breached its duty of fair representation by failing to give proper notice of the arbitration hearing to Delgado, by proceeding with the arbitration on his behalf although he was not present at the hearing, and by failing to respond to the arbitrator's inquiry whether Delgado should be included in any award notwithstanding that it knew that Delgado had not received notice of the arbitration date and place of hearing.

The record evidence shows that the Respondent sent Delgado written notice of the date, time, and place of the arbitration hearing but it was returned to the Union with the notation that Delgado was "Not Known" at the address indicated on the envelope enclosing the letter. The Respondent had addressed this letter to the address that Delgado had given it for receipt of mail, but had failed to include his apartment number.[74] Moreover, the Respondent attempted to contact him by telephone several times at his sister's apartment, because Delgado has no phone of his own, but to no avail because no one answered the telephone. Thus the Respondent did make reasonable efforts to contact Delgado to apprise him of the arbitration hearing.[75]

The more troublesome fact, however, is the failure of the Respondent, through its attorney, Chetrick, or representative, Torres, to apprise the arbitrator that Delgado had not received notice of the arbitration hearing, accounting for his failure to appear at the hearing. Torres was aware of the returned undelivered notice letter and the unanswered telephone calls and Chetrick testified that it was on 10 September 1986, the day of the hearing, that he first learned that Delgado had not received notice of the arbitration. Instead, Chetrick told Arbitrator Knowlton that Delgado was not present, that he did not know where he was, and that he agreed to proceed with the arbitration hearing without his presence because Delgado's story was "exactly the same" as the other grievants, Dominguez and Rodriguez, who were there. Although Knowlton testified that the Union had informed him that all three grievants had been given notice of the hearing, his recollection of what occurred at the arbitration seemed at times unclear and he admittedly did not recall fully regarding what had transpired therein. However, Chetrick did indicate to Knowlton that the Union would seek to contact Delgado and find out if "[Delgado] wants to be a party to this arbitration and be bound."[76]

Additionally bothersome is the Respondent's failure to advise the arbitrator that Delgado had been absent from work on Monday, 12 May 1986, when Dominguez and Rodriguez were asked by the Employer to work overtime. In view of Knowlton's testimony that his award might have been different if he heard testimony "contrary to what's in this [dismissal] letter," this piece of information might well have had a mitigating effect on the arbitrator's decision regarding Delgado.[77]

As set forth earlier, a union breaches its statutory duty of fair representation when its conduct toward a member of the collective-bargaining unit is arbitrary, discriminatory, or in bad faith.[78] There seems to be no contention in this case nor does the evidence support a finding that the Respondent acted in bad faith or out of hostility towards Delgado, or as found before, towards Dominguez and Rodriguez. However, the Respondent's duty of fair representation also encompasses an obligation to deal fairly with employees in taking certain actions or refraining therefrom.[79] Therefore, the key question in this instance is whether the Respondent has engaged in "arbitrary conduct" regarding Delgado. As both the courts and the Board have held, for union action or nonaction to be considered arbitrary and, therefore, a breach of the duty of fair representation in violation of Section

[73] San Francisco Web Pressmen Local 4 (San Francisco Newspaper), supra; Plumbers Local 195 (Stone & Webster), supra; Teamsters Local 355 (Monarch Foods), supra; Teamsters Local 542 (Golden Hill Hospital), supra. Contrast, Service Employees Local 579 (Beverly Manor), supra; P & L Cedar Products, supra. Moreover, the General Counsel's additional reliance on Teamsters Local 705 (Associated Transport), 209 NLRB 292 (1974), in support of her contentions appears misplaced. The Board in Associated Transport found that a union violated its duty of fair representation because its representative openly stated at the hearing that he believed that the grievance had no merit. I do not find analogous to this statement, under the circumstances present in this case, and as alleged by the General Counsel, that by failing to conduct any investigation, by failing to call the grievants as witnesses, and by failing to provide "any translator for them at the arbitration," the Respondent, "in effect, told the arbitrator that the grievance of these three employees had no merit."

[74] There is no evidence in the record to explain why a letter correctly addressed to someone was undeliverable because the apartment number was not included therein. Many explanations suggest themselves but none are supported herein.

[75] Although it was the obligation of the Union to advise Delgado of the arbitration, I have wondered why Dominguez and/or Rodriguez did not contact Delgado about the hearing, especially in view of the admitted fact that all three were close friends and Dominguez called Rodriguez on the morning of the arbitration to make sure he was going to be present. This suggests the possibility that they too would have trouble contacting him as the Union had experienced. Be that as it may, the responsibility of advising the grievants of the date, time, and place of the arbitraton hearing remained with the Respondent.

[76] I am aware that under these circumstances Chetrick's remarks could be construed as being somewhat misleading to the arbitrator at the time.

[77] This would appear to be more than mere conjecture because the arbitrator's award upheld the validity of Delgado's discharge on the merits.

[79] Teamsters Local 355 (Monarch Foods), supra.

8(b)(1)(A) of the Act, "something more than mere negligence is required."[80] "Mere negligence" standing alone, does not constitute arbitrary conduct.[81] And as previously set forth, the issue is not whether the Respondent discharged its obligations with maximum skill and adeptness; but whether in undertaking its efforts, it dealt fairly. The duty of fair representation does not require that every possible option be exercised or that a grievant's case be advocated in a perfect manner.[82]

Therefore, whether I consider that the Respondent handled Delgado's grievance at the arbitration hearing in an inept manner, or used poor judgment therein, or was negligent, or exhibited a "lack of sensitivity" in its handling of the matter, I do not believe that its conduct was so "arbitrary" or egregious as to warrant a finding that the Union failed in its duty to fairly represent Delgado, nor has the General Counsel sustained its burden of proving so.[83] Moreover, a review of the entire record fails to disclose circumstances that constitute the "something more than mere negligence" necessary to convert the negligent act or omission on the Respondent's part into a violation of the Act.

As the Board stated in Office Employees Local 2, 268 NLRB 1353 (1984):

> Exactly when conduct constitutes "something more than mere negligence" is not susceptible to precise definition. This is so because, as noted above, the totality of circumstances in each case must be examined and evaluated.

The Board in Office Employees Local 2 then reviewed various cases where the requisite "something more" or "arbitrariness" was present. In each of these cases the Board found the "something more" in a union's hostility toward the grieving employee,[84] or a willful deception of the employee,[85] or a conflict between a union official and the employee,[86] or a union attempted to cause an employee to forfeit his senority rights on a groundless basis and in contravention of the collective-bargaining agreement.[87]

In this context and with the facts present in this case, I fail to find the circumstances that would constitute the "something more than mere negligence" necessary to convert the Respondent's acts or omissions into a violation of Section 8(b)(1)(A) of the Act.[88] Accordingly, I recommend the dismissal of the 8(b)(1)(A) allegations in the complaint regarding Julio Delgado.

Based on all the foregoing, I recommend that the complaint be dismissed in its entirety.

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. The Respondent, Amalgamated Industrial Union, Local 76B and its Divisions, Local 92—Local 76 (Local 76B Division) of the United Furniture Workers of America, AFL–CIO, is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

2. Office Furniture Service, Inc. is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act.

3. The Respondent has not violated the Act as alleged.

On these findings of fact and conclusions of law and on the entire record, I issue the following recommended[89]

ORDER

The complaint is dismissed in its entirety.

M-B Company, Inc. of Wisconsin and Dennis L. Strouf. Case 30–CA–9447

July 29, 1988

DECISION AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN STEPHENS AND MEMBERS JOHANSEN AND BABSON

On February 9, 1988, Administrative Law Judge George F. McInerny issued the attached decision. The General Counsel filed exceptions and a supporting brief, and the Respondent filed a brief in support of the judge's decision.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the decision and the record in light of the exceptions and briefs and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings,[1] and conclusions[2] and to adopt the recommended Order.

[1] The General Counsel has excepted to some of the judge's credibility findings. The Board's established policy is not to overrule an administrative law judge's credibility resolutions unless the clear preponderance of all the relevant evidence convinces us that they are incorrect. Standard Dry Wall Products, 91 NLRB 544 (1950), enfd. 188 F.2d 362 (3d Cir. 1951). We have carefully examined the record and find no basis for reversing the findings.

The General Counsel also excepts to the judge's failure to mention in his decision the conversations that Richard Strouf, the Union's shop chairman and father of alleged discriminatee Dennis Strouf, testified he had with Brunner and Gebhart. Even assuming, arguendo, that based on those discussions or any other evidence, the General Counsel has made a prima facie showing that Dennis Strouf's layoff violated the Act, we agree with the judge that the Respondent has demonstrated that Dennis Strouf would have been laid off for lawful reasons even in the absence of this father's protected union activity.

In adopting the judge's conclusion that Dennis Strouf was not laid off due to his father's union activity, we find it unnecessary to rely on the judge's generalized comment that Dennis Strouf "was not a good or diligent employee," and rely instead on leadman Bruckner's credited testimony concerning specific problems with Dennis Strouf's performance and on the fact that a decrease in the Respondent's workload required the elimination of one employee's job.

We correct the following inadvertent errors in the judge's decision: In sec. III,B, he stated that Dennis Strouf was laid off on November 7, rather than November 6, 1986; in sec. III,C, he referred to Jerome Brocker as "Bruckner"; in sec. III,D, he referred to Mittag as a probationary employee in October "1976" rather than 1986, and stated that Cosgrove, in his speech to employees, referred to an Air Force contract rather than a contract for truck stripers; and in sec. III,E, he referred to drill press leadman Weber as "Meyer."

[2] In agreeing with the judge's determination that the failure of the Respondent to call Gebhart and Weber as witnesses does not give rise to an adverse inference, we note that the Respondent presented other witnesses, such as Bruckner and Brunner, who testified from personal knowledge as to Dennis Strouf's performance and the circumstances of his layoff, the matters about which Gebhart and Weber apparently also had knowledge. Even assuming, arguendo, that Weber would have testified that Dennis Strouf performed satisfactorily during his 1-1/2 week assignment in the drill press room, we agree with the judge's conclusion that Dennis Strouf was not laid off because of his father's union activity. Moreover, no adverse inference should be drawn from Gebhart's failure to testify about his discussion with Mittag concerning Mittag's status in the event of a strike, since Gebhart's statements were not alleged to be unlawful in the complaint or at the hearing. Further, at the time of the hearing, neither Gebhart nor Weber was alleged to be a supervisor, and the complaint was not amended then to include such allegations.

ORDER

The National Labor Relations Board adopts the recommended Order of the administrative law judge and the complaint is dismissed in its entirety.

In adopting the judge's refusal to find that the Respondent's president, Cosgrove, violated Sec. 8(a)(1) of the Act through his reference to transferring a particular contract to another location if the employees went on strike, we note that the record indicates that, in the context in which it was made, the statement would not reasonably have been understood as a threat of reprisal but rather as a claim that the Respondent would have been able to continue operations during a strike.

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

GEORGE F. MCINERNY, Administrative Law Judge. Based on a charge filed on January 12, 1987, by Dennis L. Strouf, an individual (the Charging Party), the Regional Director for Region 30 of the National Labor Relations Board (the Board) issued a complaint on February 20, 1987, alleging that M-B Company, Inc. of Wisconsin (the Company or Respondent) violated the National Labor Relations Act (the Act) in discharging Dennis L. Strouf on or about November 7, 1986, and subsequently failing and refusing to reinstate him. The Respondent filed a timely answer in which it denied the commission of any unfair labor practices.

Pursuant to a notice contained in the complaint, a hearing was held before me at Manitowoc, Wisconsin, on June 24–25, 1987, at which all parties had the opportunity to present testimony and documentary evidence, to examine and cross-examine witnesses, to make and argue motions, and to argue orally. After the conclusion of the hearing the Respondent and the General Counsel filed briefs, which have been carefully considered.[2] Based on the entire record, including my observations of the witnesses, and their demeanor, I make the following

I. JURISDICTION

The Respondent, M-B Company, Inc. of Wisconsin, is a Wisconsin corporation with plants located in Chilton

[1] Mr. Cairns died on December 11, 1987, having completed the trial, the brief, and further motions in this matter.

[2] On December 7, 1987, counsel for the Respondent filed a response to motion to amend the complaint contained in the General Counsel's brief, together with motions to strike portions of the General Counsel's brief and to correct the transcript. The General Counsel filed an opposition to this document, objecting to Respondent's motion to strike portions of the General Counsel's brief and to Respondent's opposition to the General Counsel's motion to amend. Because there was no opposition to Respondent's motion to correct the transcript that motion is allowed. For reasons which will appear below, I deny the General Counsel's motion to amend the complaint, and Respondent's motion to strike portions of the General Counsel's brief.

and New Holstein, Wisconsin, where it is engaged in the manufacture, refinishing, and repair of sweepers and road-marking machinery.[3] During the calendar year ending December 31, 1986, the Respondent sold and shipped from its Wisconsin facilities goods and products valued at over $50,000 directly to points outside the State of Wisconsin. The complaint alleges, the answer admits, and I find that the Respondent is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act.

II. THE LABOR ORGANIZATION INVOLVED

The complaint alleges, the answer admits, and I find that District 150, International Association of Machinists and Aerospace Workers, AFL–CIO (the Union) is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

III. THE ALLEGED UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

A. Background

The Company's facility involved in this case is the plant at New Holstein, Wisconsin, where it manufactures, repairs, and rebuilds commercial sweepers. The sweepers are either self-propelled or are towed by other vehicles, and are used to clean roads, sidewalks, or airport runways. At New Holstein there are approximately 30 hourly rated employees represented by District 150 of the International Association of Machinists and Aerospace Workers, AFL–CIO, in a unit that also includes another 50 employees at the Chilton facility, about 6 miles from New Holstein.

The Union has represented these employees since the 1940s. So far as can be determined from the record in this case, relations had been ongoing and cordial during this period. In the fall of 1986, union and company representatives met to negotiate a new collective-bargaining agreement to succeed a contract expiring at the end of October. The Company was represented by Attorneys Ronald P. Dales and Thomas E. Brunner, vice president and general manager, respectively, of the sweeper division at New Holstein. The Union was represented by Business Representative Jerome Brocker, accompanied by an employee committee including Shop Chairman Richard Strouf, a master assembler at New Holstein, and the father of the Charging Party, and Michael J. Gudex, a committeeman, who is a leadman at the Chilton plant and also the maternal uncle of Dennis Strouf.

In September 1985, the Company had bid on and been awarded a contract to rebuild and recondition airport sweepers for the United States Air Force. After some preliminary work to establish the Company's reliability and its ability to perform the work required under this contract, the Air Force delivered some 30 sweepers to the Company at New Holstein by late August 1986. These were stored in the Company's yard to be disassembled and cleaned so they could be brought into the plant to be rebuilt before the winter.

[3] The Company also operates a shoe manufacturing facility at Sheboygan, Wisconsin, which is not involved in this case.

B. The Hiring and Layoff of Dennis Strouf[4]

Dennis Strouf graduated from high school in the spring of 1986.[5] At about that time he mentioned to his father, Richard, that he would like to go to work for the M-B Company. Dennis went to the Company and took a series of tests administered to applicants for permanent jobs. He did not do very well on the tests in early August and had an interview with General Manager Brunner. The latter told him that based on his test scores and lack of experience he would not be considered for permanent employment.

After this, the Company received the 30 Air Force sweepers and had to consider how they were going to get them cleaned up before the snow came to New Holstein. About the same time, Richard Strouf approached Brunner and appealed to him to give Dennis a job. In view of the need to get the sweeper job done, Brunner agreed to hire Dennis on a temporary basis.[6]

Dennis Strouf reported for work on September 6. He was joined by another temporary employee, David Kirsch, and by several employees from the Chilton plant. Dennis worked for about 2 months at cleaning parts on sweepers, operating a forklift under leadmen Stanley Bruckner, and, for a time, operating a drill press in the machine shop under the direction of Jim Weber. On Thursday, November 7, Dennis had a conversation with Brunner who informed him that he was being laid off because of a lack of work. The layoff was effective immediately, and Dennis left the plant.

C. The Contract Negotiations

As had been noted, the testimony in this case indicates that the Company and the Union had an ongoing relationship going back to the 1940s. The contract between the parties effective during early 1986 was due to expire on October 31. About 3 weeks before this expiration date the parties commenced negotiations for a new agreement. As indicated, the company committee consisted of Attorneys Dales and Brunner, and for the Union, Jerome Bruckner, Gudex, and Richard Strouf. Bruckner acted as chief spokesman on the union side, but the other two committee people also joined in the discussions. There were extended discussions on economics, including a wage package, and on the Company's profit-sharing plan. There were differences in the testimony of Brunner and, Richard Strouf about the emotional level of these discussions. Brunner recalled the parties as being "emotional" or "animated," but could not recall what Strouf and Gudex described as shouting and table-pounding. I cannot say that the characterizations by any of these witnesses rose to the vituperative or frenzied level of many such situations I have heard about and some in which I have actively participated. The union representatives were disappointed, even angry, at what they described as no progress on economic issues. Richard Strouf, particularly, was concerned with possible duplicity in the Company's reservation, or accrual, of moneys from the profit-sharing plan to cover anticipated expenses. But there were no threats, no wild scenes, and no walkouts connected with any of these meetings.

[4] There are no substantial issues of fact on the chronology of Dennis Strouf's relations with the Company. This statement of facts is taken from the testimony of Dennis and Richard Strouf and Thomas Brunner.

[6] Art. II, sec. 4 and art. IV, sec. 4 of the parties' November 1, 1986 contract provides for the hiring, lay off, transfer, or discharge of temporary employees.

After several meetings, a mediator was called in and, eventually, a last offer was made by the Company. The proposal was taken back by the union bargaining committee to the membership and was there rejected. However, because of an unusual union rule[7] a strike vote failed, and, in that circumstance, the contract "won by default,"[8] and was executed by the parties.

D. Cosgrove's Speech and Alleged Threats to Employees

Terrence J. Cosgrove is the president and sole owner of the Company. On the day after the contract was accepted by the Union (despite its being unsatisfactory) Cosgrove testified that he heard talk from company employees that "the Company won again." Cosgrove became angry at this talk because, in his words, he had been trying for 3 years to get people "focused to the marketplace and literally knocking the hell out of our competitors." In order perhaps to refocus the people who were saying that the Company had won in the negotiations he summoned all the employees to a meeting at the Chilton plant.

There does not seem to be any substantive disagreement on what Cosgrove said. He was angry, as he admitted, and he was talking to the employees against the advice of Dales, his attorney. He used no text nor had he made notes on what he was going to say. Cosgrove himself had no real idea what he said,[9] but he did not disagree with testimony on the talk by Brunner or Micheal Gudex. Richard Strouf substantially agreed with this testimony, adding his recollection that Cosgrove said something about moving operations if the employees had gone out on strike. Cosgrove recalled that he said that if they had had a strike he would have taken the Air Force contract and moved it somewhere else.[10]

In another matter, Steven Mittag, who was a probationary employee in October 1976, testified that at the end of October he was asked by Wally Gebhardt, manager of production inventory control, if he would cross the picket line if there was a strike vote. Mittag asked what would happen if he did not and according to Mittag, Gebhardt replied that because he was not protected by the Union, if he refused to cross the picket line for 3 working days, he would be terminated by the Company. Gebhardt did not testify but Tom Brunner, who was present at the conversation between Gebhardt and Mittag, testified that Mittag had asked about crossing a picket line and Gebhardt told him that if he did not cross the line, his absences could be considered to be unexcused absences. There was no evidence that unexcused absences by probationary employees constituted a cause for discipline or discharge.

E. Summary and Conclusions

1. The discharge of Dennis Strouf

Based on the entire record in this case, I conclude that the General Counsel has failed to establish that the Company objected to or resented the Union, or that Brunner or any other company official resented the conduct of Richard Strouf during the 1986 negotiations.

This Company, according to Richard Strouf's own testimony, had had continuous relations with the Union since the 1940s. Michael Gudex and Jerome Brocker stated that the Union had filed no grievances during at least the 3 years before this hearing. Taking Richard Strouf's and Michael Gudex's testimony at its face value, it does not appear that Richard's conduct at the bargaining table, or the Company's response, gave rise to any indication that the Company resented that conduct. Indeed, it would be strange if a series of meetings on a collective-bargaining agreement did not produce some shouting, tablepounding, or other manifestations of impatience. Rarely do such displays leave any lasting effects. The evidence in this case does not point to a different conclusion.

The question of Richard Strouf's urging rejection by the membership of the proposed agreement is not, in my opinion, significant. Nor was this action by Richard connected by the General Counsel to Cosgrove's speech to the employees.

There is no indication here, as alleged by the General Counsel, of falsification of Dennis Strouf's employment records by leadman Stanley Bruckner. Bruckner impressed me as a cautious but candid witness. I credit his evaluations of Dennis Strouf as an employee and I believe that his judgment in determining whether to retain Dennis or David Kirsch was an honest judgment based on his view of the best interests of the Company.

I do not agree with the General Counsel that I should take the absence of the drill press leadman, Meyer, and production inventory control manager, Gebhardt, as establishing the General Counsel's position on Dennis Strouf's discharge, or the Company's motivations in effecting Dennis' layoff. There is no indication that either Meyer or Gebhardt would not have responded to the General Counsel's subpoenas or testified as he now asserts they would have.

From these findings it is clear that the General Counsel has not established a prima facie case that Dennis Strouf was laid off (or discharged) because of the Company's animus toward the Union or toward his father. Further, it is also clear that Dennis was not a good or a diligent employee and that his selection of layoff was based on a proper comparison between himself and

[7] Either under its constitution or bylaws, the record is not clear.

[8] These were Brunner's words. The use of the word "won" became significant later.

[9] Cosgrove was angry, but there is no indication that his talk was rambling or incoherent. Despite his anger and the absence of text or notes, he obviously had thought about what he was going to say.

[10] In his brief, counsel for the General Counsel moved to amend the complaint to allege this remark as a violation of Sec. 8(a)(1). For the reasons given below, I deny the motion to amend the complaint.

David Kirsch.[11] See, e.g., Wright Line, 251 NLRB 1083 (1980).

2. The Mittag situation

I think Mittag was an honest witness, but bearing in mind that he had worked only a few days before the strike threat arose, I feel that he was apprehensive and perhaps not exactly sure what was being said to him when he asked about crossing a picket line. I credit Brunner's version of what Gebhardt said to Mittag. In that statement I find no threat, but merely a recitation of a company policy which was not further explained in the record.

3. Cosgrove's speech

I cannot read into Crosgrove's speech either a threat to close the plant, or any other coercive statement. What he said, and there is no serious disagreement on that, was that he might have moved some work if there had been a strike. I find no threat or violation of law in that speech, and I find no connection between the speech and layoff of Dennis Strouf. The General Counsel's motion to amend the complaint to allege this speech as containing a violation of Section 8(a)(1) is denied.

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. The Company, M-B Company, Inc. of Wisconsin, is an employer within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act.

2. The Union, District 150, International Association of Machinists and Aerospace Workers, AFL-CIO is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

3. The Company has not committed any unfair labor practices under the Act.

On these findings of fact and conclusions of law and on the entire record, I issue the following recommended[12]

ORDER

The complaint is dismissed.

[11] I do not credit Dennis' denials of derelictions alleged by leadman Stanley Bruckner. I found Bruckner to be a forthright and credible witness, and I found Dennis to be indifferent as well as forgetful. This demeanor indicated to me that he expected to be believed no matter what he said.

[12] If no exceptions are filed as provided by Sec. 102.46 of the Board's Rules and Regulations, the findings, conclusions, and recommended Order shall, as provided in Sec. 102.48 of the Rules, be adopted by the Board and all objections to them shall be deemed waived for all purposes.

DECISION AND ORDER

BY MEMBERS JOHANSEN, BABSON, AND CRACRAFT

On October 20, 1987, Administrative Law Judge Thomas A. Ricci issued the attached decision. The General Counsel filed exceptions and a supporting brief, and the Respondent filed a brief in support of the judge's decision and in opposition to the General Counsel's exceptions.[1]

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the decision and the record in light of the exceptions and briefs and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings,[2] and conclusions and to adopt the recommended Order.

ORDER

The recommended Order of the administrative law judge is adopted and the complaint is dismissed.

[1] The Respondent also filed a motion to disallow the General Counsel's brief in support of exceptions. In view of our dismissal of the complaint, we find it unnecessary to pass on the Respondent's motion.

[2] The judge states that Applicant Joel Cohn indicated on his application that he wanted employment as a fill-in temporary employee. In fact, the portion of Cohn's application that requested the hours he was available was left blank by Cohn. This misstatement by the judge does not alter our decision in this case. Additionally, although the judge failed to specifically analyze the alleged violation of Sec. 8(a)(2) of the Act, our review of the documents and record disclose insufficient facts to support finding an 8(a)(2) violation.

In this regard, we note that the General Counsel contended that the Respondent recognized IATSE Local 182 at a time when Local 182 did not represent an uncoerced majority of employees. This contention was premised on the General Counsel's argument that Local 182's majority showing was tainted by the Respondent's alleged unlawful hiring practices. Because we find no violation of Sec. 8(a)(3) in the Respondent's hiring practices and because Local 182 presented evidence that it represented a majority of the employees in the unit, it was not unlawful for the Respondent to recognize and thereafter enter into a collective-bargaining agreement with Local 182. The General Counsel also argues that the Respondent's extension of recognition was made before Local 182 had obtained cards from a majority of the employees. However, the record reflects that recognition was granted on November 16 after at least four of the seven employees in the unit had signed authorization cards. Thus, the General Counsel has failed to present evidence indicative of unlawful employer assistance.

Statement of the Case

THOMAS A. RICCI, Administrative Law Judge. A hearing in this proceeding was held at Boston, Massachusetts, on 7 and 8 July 1987, on a complaint issued aganist Theatre Holdings, Inc. d/b/a Harvard Square Theatre (the Respondent). The complaint issued on 7 May 1987 on a charge filed on 23 December 1986 by United Electrical, Radio and Machine Workers of America, Local 262 (the UE or the Charging Party). The sole issues to be decided are whether the Respondent refused to hire two applicants for employment because of their membership in the Charging Party Union, and thereby violated Section 8(a)(3) of the statute. Briefs were filed by the General Counsel and the Respondent.

On the entire record and from my observation of the witnesses, I make the following

I. THE BUSINESS OF THE RESPONDENT

The Respondent is engaged in the operation of moving picture theatres. Annually in the course of its business operations the Respondent derives gross revenues in excess of $500,000. It also purchases and receives at its Boston facilities products, goods, and materials valued in excess of $5000 directly from points outside the Commonwealth of Massachusetts. I find that the Respondent is an employer within the meaning of the Act.

II. THE LABOR ORGANIZATION INVOLVED

I find that United Electrical, Radio and Machine Workers of America, Local 262, is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

III. THE ALLEGED UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

The Respondent, which operates under the trade name U.S.A. Theatres, owns a large number of moving picture houses, about 100, in a number of New England States. Its employees are classified as ticket sellers, ushers, projectionists, assistant managers, etc. In some of its theatres there is no union representing its employees. In some of them there is, with International Alliance of Theatrical Stage Employees and Moving Picture Machine Operators of the United States and Canada (IATSE), representing the projectionists. In one of its theatres the Charging Party represents the projectionists.

During November 1986 the Respondent purchased a moving picture house in Cambridge, Massachusetts, called the Harvard Square Theatre, from a company called Harvard Square. The deal was completed on 14 November and the Respondent took over and started operating the theatre with its own employees that day. The selling company had used the usual categories of employees, including projectionists. In the summer of 1986 its projectionists joined the UE and filed a petition for an election with the National Labor Relations Board on July 11. An election was held on 22 September, with seven projectionists on the eligibility list. All seven of them voted in favor of the UE. By 13 November, the last day it operated the theatre, the seller discharged every one of its employees.

In anticipation of its starting takeover, the Respondent publicized its need for new employees. It placed ads in the local newspaper and posted notices inviting applications in the theatre itself. In response it received 16 written applications for the positions of projectionists. By 14 November it hired seven of these applicants. Four of them signed cards in favor of IATSE and, after the usual meetings with that Union, the Respondent entered into a regular collective-bargaining agreement later in November.

One of the nine applicants for the jobs of projectionists that Respondent did not hire was Jessica Schroeder, a young lady who had worked for some time for the predecessor company as a cashier and usher. Another was Joel Cohn, who had not worked for the predecessor for several years, and who, at the time of his application in November 1986 was working as a full-time head projectionist at a theatre totally unrelated to these parties. His application asked for employment with the Respondent as a fill-in temporary employee. The complaint alleges that the reason the Respondent did not hire Schroeder or Cohn was because they were members of the UE and that, therefore, the refusal to select them among the many was a violation of Section 8(a)(3) of the Act. The record in its entirety falls far short of proving a prima facie case in support of that allegation. Rather, it shows beyond a shadow of doubt that the Respondent had the most objective reason possible for selecting the projectionists it did hire while ignoring these two and a number of other applicants. I shall therefore dismiss the complaint. Wright Line, 251 NLRB 1083 (1980).

The selection among the 16 applicants was made by Charles Goldwater, a vice president of the Respondent, and by Daniel Greismer, vice president and general manager of the Company's New England theatres. They very clearly denied the allegation that union affiliation of any of the applicants had anything to do with their decision who to hire. Rather, both said they choose on the basis of the applicant's experience as a projectionist and availability. The record, consisting of unrequestioned documentary proof, supports the assertion beyond question.

In looking over the various applicants for projectionists, the company representatives checked the work experience listed by the applicants. They spoke to their managers in their other theatres where some of the men had worked. They spoke to Hal Wagner, an officer of IATSE, for his opinion about qualifications and experience of some of the applicants. With some of the applicants having been employed by the selling company, Goldwater and Greisner also consulted with Graham, the manager of the theatre before the takeover, and with Mariello, the owner of the selling company, to learn their opinion about the relative qualifications of the employees in the past. The principal point argued in support of the complaint is that the new owners asked Wagner's opinion about which applicants would be better projectionists. I see nothing wrong in Goldwater or Greismer seeking that man's expert opinion in the circumstances of this case. Wagner had been doing business with the Respondent for a long time in many of its other theatres. He certainly was in a position to give a reliable opinion. There is nothing in any of the Respondent's contracts, which IATSE had at its other theatres, that conditions hiring on referral by that Union. Indeed, the Respondent relied as much on Mariello's recommendation as it did on Wagner's.

A most significant aspect of this case is that there is no evidence at all indicating animosity against the UE by the Respondent's representatives. There is not even a single allegation, in the classic sense, of any violation of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act. The Respondent hired a number of projectionists, all of long experience, who had worked for the predecessor, known adherents of the UE. It also hired projectionists, again, with long experience, who were well spoken of by the IATSE agent. Does it follow from this last fact alone that the Respondent violated the statute, and that IATSE also committed an unfair labor practice?[1] The Supreme Court long ago disagreed with a Board holding that direct referral by a union of a man for hiring, absent affirmative evidence of intent to favor prounion men against nonunion people, constituted an unfair practice. Teamsters Local 357, 365 U.S. 667 (1961). If outright referral, absent proof of illegal motivation, is not an unfair labor practice, surely mere recommendation about a man's relative skill can hardly prove a violation of the statute.

The notices inviting applications were posted inside the theatre before the takeover. If the new company was determined to establish IASTE as the bargaining agent in the place of the UE, why would it have solicited applications form the old employees? In the election that had taken place on 22 September all seven of the eligible projectionists had voted in favor of the UE. The new owners knew that. With no evidence to support the assertion the General Counsel suggests that the Respondent deliberately posted a notice inside the theatre to create a false impression that it was indifferent to union or nonunion membership by the applicants. It is an argument that has no foundation in fact.

But more important is that despite its knowledge that all the old projectionists had favored the Union in the Board election, the Respondent hired three of them—William Templemen, Bill Litchman, and Jim Hill. Before deciding on anyone the Respondent's agents asked Mariello for a list of its projectionists, with his opinion regarding their relative skills and experience. Mariello did that, with a comment, in his own handwriting, on their comparative skills. He wrote the word "excellent" next to only three of the names, the very three that the Respondent then hired. About another he wrote "Do not recommend" and another he wrote "Fair." Two others—Hatfield and Kelly—he labeled as "Very Good." But those two did not apply for the new jobs. What better proof than this that the Respondent, as its agents insisted at the hearing, was concerned above all with skills and experience?

[1] The complaint, as issued, also contained allegations of wrongdoing by IASTE. All those allegations were removed from the complaint by the General Counsel at the start of the hearing.

The Respondent hired four others besides the three listed above. All four of these had written in their application that they were members of IASTE. Two of them had 2 years. The selection of these last four projectionists fits squarely into the Respondent's position that all it sought was experienced people.

Gohn was an experienced man, but all he wanted here was a part-time job, offering to "fill-in," as he said, when needed. More important, there is no evidence at all that the Respondent's agents knew of his UE activities in the past. There was no mention of it in his written application. The only thing in this entire record that the General Counsel now says proves the Company's knowledge of this man's prounion interests is a conversation Cohn had with Greisner on the telephone a week after the full complement had been hired. Cohn called to ask if there was still any hope of his obtaining extra work. In the talking, Cohn, as he testified, said "I want you to know that I understand that there's a question of who will represent the projectionists at the theatre, and that I was willing to work no matter who represented or even if they were not represented." Greisner's response to this was, "I'm glad you told me that." Does this conversation prove that, a week earlier, when Cohn was passed over, the Respondent knew of his UE penchant? Does it prove anti-UE machinations by the Respondent? Not at all.

We come to Schroeder, who, at that time, was working as a cashier and usher for the predecessor company and who applied with the Respondent for a job as projectionist. This whole case really centers on the fact that in making their selection the new managers simply ignored her application. Schroeder aspired to become a projectionist. During the summer of 1986 she trained at that work and on 25 August passed a test and became a licensed projectionist. She testified that from September to October 1986 she continued to work for the former company as a cashier and usher. Regarding actual work it did not change thereafter. From the transcript:

> Q. (By the General Counsel). After you received your training as a projectionist, was there any change in the nature of your job at the theatre?
> A. Not really, not—basically. I continue to usher. I tried to—Bill Templeman and I tried to get shifts for me that were open. There were shifts that needed to be taken up at the time. That people were working just sort to get us through, until I was ready to work them. So at that time we were trying to make it possible for me to work projecting, and management had some kind of problem with that.

Schroder also testified that during the last month or so before the takeover she was a part-timer, working only about 20 hours per week. She said that part of that limited time she was actually used as a projectionist. This, apparently, based on her own testimony, is the limit of her experience as a projectionist. She also said that for such limited projectionist work she was paid at the rate of $6.25 per hour instead of her regular pay of $3.35 per hour as an usher. The payslips that were offered into evidence for her last 2 weeks—from 1 to 13 November—show a pay rate of $6.25 per hour, but they do not clearly prove her assertion. In explaining the slips she also said that the figure $6.25 could reflect certain overtime work performed during that period. Thus it appears, taking the lady's testimony at its best, that her total experience as a projectionist amounted to no more than 10 or 20 hours at the most.

No one on behalf of the Respondent ever spoke to Schroeder about her application. All she said, in support of the complaint, is that one day she telephoned Greismer, of the Respondent, and asked why she had not been hired. The owner said, as she testified, "that they were looking for more experienced projectionists." It thus appears that, entirely apart from the total absence of direct evidence of illegal motivation in the Respondent's failure to select Schroeder, there was the most convincing proof of a rational and purely objective basis for not hiring her. For the Company to have selected an applicant with virtually no experience at all, and ignoring the many others with years of experience, would have been absolutely silly.

In conclusion, the record in its entirety shows without doubt that the General Counsel was aware of this total lack of evidence to show personal dislike of Schroeder as an employee. Harvard Square Company, the seller, discharged all of its employees shortly after all seven of its projectionists voted in favor of the UE. There is no allegation that its action constituted an unfair labor practice. It is also conceded that the purchaser had a right to hire any employee of its choice to work in the theatre. Restated: The Respondent was not an alter ego of the earlier company. It did not hire a majority of the seller's employees in the unit in which the UE had won a majority in the Board election. It therefore was not a successor, in terms of Board law. In the face of this reality, the complaint nevertheless alleges that the Respondent was legally obligated to bargain with the UE regarding its newly hired employees. It also alleges precisely that later, when it contracted with IATSE and altered some of the conditions of employment in the theatre, the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(5) of the Act because it bypassed the UE.

This is the same as saying: This Respondent did not hire a majority of its predecessor's employees, but treated as though it in fact had done so. It would demean this decision to burden it with a serious response to such an argument. What the General Counsel is really asserting is that the Respondent knew that had it hired four instead of three of the predecessor projectionists, it would have found itself in the position of a successor, according to Board law, and therefore, obligated to bargain with the UE. From this it follows, according to the General Counsel, that the reason the Respondent did not hire Schroeder was to avoid exactly such legal consequence. It is a kind of reasoning that does not merit comment.

On these findings of fact and conclusions of law and on the entire record, I issue the following recommended[2]

ORDER

It is recommended that the complaint be dismissed in its entirety.

[2] If no exceptions are filed as provided by Sec. 102.46 of the Board's Rules and Regulations, the findings, conclusions, and recommended Order shall, as provided in Sec. 102.48 of the Rules, be adopted by the Board and all objections to them shall be deemed waived for all purposes.

July 29, 1988

DECISION AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN STEPHENS AND MEMBERS JOHANSEN AND CRACRAFT

On November 4, 1987, Administrative Law Judge Jay R. Pollack issued the attached decision. The General Counsel filed exceptions and a supporting brief, and the Respondent filed a brief in opposition to the General Counsel's exceptions.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the decision and the record in light of the exceptions and briefs and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings, and conclusions and to adopt the recommended Order.

ORDER

The National Labor Relations Board adopts the recommended Order of the administrative law judge and orders that the Respondent, General Chemical Corporation, Pittsburg, California, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall take the action set forth in the Order.

Ariel Sotolongo, Esq., for the General Counsel.
John D. McLachlan and Ned Fine, Esqs. (Fisher & Phillips), of San Francisco, California, for the Respondent.

DECISION

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

JAY R. POLLACK, Administrative Law Judge. I heard this case in trial in Oakland, California, on June 22 through 25, and July 1, 1987. On November 26, 1986, the Regional Director for Region 32 of the National Labor Relations Board issued a complaint and notice of hearing based on unfair labor practice charges filed by International Chemical Workers Union, Local 25 (the Union) on September 23, 1986. Thereafter the Union filed amended charges on October 10, 1986, and February 20, 1987, and the Regional Director issued amended complaints on February 2 and April 17, 1987. The complaint alleges that General Chemical Corporation (Respondent) violated Section 8(a)(5), (3), and (1) of the National Labor Relations Act (the Act).

The parties have been afforded full opportunity to appear, to introduce evidence, to examine and cross-examine witnesses, and to file briefs. Posttrial briefs were filed on behalf of the General Counsel and the Respondent. Based on the entire record, on the briefs filed by counsel, and on my observation of the demeanor of the witnesses, I make the following

FINDINGS OF FACT AND CONCLUSIONS

I. JURISDICTION

Respondent is a Delaware corporation with a facility in Pittsburg, California, where it is engaged in the nonretail manufacture and processing of chemicals. During the 12-month period preceding issuance of the complaint, Respondent purchased and received goods, materials, and supplies valued in excess of $50,000 directly from suppliers located outside the State of California.

The complaint alleges, the answer admits, and I find that Respondent is an employer engaged in commerce and in a business affecting commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act.

The complaint alleges, the answer admits, and I find that at all times material, the Union has been a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

II. THE ALLEGED UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

A. Background and Issues

As discussed above, Respondent is engaged in the manufacture and processing of chemicals. Respondent's production and maintenance employees have been represented by the Union for many years. In April 1986, Respondent acquired the Pittsburg, California facility from Allied Chemical Corporation. Following its acquisition of the plant, Respondent recognized the Union as the exclusive bargaining agent of the employees and began negotiations for a new collective-bargaining agreement in May 1986. Negotiations between Respondent and the Union became deadlocked by late July, and on August 18 Respondent made its final offer to the Union. Thereafter, on August 22 Respondent unilaterally implemented its final offer.

On September 4, at approximately 2 p.m., the Union went on strike. The strike lasted until Friday, September 19, at approximately 5:30 p.m., when the Union informed Respondent that it accepted Respondent's final offer and that the employees would unconditionally return to work on Monday, September 22.

The employees returned to work at approximately 7 a.m. on September 22. On this date Respondent informed the Union that employees Larry Barela, Dan Ramirez, Bill Scheffler, J. T. Stone, and Diane "Cookie" Strock were terminated for conduct they allegedly engaged in during the strike. The Union promptly filed grievances on behalf of the discharged employees. Respondent later informed the Union that employees Joe Leonguerrero and Ron Smith would be suspended for 3 days without pay for walking off their jobs on September 4 without first following Respondent's CP department relief procedures. The Union filed grievances on behalf of Leonguerrero and Smith. Respondent has agreed to arbitrate the grievances concerning the suspension of Smith and Leonguerrero but has refused to arbitrate the grievances concerning the discharges of Barela, Ramirez, Scheffler, Stone, and Strock.

The General Counsel and the Union contend that Respondent unlawfully terminated Barela, Ramirez, Scheffler, Stone, and Strock for their conduct in violation of Section 8(a)(3) and (1) and unlawfully suspended Leonguerrero and Smith for their strike activities. Respondent, on the other hand, contends that the five employees engaged in strike-related misconduct and therefore lost the protection of the Act. With respect to the suspension of Leonguerrero and Smith, Respondent contends that the two employees were suspended for violating a safety rule, which rule Respondent contends need not be subservient to the employees' right to strike. Further litigated at the trial was the issue of whether Respondent violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) by refusing to arbitrate the discharges of the five employees.

B. The Facts

1. The suspensions of Leonguerrero and Smith

As stated earlier, on August 22, Respondent unilaterally implemented its final contract proposal. At the time of the implementation of Respondent's final proposal, the Company was expecting and was prepared for a strike. Supervisors were in the plant around the clock and additional supervisors had been brought in from Respondent's other facilities.

However, the strike which began on September 4 was not expected by management. The strike was signaled by the Union's president activating the emergency alarm which caused employees and supervisors to proceed to the water tower near the front gate of the plant in accordance with the emergency procedures in effect for the plant. Neither hourly employees nor salaried employees had any advance knowledge of the commencement of the strike.

Respondent manufactures a wide variety of chemicals, which include electronic, sulfuric, nitric and acetic acids, ammonium hydroxide, and other products. Hydrochloric acid is used in the process. Different blends (150 to 160) of products are manufactured in the CP department of the plant alone. A great number of the chemicals produced in this plant are considered extremely hazardous and could constitute a hazard not only to employees but also to individuals living in the vicinity of the plant.

Because of the dangers involved, Respondent has maintained rules that operators in the control room may not leave their jobs unattended. Both operators involved here, Leonguerrero and Ron Smith, admitted that it was a longstanding rule that an operator had to be properly relieved before leaving his or her work station. The purpose of the rule is for the operator to inform his or her relief operator of the status of the chemical process.

Leonguerrero testified that he had not yet been briefed so that the prior shift operator rather than himself had left without proper relief. Smith testified that the union president directed him not to notify his supervisor before leaving the plant. Respondent contends that these employees could have avoided discipline if they had only notified the supervisor, James Craig, that they were leaving the plant on strike. Craig could have been contacted by pager. It would have taken no more than 5 to 15 minutes for the employees to contact Craig. The operators could have also avoided discipline by shutting down their equipment. Three other control room operators participated in the strike but were not disciplined. These operators shut down their equipment or notified their supervisor.

Respondent's supervisors, Craig and Costello, were in the CP control room within minutes of the strike starting, and they proceeded to assume control of the operations immediately. Craig and Costello were required to spend several hours inspecting the CP room for leakage or damage. However, there was no damage to equipment or to the product as a result of the strike.

The Union filed timely grievances concerning the suspensions of Leonguerrero and Smith. At the time of the instant hearing, the grievances were set for arbitration. However, the only issue before the arbitrator was whether the employees had engaged in the conduct for which they were disciplined. The issue presented here, whether Respondent's discipline of the two employees infringes on their Section 7 rights, is not before the arbitrator. For this reason, Respondent abandoned at the trial its contention that the allegations concerning the suspension of Leonguerrero and Smith should be deferred to arbitration.

2. Larry Barela's discharge

As stated above, the strike which began on September 4 took Respondent by surprise. The strike became violent almost immediately after its commencement. Within the hour, supervisors' cars leaving the plant were hit by stones. Mass pickets blocked the road leading to the plant from the main access road. A truck occupied by two supervisors was struck by a baseball bat wielded by a striking employee.[1] Supervisors and nonstriking employees received numerous threats to their own safety as well as to the safety of their families. During the first day of the strike, numerous vehicles belonging to supervisors were damaged. The violence on the first day of the strike resulted in strong police presence for the remainder of the strike.

On September 5, a temporary restraining order was issued in the Superior Court of Contra Costa County and on September 19, 1986, a preliminary injunction issued against the Union prohibiting the strikers from damaging the property of the company or its employees, customers, and vendors, and limiting the number of picketers to two on each side of the entrance to the plant.

Respondent discharged Larry Barela because of four incidents which will be discussed in chronological order. On September 5, John McLachlan, Respondent's attorney, left the plant between 6 and 7 p.m. McLachlan testified that his car was stopped by 10 to 15 picketers. While McLachlan was stopped, he was approached by an individual wearing a black T-shirt with an arm in a sling, who bent down near the left rear tire. McLachlan heard the sound of air rushing out of his tire shortly afterward. The individual then walked around McLachlan's car and bent down next to the front right tire, and McLachlan again heard air coming out of that tire. McLachlan got a good look at the individual involved.

Although McLachlan did not know Barela at the time of the incident, he described the individual involved to a company supervisor and was told that the person was probably Barela. McLachlan gave a report to the Contra Costa Sheriff's Department which described the person as having a ponytail and a mustache. Barela had short hair and a full beard. McLachlan did correctly describe Barela's dark features. McLachlan later gave the police a second report. This report described Barela as having long hair, a full beard, a "Fu-Manchu" type mustache, and dark skin. McLachlan testified at the hearing that the individual involved in the tire-slashing incident was in fact Barela.

Barela testified that he did not slash the tires of McLachlan's vehicle or any other vehicle. He stated that he had never seen McLachlan before the hearing. He further denied ever having a knife or other sharp object during the strike or that he wore his arm in a sling.

I find McLachlan to be a much more credible witness than Barela and I credit his testimony. Despite the discrepancies in McLachlan's description of the suspect in the two police reports, I am still convinced that Barela is the individual he observed at the tire-slashing incident. Barela, on the other hand, was not a credible witness and, as will be seen below, attempted to deny all wrongdoing.

On September 8, McLachlan drove a car through the picket line with two passengers, Bob Brevard, the Respondent's director of manufacturing, and William Thomas, Respondent's vice president. A white pickup truck with Washington state license plates[2] drove in front of McLachlan's car. According to Brevard, the white pickup truck was going extremely slow and would not let his vehicle pass. On several occasions the white truck pulled onto the shoulder of the road and accelerated rapidly throwing gravel at McLachlan's vehicle. After 1 to 2 miles, the driver of the white truck threw a smoking object (later identified as a cherry bomb) out of his window. After Brevard's vehicle passed over the object, Brevard heard a small explosion underneath a car which was traveling behind McLachlan's car on the road. After McLachlan passed the truck, Brevard observed Barela in the driver's seat. McLachlan corroborated Brevard's testimony.

Barela testified that he drove a white pickup truck with Washington license plates. However, he denied driving the vehicle in front of the car driven by McLachlan and in the manner described above. Barela denied driving slowly, denied driving on the shoulder to throw gravel, and denied throwing any cherry bombs. Barela attempted to explain the exploding noise by saying that the truck had engine difficulties and would "cut out" as well as backfire. Further, Barela testified that the white truck was often used by others during the strike to pick up supplies.

I credit the testimony of Brevard and McLachlan over that of Barela. Brevard and McLachlan testified in a straightforward manner. Barela, on the other hand, was not credible and often relied on the eccentricities of his stepfather's truck to explain his alleged misconduct.

[2] Such a truck is owned by Barela's stepfather and was used by Barela and others during the strike.

Tom Ornellas, a contract truckdriver, testified that on September 8, while he was stopped on the picket line, he was threatened by Barela. According to Ornellas, Barela said he was going to "get" Ornellas and beat the hell out of him. Ornellas testified that Barela said "We are going to beat the hell out of you " and that Barela and Diane Cookie" Strock were" leading the band" in making various threats against him.

Barela denied threatening Ornellas in any way and denied saying anything to Ornellas. In an affidavit given shortly after these events, Ornellas alleged he was threatened by Strock but made no mention of any threats by Barela. Further, Ornellas' testimony is contradicted by Glenda Butler and Strock. Based on Ornellas' affidavit and the testimony of Butler and Strock, I do not credit Ornellas' testimony that he was threatened by Barela on September 8 or 9. However, I do credit Ornellas' testimony regarding an incident that occurred on September 9 involving Barela's driving.

Ornellas testified that on September 9, after he left Respondent's plant, he noticed five vehicles, including a white pickup truck, behind him. When Ornellas pulled onto the shoulder of the road, the five vehicles would do the same thing. Ornellas was supposed to stop and exchange vehicles with one of his employees but instead drove down the highway toward Martinez, California. As Ornellas drove up the ramp to the highway, he noticed that only the white pickup truck was still behind him, now at a very close distance. The white truck passed Ornellas' truck and cut him off several times.

Ornellas exited the highway and drove toward a highway patrol station. The white pickup truck backed up and took the same exit as Ornellas. Ornellas observed the white truck with its hood up at a location across from the highway police station. Ornellas identified Barela as the driver of the truck.

Barela admitted driving the truck on the date in question, but attempted to blame these events on mechanical difficulties. According to Barela, the truck started having mechanical difficulties and started to backfire, which caused Barela to pull to the side of the road. While he was at the side of the road, he observed Ornellas get out of his truck and exchange vehicles with his driver. The truck resumed its course and passed Barela. Barela's truck restarted and Barela continued in the same direction as the truck. Barela passed the truck but once again began experiencing mechanical difficulties. Barela pulled to the shoulder of the road. Barela then noticed Ornellas following him in a car. Barela exited the highway to see if the car would follow. According to Barela, the car followed him and then proceeded to the highway police station. Ornellas spoke to a highway patrol officer and then the officer approached Barela.

Before the hearing, Barela gave an affidavit denying that this incident occurred at all. Months later, Barela gave a second affidavit attempting to explain away the incident. I find Barela's testimony to be inherently incredible. His truck has mechanical difficulties whenever Barela needs an excuse for his conduct. I find his explanation too convenient and far less plausible than Ornellas' testimony.

3. The discharge of Dan Ramirez

On September 4 after the strike was initiated by the activation of the emergency alarm, Neftali Nevarez, supervisor in the CP department, observed Dan Ramirez throw his hardhat and safety glasses into a dumpster. Nevarez testified that he followed Ramirez to the changing room. When Nevarez arrived at the door of the changing room, he saw a large number of employees and realized for the first time that a strike was in progress. As Nevarez was walking away, Ramirez was close to him and called him "wet back," "fuck head," and "son of a bitch." According to Nevarez, Ramirez said, "Why don't you say something so I can kick your ass" and then bumped Nevarez with his shoulder. Nevarez walked away from Ramirez but Ramirez continued calling him names.

Ramirez testified that as he was walking out of the changing room to leave the plant, Nevarez put his hand on Ramirez' shoulder and told him to go back to work. Ramirez said, "We are on strike, Nef, let me through." Nevarez held his hand against Ramirez' chest and insisted that he go back to work. Ramirez told Nevarez to let him through, to "get the fuck out of my face." Nevarez continued to follow Ramirez and Ramirez repeated, "Get the hell out of my face." Ramirez denied threatening Nevarez in any way. Nevarez appeared to be an honest and forthright witness and I credit his testimony over that of Ramirez.

Jeffrey Hushion, a lab technician, testified that on September 4 he attempted to enter the plant. While Hushion was stopped at the picket line, he was confronted by a "mob" of pickets. During the time that Hushion was stopped, Ramirez told him that if he went into the plant, when Ramirez came back to work, he would find Hushion and "cut off his balls." Ramirez produced a utility knife with an exposed blade and threatened to damage Hushion's car. Shortly thereafter, Hushion stepped out of his vehicle and spoke to Leonguerrero. Leonguerrero asked Hushion not to enter the plant that day but rather to go home and return at another time. Hushion returned to his vehicle and went home. Hushion further testified that on September 9 when he was crossing the picket line, Ramirez said, "Jeff, you got no balls. Your balls are mine."

Ramirez testified that he was one of the many pickets who approached Hushion's vehicle. According to Ramirez, he told Hushion that the employees were on strike and that Hushion should "get the fuck out of here." According to Ramirez, Hushion was nervous and upset, and got out of the car to speak to Leonguerrero. Ramirez denied brandishing a knife on the picket line.

The General Counsel presented witnesses Joe Leonguerrero, Bob Lujan, Glenda Butler, and Charles Battle in an attempt to rebut Hushion's testimony. However, none of these witnesses recalled hearing what Ramirez actually said nor could they deny that he pulled a knife. To the extent that Battle testified that Ramirez did not threaten Hushion or brandish a knife, his testimony is discredited. All these witnesses confirmed that a mob surrounded Hushion's car and that Hushion was intimidated.

Hushion's testimony is credited over that of Ramirez. Hushion's testimony is more reliable than the other witnesses who were in the area but did not actually see or hear Ramirez. I find that Ramirez engaged in the misconduct attributed to him by Hushion.

4. The discharge of Bill Scheffler

Phil Ulichney, Respondent's plant manager at the time of the strike, testified that on September 4, he was coming back into the plant when he was stopped by Barela and Ramirez. According to Ulichney, while Ramirez was making some remarks to him, he heard something hit the car and he looked in his rearview mirror. Ulichney saw Scheffler walking away from the car. Ulichney later inspected the car and noticed a dent about 3 inches in length near the tail-light. Ulichney admitted that he did not see Scheffler strike the car nor did he see Scheffler with any object in his hand that might have struck the car. Ulichney admitted there were at least a dozen employees within a few feet of his car, but he only recalled Scheffler as being on the passenger side of the vehicle.

Scheffler testified that he was on the passenger side several feet away from the vehicle while Ramirez was talking to Ulichney but that nothing happened to Ulichney's vehicle while he was there. Scheffler denied striking Ulichney's vehicle. I find insufficient evidence to establish that Scheffler struck Ulichney's vehicle.

James Foster, supervisor, testified that on September 4 around 7:30 p.m. he was stopped on his way back into the plant. Foster testified that Scheffler kicked the door of Foster's vehicle and had to be restrained from kicking the vehicle again by an unidentified picketer.

James Craig, supervisor, testified that he was leaving the plant with Joe Marquez, a production supervisor, when he observed the picketers at Foster's vehicle. Craig testified that Scheffler threatened to go to Craig's home to "fuck" Craig's wife and also "kick [Craig's] ass."

Craig testified that on his way back into the plant a couple of hours later, his left rear door window was broken. According to him, he saw Scheffler running along with the vehicle and heard him say that he was going to go home and "fuck" Craig's wife. Craig's testimony was contradicted by Marquez, who testified that Scheffler was first seen on the right side of the vehicle, after the window was broken and after the vehicle had sped away. Thus, according to Marquez, Scheffler did not run alongside the vehicle nor could he have broken the window.

Scheffler testified that he did not say anything to Craig when Craig left the plant. When Craig returned to the plant, Scheffler said to Craig, "Why don't you go home and fuck your wife instead of crossing the picket line." Scheffler denied threatening Craig in any manner.

Scheffler denied kicking Foster's vehicle. Glenda Butler testified that Scheffler did not kick Foster's vehicle and that she was in a position to see Scheffler had he kicked the vehicle. Diane Strock was present at the time but did not recall seeing Scheffler.

Robin Saunders, a service accounting clerk, testified that as she was leaving Respondent's plant on September

19, she stopped her car before she could turn into the oncoming traffic. According to Saunders, Scheffler's vehicle "bumped" the back of her car and continued to push her car into the ongoing traffic. While Scheffler was driving in this manner, Art Aria, another striker, shouted "thanks Robin, thanks Robin."

Scheffler testified that he and Aria were driving home that evening and that he saw Saunders. Scheffler denied bumping Saunders' vehicle or attempting to push her into traffic. Aria, no longer employed by Respondent, did not testify. I find Saunders to be a credible witness and credit her testimony over Scheffler's denial.

5. The discharge of J. T. Stone

Brevard testified that on September 8[3] he was leaving the plant with McLachlan (who was driving) and another passenger, Bill Thomas, when they were stopped on the picket line. According to Brevard, Stone, who was speaking in a loud voice, said that Respondent had taken the food out of his family's mouth, and got very "belligerent." Stone then allegedly said, "You sorry fat son of a bitch, we know where you live and we're going to get your ass." Brevard finally testified that Stone had to be escorted away from the picket line by two picketers.

McLachlan corroborated Brevard's version of these events to some extent. McLachlan did not recall Stone's exact words but recalled his emotional and loud tone of voice. McLachlan recalled Stone saying something like "I'm going to get you." Thomas, the other passenger, did not testify.

Stone admitted calling Brevard a liar, a crook, and a thief but denied threatening Brevard or saying he was going to "get him." Stone testified that he said Brevard was taking the food out of his family's mouth and that he opened his wallet to illustrate the point. O'Farrell testified that Stone was emotional and loud and that he talked with his hands but that Stone did not threaten Brevard. Further, O'Farrell denied having escorted Stone away. O'Farrell testified that he simply put his hand on Stone's shoulders and told Stone that "it wasn't worth getting that upset." John Moore, another picketer, corroborated Stone's and O'Farrell's testimony that although Stone was loud and emotional, he never made any threats against Brevard or said that he was going to get him.

Based on the testimony of O'Farrell and Moore, I find that Stone did not threaten Brevard. Rather, I find that Stone, speaking in a loud voice and gesturing, called Brevard names and accused him of taking food from his family. However, I credit Stone's denial that he ever threatened to get Brevard. Although McLachlan did corroborate Brevard's testimony regarding Stone's tone of voice, I was not convinced that McLachlan had any independent recollection of Stone's words. In my view, McLachlan did not want to contradict Brevard. In any event, I find the testimony of O'Farrell and Moore to be reliable and I therefore credit Stone's account of this incident.

Gary Christiansen, a driver for an independent courier service, testified that on September 15 he was stopped on the picket line. While stopped, Christiansen was approached by a large black man (later identified as Stone). According to Christiansen, he asked Stone how the strike was going. Stone then asked Christiansen if he could carve his initials on the truck. Stone then asked if Christiansen's boss would mind "if the truck got all fucked up" and then struck the truck with his fist. Thereafter, Stone walked in front of the truck and then to the right rear side of the truck. Christiansen could not see Stone but he heard a "thud" coming from the rear right side of the truck. Christiansen checked the vehicle after leaving the plant and found a hole on the right rear. According to Christiansen, there was no sheriff present on the picket line during this incident. Christiansen did not impress me as a credible witness. He could not or would not recall what took place before Stone's remarks and alleged hitting of the truck.

Stone testified that he approached Christiansen on the picket line and that the driver asked him the reason for the strike. Stone then gave Christiansen a flyer explaining the Union's reasons for the strike. Christiansen asked if there had been any violence on the picket line, and Stone replied that he had heard that there had been violence early on in the strike but there had been none that day and that the sheriff was present. Christiansen then asked Stone what would happen if he ran through the picket line (with his truck). Stone said that if anyone tried that, he would leave his initials on the truck and asked Christiansen what his boss would say if he returned with a truck "all fucked up." Christiansen said he did not care about the truck, only himself. Stone denied walking to the passenger side of the vehicle and denied doing any damage to the truck. Stone heard the impact on the rear passenger side of the vehicle but was on the opposite side of the truck at the time.

Mike Christopher, another picketer, corroborated Stone's testimony. Christopher testified that he and a sheriff were standing right behind Stone. Christiansen asked Stone why the employees were striking and what Stone would do if Christiansen attempted to run the picket line. According to Christopher, Stone said he would leave his initials on the truck only after Christiansen asked what Stone would do if Christiansen did not wait at the picket line but attempted to drive through.[4] Christopher testified that he and Stone were on the opposite side of the truck when it was struck and that Stone did not hit the truck with his fist or anything else.

I did not find Christiansen to be a credible witness. Rather, I find Stone's version of these events to be more logical. Further, Stone's testimony was corroborated by Christopher, whom I find to be a credible witness. I, therefore, credit Stone's testimony over that of Christiansen.

[3] Stone testified that this incident took place on September 11. Because there is no dispute that Stone had a conversation with Brevard, the date is irrelevant.

[4] At that point in the strike, the sheriff made each vehicle await 5 minutes of picketing and then required the pickets to allow the vehicle to pass.

6. The discharge of Diane "Cookie" Strock

Ornellas testified that he was stopped on the picket line on September 8 by approximately 15 pickets. According to Ornellas, while on the picket line, Strock said that the picketers were "going to get you Ornellas and beat the shit out of you." Strock said that she knew where Ornellas lived and that he could not hide from the picketers. Strock further said the picketers would put a bomb in Ornellas' house. She also threatened to run a forklift through the front end of his truck and that Ornellas' truck would never be loaded again. After crossing the picket line and loading his truck, Ornellas was again stopped on his way out of the plant. According to Ornellas, Strock and Barela "who were leading the band" said to him that Ornellas should not bring his truck back or else he would have to buy a new one. Ornellas was friendly with Strock before the strike and she was apparently the only one in the mob he could identify. It is my impression that Ornellas attributed many of the remarks made by the mob to Strock, the one person who stood out in his mind.

Ornellas further testified that on the next day, September 9, Strock again threatened him. According to Ornellas, Strock said the other picketers would drag Ornellas out of the truck and hold him while Strock "beat the shit out of him." Strock said "she would cut off his dick and stick it in his mouth so that he would know what a cocksucker felt like." Once again Strock told Ornellas not to bring his truck back or else it would be damaged.

After crossing the picket line, Ornellas went to load his truck in the plant. According to Ornellas, Strock was standing 100 to 120 yards away and yelling "yeah you motherfucker, you better not bring that truck out, you better have your safety belt on. . . . I'm going to drag your ass out of there." He further testified that she raised her arm and pointed an object at him, but that he could not make out the object because she was so far away.

Strock, on the other hand, testified that on September 8 she merely shouted "Tommy O is a scab."[5] According to Strock, on September 9, she was one of several picketers when Ornellas stopped. Strock asked Ornellas to turn around because the employees, including Strock, had always treated him well and had loaded his truck first. She asked Ornellas "to be a man" and said that if "Fatty" Dullums, the person who loaded trucks during the strike, loaded Ornellas' truck, he would probably drive a forklift right through the truck. Strock admitted calling Ornellas a "stupid fucker" and a "scab." She further admitted telling Ornellas that after the strike she would no longer do him favors and would load him last rather than first. Strock denied threatening Ornellas.

After Ornellas crossed the picket line, Strock, accompanied by Glenda Butler and Julie Damron, walked down to the plant in an attempt to find out who was loading the truck. However, Strock was about 200 yards away from Ornellas and not in the location claimed by Ornellas. According to Ornellas, she looked through binoculars but was unable to distinguish any of the persons at the loading dock. She denied making any remarks to Ornellas at that time and testified that she was too far away to even attempt to speak to him. Finally, Strock denied saying anything to Ornellas on his way out of the plant that day. She recalled that others called him "scab" and "shrimp."

Glenda Butler corroborated Strock's testimony that Strock asked Ornellas not to cross the picket line because the employees had done him favors in the past. According to Butler, Strock told Ornellas that Dullums might drive the forklift through Ornellas' truck because Dullums could not drive a forklift. Strock told Ornellas that he was not a man and that "he had no balls." Butler accompanied Strock to the place where she attempted to watch the loading dock. According to Butler, Strock made no remarks from that point and that Ornellas was too far away for any comments to have been made.

Julie Damron further denied that Strock threatened Ornellas. According to Damron, Strock told Ornellas that employees had done favors for him in the past but would not do so after the strike. Damron admitted that some of the male picketers said to Strock "Do you want us to hold him down for you" and that Strock replied, "No, he's just a pussy. If I wanted to I could kick his ass." Damron further admitted that the picketers heckled and insulted Ornellas. Strock called Ornellas names and told him that Dullums would probably drive a forklift through Ornellas' truck. Further, Damron corroborated the testimony of Butler and Strock that Strock did not yell to Ornellas when Ornellas was at the loading dock.

I credit the testimony of Damron and Butler that Strock did not make the remarks attributed to her by Ornellas. Rather, I find Ornellas attributed remarks made by other picketers to Strock. I credit Strock's versions of these events. I further credit Damron's testimony that Strock told the male picketers that if she wanted to, "she could kick his [Ornellas'] ass."

I cannot credit Ornellas' testimony regarding the incident at the loading dock. The credible testimony establishes that Strock simply was not at the location or locations that Ornellas attempted to place her. Further, Strock was too far away to yell to Ornellas. Although Strock had binoculars with her, I find nothing threatening in such conduct.

C. The Refusal to Process and Arbitrate the Grievances Concerning the Discharges

Following the discharges of Barela, Ramirez, Scheffler, Stone, and Strock, the Union filed grievances contesting all five terminations. It is undisputed that Respondent refused to arbitrate the grievances. Respondent takes the position that the employees were discharged before there was a contract containing an arbitration provision. Further, Respondent argues that even if it was obligated to arbitrate the grievances, its refusals to arbitrate would constitute a contract violation but not a violation of the Act.

Although the contract was not executed by the Union until January 8, 1987, the Union and Respondent have agreed that the effective date of the contract is September 22, 1986. The contract by its terms was effective as of September 22. Although the Union attempted, before January 1987, to make the contract retroactive to September 19 (to cover these grievances with more certainty), the Union agreed to and signed the agreement retroactive to September 22. Respondent contends the discharges took place on September 19 rather than September 22.

On September 19, when the Union agreed to accept Respondent's proposed contract and return to work on September 22, Respondent indicated that certain employees would not be reinstated due to strike misconduct. However, it was not until September 22 that Respondent revealed the names of the employees who were not eligible for reinstatement. The Union and the General Counsel contend that the discharges of the five employees took place on September 22 and are, therefore, covered by the grievance and arbitration provisions of the current collective-bargaining agreement.

Respondent accepted and processed all other grievances filed by the Union after September 22, including the grievances concerning the suspensions of Leonguerrero and Smith. Respondent accepted and processed grievances filed after September 22, even prior to the execution of the contract by the Union.

D. Discussion and Conclusions

1. The discharges

At the end of an economic strike, an employer, unless justified by legitimate and substantial business reasons, must reinstate striking employees, lest their discharges penalize the employees for exercising their right to strike under Sections 7 and 13 of the Act. Associated Grocers of New England v. NLRB, 563 F.2d 1333 (1st Cir. 1977); NLRB v. Fleetwood Trailer Co., 389 U.S. 375, 378–379 (1967). A showing that a striking employee has engaged in serious picket line misconduct justifies a refusal to reinstate after the strike is over. Clear Pine Mouldings, 268 NLRB 1044 (1984).

The general rule regarding strike misconduct is that an employer must demonstrate an honest belief that an employee has engaged in strike misconduct. Once an employer establishes this belief, the burden shifts to the General Counsel to prove that the employee was not engaged in the alleged strike misconduct or that the misconduct was not sufficiently serious to place the employee beyond the protection of the Act. Rubin Bros. Footwear, 99 NLRB 610 (1952); General Telephone Co., 251 NLRB 737 (1980); Axelson, Inc., 285 NLRB 862 (1987).

In Clear Pine Mouldings, supra, the Board adopted the following objective test for determining whether verbal threats by strikers directed at fellow employees justify an employer's refusal to reinstate:

> Whether the misconduct is such that, under the circumstances existing, it may reasonably tend to coerce or intimidate employees in the exercise of rights protected under the Act. [268 NLRB at 1046.]

The Board went on to hold that it would "fashion remedies and policies which will discourage unfair labor practices and the resort to violence and unlawful coercion by employers and employees alike." In case of picket line and strike misconduct, the Board will deny "reinstatement and backpay to employees who exceed the bounds of peaceful and reasoned conduct." Id. at 1047.

In the instant case, Respondent has established an honest belief that each employee has engaged in strike misconduct. The question presented is whether each employee, based on all the credited evidence, has engaged in misconduct sufficient to place the employee beyond the protection of the Act.

Applying the above standards to the instant case, the conduct of striker Larry Barela in slashing tires on McLachlan's vehicle, driving in such a manner as to throw gravel at Brevard's vehicle, throwing a smoking object toward Brevard's vehicle, following Ornellas' truck, driving in a reckless manner, and attempting to cut off Ornellas' vehicle constitutes serious strike misconduct warranting Respondent's refusal to reinstate Barela at the conclusion of the strike.

Barela's conduct is inherently coercive and intimidating regarding the exercise of employees' Section 7 rights to refrain from striking or other protected activities. Barela's misconduct was not directed at nonstriking employees of Respondent but at an attorney, a supervisor, and an independent contractor. However, the same objective standard applies to the assessment of strikers' verbal and nonverbal conduct directed against persons who do not enjoy the protection of Section 7 of the Act. Clear Pine Mouldings, supra, 268 NLRB at 1046 fn. 14; PBA Inc., 270 NLRB 998 (1984).

The credited testimony establishes that striker Dan Ramirez called Supervisor Neftali Nevarez various obscene names. Further, Ramirez challenged Nevarez to say something so that Ramirez could "kick his ass." Finally, Ramirez bumped Nevarez in an attempt to punch the supervisor into a fight. Nevarez walked away and Ramirez once again called him names.

With respect to the September 4 incident involving Jeff Hushion, I found that Ramirez threatened Hushion while a mob surrounded Hushion's car. Further, I find that Ramirez produced a knife during the incident. Accordingly, I find that Ramirez has engaged in misconduct exceeding the bounds of peaceful and reasoned conduct. I shall, therefore, recommend that the allegations of the complaint regarding his discharge be dismissed.

The conduct of striker Bill Scheffler in using his vehicle to push the vehicle of nonstriking employee Robin Saunders into ongoing traffic was a reckless act, intended to cause and causing fear in Saunders. Such conduct is inherently coercive and intimidating with respect to the exercise of employees' Section 7 rights to refrain from engaging in the strike or other protected activities. I find this conduct sufficient to warrant denial of reinstatement and backpay. I, therefore, find it irrelevant that the General Counsel established that Scheffler did not damage the automobiles of Ulichney and Craig.

The credited testimony establishes that Stone called Brevard a thief, liar, and crook. Further, Stone took out his wallet to demonstrate that Brevard had taken money from his family. Stone waved his hands and was very best copy available

emotional. However, I find that Stone did not threaten Brevard.

Based on the credible evidence, I do not find that Stone's conduct reasonably tended to coerce or intimidate employees in the exercise of Section 7 rights. Although Stone may have insulted Brevard and subjected him to name calling, which Brevard need not suffer in the absence of a strike, Stone's conduct did not rise to the level of serious strike misconduct. No threats were uttered and no threatening gestures were made. The emotional tone of voice and nonthreatening gestures do not amount to force or coercion.

With respect to the incident involving Christiansen, the courier driver, I find that Stone did not threaten Christiansen. Christiansen challenged Stone by asking what would happen if he, Christiansen, ran the picket line. In answer to that question, Stone's spontaneous comments that he would leave his initials on the truck, do not appear coercive or intimidating. I do not find Stone's comments about damage to Christiansen's truck coercive in the context of Christiansen's question about what would happen if he drove through the picket line. The credited evidence establishes that Stone was not responsible for the damage to Christiansen's truck.

The comments to Christiansen, when placed in context, do not amount to threats or intimidation. Christiansen, in effect, threatened to drive through the picket line. The spontaneous response that Stone would carve his initials in the truck or that the truck would be damaged do not coerce employees in the exercise of Section 7 rights. Such remarks only threaten employees who endanger peaceful pickets. I find that Stone did not engage in misconduct sufficiently serious to deny him reinstatement after the strike. I therefore find that Respondent's discharge of Stone violated Section 8(a)(3) and (1) of the Act.

As mentioned earlier, Diane Strock called Ornellas, an independent contractor, names such as scab and shrimp. Further, in concert with other picketers, Strock said that she needed no help in beating up Ornellas and that she could easily do so if she wished. I further found that Strock did not threaten Ornellas as alleged nor did she follow him in a threatening manner. It is my belief that Ornellas heard threatening remarks and insults directed at him. However, it is unjust to hold Strock accountable for such remarks simply because she was the only person Ornellas could identify. The question presented is whether Strock's conduct, in the context of the unruly picketers, is sufficient to warrant the denial of reinstatement. In my view her conduct, while insulting and abusive, did not amount to restraint or coercion. It is well settled that the use of epithets, vulgar words, or profanity does not deprive a striker of the protection of the Act. NLRB v. McQuaide, Inc., 552 F.2d 519 (3d Cir. 1977); Linn v. Plant Guards, 383 U.S. 53, 60–61 (1966). Accordingly, I find that Strock did not engage in misconduct sufficient to warrant the denial of reinstatement and that, therefore, Respondent violated Section 8(a)(3) and (1) of the Act by discharging her.

2. The suspensions of Leonguerrero and Smith

As the General Counsel correctly argues, it is well settled that the act of going on strike is protected concerted activity, regardless of the lack of prior notice to the employer, or the impact it may have on the employer's production, or the severe inconvenience that it may likely cause. Johnny Johnson Tire Co., 271 NLRB 293, 295 (1984); Go-Lightly Footwear, 251 NLRB 42 (1980); Polytech, Inc., 195 NLRB 695, 696 (1972). The Board has held that the effect of such a work stoppage of production is incidental and does not preclude protection of the Act so long as the employees involved take reasonable precaution to avoid imminent danger to the employer's physical plant which foreseeably would result from a work stoppage. See Marshall Car Wheel & Foundry Co., 107 NLRB 314 (1953).

However, in Terry Poultry Co., 109 NLRB 1097 (1954), the Board held that a work stoppage was unprotected because it violated a longstanding rule of the employer requiring employees to tell their foremen or fellow employees if they are leaving the production line. The Board found the rule to be a reasonable one consistent with the right of an employer to enforce reasonable rules governing the conduct of its employees on company time even though such rules may limit the statutory right of employees to engage in union or concerted activities.

I find Respondent's conduct to be consistent with the principles of the cases cited by the General Counsel and the Terry Poultry case. Respondent, using dangerous chemicals in its CP department, had a longstanding, well-publicized rule requiring operators to be properly relieved before leaving the plant. The purpose of Respondent's rule is to ensure safety to the equipment, the plant, and the general public.

The burden imposed on employees to meet the requirement of the rule was minimal. The employees could have avoided discipline by notifying their supervisor of the status of the chemical process or by shutting down their equipment. Communication to their supervisors would have taken no longer than 15 minutes.

The employees did not take the reasonable precautions mentioned in the Johnnie Johnson and Marshall Car Wheel cases. Although no actual damage took place, that is not the test. There was a reasonably foreseeable possibility of danger—the purpose of the rule. When balanced against the significant danger involved, even accounting for the low probability of danger (known to the employees but not the supervisors), the restrictions placed on the employees' right to engage in union activities appear minimal. In this case, the danger was eminent (significant) rather than imminent (impending). However, Respondent's rule was designed for safety purposes and did not require anything more than the reasonable precautions mentioned in the cases cited by the General Counsel.

Further, in this case, there is no evidence that Respondent was motivated by any purpose other than enforcement of its longstanding safety rule. Other strikers avoided discipline by compliance with the rule. Moreover, the penalty invoked, a suspension, was not discriminatory and, therefore, should not restrain or coerce employees in the exercise of Section 7 rights. Respondent clearly indicated that the discipline was imposed for violation of the safety rule and for no other reason. Finally, Respondent has agreed to arbitrate these suspensions under the collective-bargaining agreement.

3. The refusal to arbitrate

As mentioned earlier, the General Counsel contends that Respondent's refusal to arbitrate the grievances over the five discharges constitutes a violation of Section 8(a)(5) of the Act. Respondent, on the other hand, contends that the discharges took place before the effective date of the contract and, therefore, was not subject to the grievance and arbitration procedures of the contract. Secondly, Respondent contends, assuming the discharges are grievable, that the refusal to arbitrate a specific grievance or type of grievance is not a unilateral change in violation of Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act.

The Board has long held that Congress specifically rejected a proposal that every breach of a labor contract gives rise to an unfair labor practice. See, e.g., Packinghouse Workers (Wilson & Co.), 89 NLRB 310, 317 (1950). Further, it is well settled that the refusal to arbitrate a single grievance, even if the refusal is a contract breach, is not in itself an unfair labor practice. Mid-American Milling Co., 282 NLRB 926 (1987). This precedent was recently reaffirmed in Indiana & Michigan Electric Co., 284 NLRB 53 (1987), and Dallas Morning News, 285 NLRB 53 (1987).

Although a breach of a labor contract is not ipso facto an unfair labor practice, it does not follow that when an employer unilaterally effects a change which has a continuing impact on a basic term or condition of employment, it must be ruled out as an unfair labor practice simply because it happens also to be a breach of contract. C & S Industries, 158 NLRB 454, 458 (1966). See also B. N. Beard Co, 231 NLRB 191 (1977). Where a breach of contract substantially infringes on the statutory right of a bargaining representative or amounts to a substantial renunciation of the principles of collective bargaining, the Board has found a violation of the Act. See, e.g., Sea Bay Manor Home, 253 NLRB 739, 740–741 (1980); Papercraft Corp., 212 NLRB 240 (1974).

In the instant case, Respondent has not refused to take all, or even most, grievances to arbitration. Cf. Paramount Potato Chip Co., 252 NLRB 794 (1980). Rather, Respondent has accepted grievances and agreed to arbitration except on a very narrow and specific grievance matter. See Whiting Roll Up Door Mfg. Corp., 257 NLRB 734 (1981); and Bacardi Corp., 286 NLRB 422 (1987). Respondent has refused to arbitrate the discharges because they occurred before the effective date of the contract and its grievance-arbitration provisions. Thus, assuming Respondent is incorrect whether the contract covers the discharge disputes, Respondent has not repudiated or abrogated the grievance-arbitration procedures. Hence, the record establishes at most a breach of contract, but does not establish that Respondent committed an unfair labor practice.[6] Accordingly, I shall recommend dismissal of this allegation of the complaint.

3. By discharging employees Diane Strock and J. T. Stone, Respondent violated Section 8(a)(3) and (1) of the Act.

4. The unfair labor practices found above are unfair labor practices affecting commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

5. By discharging employees Larry Barela, Bill Scheffler, and Dan Ramirez, Respondent did not violate the Act.

6. By suspending employees Ron Smith and Joe Leonguerrero, Respondent did not violate the Act.

7. Except as specifically found above, Respondent did not violate the Act.

THE REMEDY

Having found that Respondent engaged in certain unfair labor practices, I shall recommend that it cease and desist therefrom and take certain affirmative action designed to effectuate the purposes of the Act. Having found that Respondent unlawfully discharged its employees J. T. Stone and Diane Strock, I shall order Respondent to offer Stone and Strock immediate and full reinstatement to their former positions of employment or, if those positions are no longer available, to substantially equivalent positions, without prejudice to their seniority or other rights and privileges, and to make Stone and Strock whole for any loss of pay they may have suffered by reason of Respondent's discrimination against them, with interest to be computed in the manner prescribed in F. W. Woolworth Co., 90 NLRB 289 (1950); and New Horizons for the Retarded, 283 NLRB 1173 (1987).[7]

On these findings of fact and conclusions of law and on the entire record, I issue the following recommended[8]

[6] See also Malrite of Wisconsin, 198 NLRB 241 (1974), enfd. in relevant part 494 F.2d 1136 (D.C. Cir. 1974), which held that an employer's refusal to comply with an arbitration award was not an unfair labor practice. Enforcement of the arbitration award was held to be better left to the usual court processes.

[7] Under New Horizons, interest is computed at the "short-term" Federal rate for the underpayment of taxes as set out in the 1986 amendment to 26 U.S.C. §§ 6621. Interest on amounts accrued before January 1, 1987 (the effective date of the amendment), shall be computed as in Florida Steel Corp., 231 NLRB 651 (1977).

[8] If no exceptions are filed as provided by Sec. 102.46 of the Board's Rules and Regulations, the findings, conclusions, and recommended Order shall, as provided in Sec. 102.48 of the Rules, be adopted by the Board and all objections to them shall be deemed waived for all purposes.

DECISION AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN STEPHENS AND MEMBERS JOHANSEN AND BABSON

On June 30, 1986, Administrative Law Judge Earldean V.S. Robbins issued the attached decision. The Respondents filed exceptions and a supporting brief.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the decision and the record in light of the exceptions and brief and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings, and conclusions only to the extent consistent with this Decision and Order.

The judge found that the Respondents violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act by refusing to furnish the Union with the following requested information:

> 1. The number of writers age 40 and over;
> 2. The number of writers with physical handicap [sic]; and
> 3. For each category of writers (i.e., Caucasian, ethnic minority group, male, female, over 40, or physically handicapped) employed during the fourth quarter of 1984 and the first, second and third quarters of 1985 under the 1981 basic agreement in television, an indication of job classification (i.e., freelance story assignment, freelance first draft assignment, staff writer, staff story editor, or staff writer/producer.)

The Respondents contended, inter alia, that the General Counsel should be estopped from relitigating the issues raised by the complaint as they had been resolved in a prior arbitration proceeding concerning an earlier request for information by the Union. The Union contended that, in addition to sex and ethnicity data, it is statutorily entitled to information regarding age and physical handicap status, and job classifications of unit employees. The judge found that the arbitrator's decision had preclusive effect only to the extent set forth in the Board's deferral to arbitration policy. She then rejected deferral because she found that the issues before the Board were not the issues before the arbitrator as required by the Board's standards for deferral set forth in Spielberg Mfg. Co., 112 NLRB 1080 (1955), and Olin Corp., 268 NLRB 573 (1984). We disagree.

The facts are more fully set forth in the judge's decision. Briefly stated they demonstrate that the Respondents and the Union have been parties to a collective-bargaining agreement at all material times.[1] The 1981 collective-bargaining agreement between the Respondents and the Union contained a grievance-arbitration procedure that culminated in final and binding arbitration. The agreement also contained a "Non-Discrimination" provision, article 38, which provides in relevant part:

> ARTICLE 38–NON-DISCRIMINATION
> A. Policy
> 1. . . . there shall be no discrimination due to sex, age, race, religion, sexual preference, color, national origin, or physical handicap.
> . . . .
> C. Human Resources Coordinating Committee
> The Companies and the Guild shall establish a Human Resources Coordinating Committee which shall meet upon request of either party. . . . The purpose of this Committee is as follows:
> 1. to establish the Data Submission Program and to analyze and review employment data submitted thereunder . . . .
> . . . .
> 4. to explore and consider additional programs the primary purpose of which would be to enhance and expand employment in writing capacities for members of minority groups in the motion picture and television industry.

[1] The Respondents and the Union were parties to a collective-bargaining agreement that was effective from March 17, 1981 to February 18, 1985. Thereafter, the parties negotiated a successor agreement. Although at the time of the hearing the parties' 1985 drafting committee had not completed its task, the judge found that during the 1985 negotiations there were no significant changes made in art. 38, discussed below.

D. Data Submission Program

1. The Company shall submit to the Guild within 30 days after receipt of a written request by the Guild (but not more frequently than once a calendar quarter) a report of the sex and ethnicity of writers employed by Company under this Agreement during the preceding calendar quarter.

Commencing with the fourth quarter of 1982 and continuing through 1983 and the first three quarters of 1984, the Union asked the Respondents for information regarding the sex and ethnicity of writers they employed, as well as additional information on employment patterns, i.e., a breakdown of the sex and ethnicity data by job classifications. Only one of the Respondents complied with these requests.

Further, during the first 3 months of 1983, the Human Resources Coordinating Committee (HRCC) established by article 38 of the contract met on a number of occasions to negotiate concerning the data submission program referred to in that article. During the HRCC meetings, the Union initially demanded that the Respondents provide it with information on physical handicap and age, in addition to sex and ethnicity. The Union also sought information about the nature of the unit employees' employment, a description of the project (title and production number), and the specific job assignment (e.g., story, first or second draft, staff writer, story editor, writer/producer) of the unit employees by sex, ethnic group, age, and handicap status.

The Respondents' representatives objected to furnishing any data other than sex and ethnicity, and in February 1983 the Union dropped its demand that the data submission program include age and handicap information. The record shows that the HRCC negotiations broke down in March 1983 because the parties disagreed on whether the information supplied—beyond sex and ethnicity data—would be treated as confidential within the HRCC.

Faced with the Respondents' continued refusal to comply with its requests for sex and ethnicity information, the Union filed a grievance and ultimately in 1984 the parties participated in an arbitration proceeding with respect to the Respondents' obligation to furnish the Union with such information under article 38 of the contract.[2]

The Respondents contended in that proceeding that they had no contractual obligation to furnish the requested data because the data submission program had never been established in accordance with article 38. The arbitrator's decision noted that the controversy stemmed from the apparent conflicting requirements of article 38.C.1 and article 38.D.1 of the 1981 collective-bargaining agreement. The arbitrator then determined, after reviewing the parties' bargaining history with respect to article 38 and the article 38 language itself, that the Respondents were obligated under article 38.D.1 of the contract to submit the sex and ethnicity data requested by the Union. In so concluding, the arbitrator found that the establishment of the data submission program was self-executing and, therefore, the Respondents' obligation to furnish sex and ethnicity data required by article 38.D.1 was not contingent on the HRCC's establishment of a data submission program. He further concluded, however, that this determination did not render the "to establish" language of article 38.C.1 meaningless. Rather, he concluded that > Article 38.C.1 contemplates a Data Submission Program that includes sex and ethnicity data at the minimum, but that may also be expanded to include other data, as determined by the Coordinating Committee. In this sense, Article 38.D.1 parallels the authority of the Coordinating Committee set forth in Article 38.C.4 namely to explore and consider additional programs. . . .

The arbitrator held, however, that the Respondents' failure to submit the requested information, including sex and ethnicity data, was not "unjustified" within the meaning of the liquidated damages provision of the collective-bargaining agreement, since the Union's request extended far beyond sex and ethnicity data to include a breakdown by job classification. Thus, the arbitrator emphasized that, absent a data submission program negotiated through the HRCC, the Respondents were not obligated to provide any information beyond the sex and ethnicity of unit employees. He added, however, that the Union did not waive its right to the sex and ethnicity data by requesting the additional information on employment patterns.

The alleged unfair labor practice here involves the Respondents' refusal to comply with the Union's requests subsequent to the arbitration award for information pertaining to the age, physical handicaps, and job classifications of unit employees for the fourth quarter of 1984 and the first three quarters of 1985, a time period not covered by the arbitration award. As such, the information requests at issue here, as the requests considered by the arbitrator, seek data beyond the sex and ethnicity of unit employees.

[2] On October 20, 1983, the Union filed an unfair labor practice charge in Case 31-CA-13606 alleging, inter alia, that the Respondents failed to provide the Union with necessary and relevant information for it to enforce and administer art. 38 of the contract. Thereafter, the Respondents and the Union agreed to arbitrate the dispute and the Regional Director deferred the charge pursuant to the Board's arbitration deferral policy in Dubo Mfg. Corp., 142 NLRB 431 (1963). Subsequent to the arbitrator's award, the Regional Director dismissed the charge because "the issues alleged were resolved in the Arbitral forum."

It is well settled that an employer has an obligation to supply requested information that is reasonable and necessary to the exclusive bargaining representative's responsibilities. NLRB v. Acme Industrial Co., 385 U.S. 432 (1967); NLRB v. Truitt Mfg. Co., 351 U.S. 149 (1956). A union, however, may contractually relinquish a statutory bargaining right if the relinquishment is expressed in clear and unmistakable terms. Metropolitan Edison Co. v. NLRB, 460 U.S. 693 (1983); Clinchfield Coal Co., 275 NLRB 1384 (1985); Timken Roller Bearing Co., 138 NLRB 15, 16 (1962). In United Technologies Corp., 274 NLRB 504 at 507 (1985), the Board noted with approval the following language of the court in Chesapeake & Potomac Telephone Co. v. NLRB, 687 F.2d 633, 636 (2d Cir. 1982), enfg. 259 NLRB 225 (1981):

> [N]ational labor policy disfavors waivers of statutory rights by a union and thus a union's intention to waive a right must be clear before a claim of waiver can succeed. Waivers can occur in any of three ways: by express provision in the collective-bargaining agreement, by the conduct of the parties (including past practices, bargaining history, and action or inaction), or by a combination of the two. The language of a collective bargaining agreement will effectuate a waiver only if it is "clear and unmistakable" in waiving the statutory right. [Citation omitted.]

With these principles in mind, we have examined article 38 of the collective-bargaining agreement and the parties' bargaining history regarding article 38. In agreement with the findings and the rationale of the arbitrator, we conclude that the parties contractually agreed that sex and ethnicity data was the minimum information that the Respondents must supply to the Union under article 38. We also find that the parties agreed that the minimum information that the Respondents must supply to the Union under article 38 could be expanded to include additional data as determined by the HRCC. As mentioned above, however, the record shows that the parties agreed during HRCC negotiations that the Respondents would not be required to submit age and handicap data. On the basis of the foregoing, we conclude that article 38 constitutes a waiver of whatever statutory right the Union might otherwise have to the information involved here. We find that the Union assigned to the HRCC whatever right it may have to article 38 information in addition to sex and ethnicity data in exchange for the Respondents' commitment to resolve the Union's further entitlement to article 38 information through the HRCC. Although that forum may not have produced the desired results from the Union's point of view, the failure to produce these results does not allow the Union to obtain through the Act data that it had bargained over and otherwise contractually provided for in its collective-bargaining agreement.[3] Hearst Corp., 113 NLRB 1067 (1955).

In Olin, the Board reaffirmed its commitment to the standards set forth in Spielberg, which held that the Board would defer to an arbitration award where the proceedings appear to have been fair and regular, all parties have agreed to be bound, and the decision of the arbitrator is not clearly repugnant to the purposes and policies of the Act. In addition, the Board in Olin also clarified the Raytheon Co.[4] requirement that the arbitrator must have considered the unfair labor practice issue for deferral to be appropriate. Under the standard set forth in Olin, an arbitrator has adequately considered the unfair labor practice issue if the contractual issue is factually parallel to the unfair labor practice issue, and the arbitrator was presented generally with the facts relevant to resolving the unfair labor practice.

We find that deferral is appropriate here because the contractual issues involved in the arbitration proceeding are factually parallel to the statutory issue and the arbitrator adequately considered the alleged unfair labor practice at issue here. In this regard, the resolution of both the contractual issue and the unfair labor practice allegation is contingent on the factual finding of whether the Respondents were obligated to furnish the Union with information in addition to sex and ethnicity data. Although the issue framed to the arbitrator may have limited the question only to the Union's right to sex and ethnicity data, in resolving that and related damages issues the arbitrator considered the broader issue of the scope of article 38. He thus concluded that the contract "contemplates a Data Submission Program that includes sex and ethnicity at the minimum, but that may also be expanded to include other data as determined by the Coordinating Committee [emphasis added]." Thus, the arbitrator found that under article 38 the Union was entitled to sex and ethnicity data, but that the Union was entitled only to such additional information as the HRCC determined. That finding necessarily involves consideration of the same factual question

[3] We note that there is no contention, and the evidence does not establish, that the failure of the HRCC to meet after March 25, 1983, was due to any bad faith by the Respondents.

presented by the complaint in this case, i.e., the extent of the Respondents' obligation to furnish information in connection with the contractual nondiscrimination provision. Accordingly, we find that the arbitrator addressed the precise issue raised here of whether the Union is entitled to information in addition to sex and ethnicity data.

We also find that the parties presented the arbitrator with the facts relevant to resolve the instant unfair labor practice issue. Thus, a review of the arbitrator's decision shows that he was presented with virtually the same evidence in support of the contractual issues before him as was subsequently presented by the parties to the judge, i.e., the history of the 1981 bargaining with respect to article 38, the parties' negotiations through the HRCC regarding the nature and type of data to be submitted, and the article 38 language itself.[5] The arbitrator was aware that the arbitration proceeding before him arose from a deferred unfair labor practice charge filed by the Union which, like the instant charge, alleged that the Respondents' refusal to furnish article 38-related information was in violation of the Act. Accordingly, as we find that the contractual issues are factually parallel to the statutory issue here and that the parties presented the arbitrator with facts relevant to resolving the issues,[6] we are satisfied that the alleged unfair labor practice raised by the complaint was adequately considered by the arbitrator, and we shall defer to the arbitration award.[7] Accordingly, we find that the Respondents did not violate the Act by failing to furnish the requested information to the Union.[8]

[5] The sole exception appears to be the evidence as to the parties' subsequent 1985 negotiations. As found by the judge, that evidence demonstrates that during the 1985 negotiations there was some discussion within the art. 38 subcommittee whether the HRCC was a viable committee to continue in existence. There were no proposals made to expand the data submission program. Although at the time of the hearing in this case the drafting committee had not completed its task, the judge found that the working draft demonstrated that there were no significant changes made in art. 38.

[6] See Chevron, USA, Inc., 275 NLRB 949 (1985), and Furr's Inc., 264 NLRB 554 (1982), in which the Board found deferral to prior arbitration awards appropriate under Spielberg. In those cases, although prior arbitration awards involved employees different from those named in the Board proceedings, the Board found deferral appropriate because the arbitration proceedings involved the same contractual questions and legal issues as presented in the unfair labor practice complaints. Compare Litton Systems, 283 NLRB 973 (1987), in which the Board refused to defer to a prior arbitration award because factual developments occurring after the award gave rise to new issues and the charging party union took a position different from that which it had taken in the arbitration proceeding. Unlike in Litton, here the Union's information request raises the same issues and contentions as raised in the arbitration proceeding.

[7] There is no contention that the proceedings were not fair and regular, that all parties had not agreed to be bound, or that the arbitrator's award is repugnant to the Act.

[8] We find it unnecessary to reach the Respondents' argument that the parties agreed that the art. 38 information would be correlated by the single job classification of "writer," and not by the breakdown of writing assignments within that classification as called for in the Union's data request.

ORDER

The complaint is dismissed.

CHAIRMAN STEPHENS, dissenting.

I would affirm the judge's finding of a violation in this case because I do not regard the statutory and contractual issues as factually parallel, with the consequence that I find deferral inappropriate. Neither do I find evidence sufficient to establish that the Union clearly and unmistakably waived its statutory right to the information at issue.

Because the collective-bargaining agreement had a nondiscrimination clause prohibiting discrimination on a number of grounds, including sex, ethnicity, age, and physical handicap, the Union had the right, under our Act, to request and obtain information on these work force characteristics.[1] That right is not dependent on any contractual provision guaranteeing the right to such information.[2] Thus, the arbitrator's decision regarding the provision of contractually guaranteed information on sex and ethnicity does not determine any rights the Union enjoyed under the Act to this or any additional information unless it can be said that the arbitrator determined that the Union had contractually waived entitlement to such information.[3] Because it seems clear that the arbitrator was not asked to, and did not, decide whether the Union waived statutory rights in this matter, there is no factually parallel decision, required under Olin, to which we can defer in this regard.[4]

With respect to the waiver question now before us, I would have no trouble finding a waiver to information beyond that contemplated in the provisions of the agreement relating to information bearing on the nondiscrimination provision if the data submission program had worked as the parties expected. The parties clearly contemplated using the Human Resources Coordinating Committee as the forum for working out the scope and format of submission of data other than sex and ethnicity.

[1] The Respondents do not challenge the judge's finding, with which I agree, that the information requested is relevant to the Union's obligation to monitor compliance with the nondiscrimination clause. However, they do argue, on relevance grounds, that the Union is not entitled to the information in the format requested, i.e., statistically categorized by job classifications. I agree with the judge, for the reason set out by her, that this argument has no merit.

[2] NLRB v. Acme Industrial Co., 385 U.S. 432 (1967).

[3] Globe-Union Inc., 233 NLRB 1458, 1460 (1977).

[4] Moreover, even assuming that deferral is appropriate with respect to the Union's request for sex and ethnicity data considered by the arbitrator, in no event is deferral proper with respect to requests for the same or additional information made subsequent to the arbitrator's award, because (1) it is by definition not possible to pass on the propriety of requests made in futuro, and (2) the arbitrator did not retain jurisdiction for the purpose of resolving future disputes over requests for information. Kroger Co., 226 NLRB 512, 513 fn. 6 (1976).

Thus, the Union was bound to seek to obtain information on age and physical handicap through that channel, and it waived any statutory right to demand such information directly from the Respondents, at least so long as that committee was functioning for that purpose. The Union and the Respondents did seek to resolve their differences through that committee but, owing to a disagreement over confidentiality provisions, that arrangement simply broke down. I do not view the Union's agreement to channel such information requests through that committee as an unequivocal waiver of its statutory right to information relevant to contract monitoring that survives the channel's breakdown. Because the existence of a functioning committee was an express expectation of both parties when they negotiated the waiver, the Union is now entitled to rescind the waiver and revert to its statutory right in seeking relevant information.

Neither do I find the Union's act of dropping its demand for information on age and physical handicap, while committee negotiations were still viable, a waiver of its right to that information once it was clear that no agreement was going to be reached. Had the parties reached an agreement on data submission reports that excluded such information, of course, waiver could properly be found.[5]

In sum, I reach the following conclusions: (1) the Union's request for information on writers' sex, ethnicity, age, and physical handicap was a request for information relevant to monitoring the contractual nondiscrimination prohibition; (2) although the arbitrator was aware of the then pending unfair labor practice charges, he did not consider any issue other than the Union's entitlement to information under the contractual provisions; (3) the Union did not waive its statutory right to such information in the event the Human Resources Coordinating Committee was unable to produce an agreement. For these reasons, I would find that the Respondents violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act by not supplying the requested information after the committee process broke down.

[5] My colleagues are correct that Hearst Corp., 113 NLRB 1067 (1955), is authority for finding waiver where the abandonment of a demand, after full bargaining, is reflected in a final agreement. Here, to the contrary, no such agreement was ever reached on which the parties could rely for stabilizing the bargaining relationship with respect to rights to information.

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

EARLDEAN V.S. ROBBINS, Administrative Law Judge. This matter was heard before me in Los Angeles, California, on 29 January 1986. The charge was filed by Writers Guild of America, West, Inc. (the Guild) on 24 June 1985, and copies thereof were served on Respondent's on 26 June 1985. The complaint, which issued on 23 August 1985, alleges that Respondents violated Section 8(a)(1) and (5) of the National Labor Relations Act (the Act). The basic issue is whether Respondents unlawfully refused to provide information requested by the Guild, which information was necessary for and relevant to the Guild's performance of its function as the exclusive collective-bargaining representative of certain of Respondents' employees.

On the entire record, including my observation of the demeanor of the witnesses, and after due consideration of the briefs filed by the parties, I make the following

II. LABOR ORGANIZATION

The complaint alleges, Respondents admit, and I find that the Guild is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

III. THE ALLEGED UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

The member-companies of the Association of Motion Picture and Television Producers, Inc., the member-companies of AMPTP, and certain other employers, including Respondents MGM/UA, ABC, CBS, NBC, and Disney were parties to a multiemployer collective-bargaining agreement with the Guild covering a unit of writers effective by its terms from 17 March 1981 to 18 February 1985. This agreement (the 1981 agreement) provides, inter alia:

> A. Policy
> 1. . . . there shall be no discrimination due to sex, age, race, religion, sexual preference, color, national origin, or physical handicap.
> . . . .
> C. Human Resources Coordinating Committee
> The Companies and the Guild shall establish a Human Resources Coordinating Committee which shall meet upon request of either party. . . . The purpose of this Committee is as follows:
> 1. to establish the Data Submission Program and to analyze and review employment data submitted thereunder.

. . . .

D. Data Submission Program

1. The Company shall submit to WGA within 30 days after receipt of a written request by the Guild (but no more frequently than once a calendar quarter) a report of the sex and ethnicity of writers employed by Company under this Agreement during the preceding calendar quarter.

The agreement contains no specific provisions regarding the submission of data within the article 38A categories. Nor does it specifically resolve what, on the surface, appears to be a conflict between the provision of article 38D, which requires quarterly data submission, on request, of a report of the sex and ethnicity of writers employed by signatory employers and the provision of article 38C, which establishes a human resources coordinating committee whose purpose is to establish a data submission program, and which contains no limitations as to the data to be submitted.

Similarly, evidence as to the negotiations leading to the 1981 agreement does not conclusively resolve this question. The Guild's initial proposal, dated 5 April 1981, provided for no discrimination due to sex, age, race, religion, sexual preference, creed, color, or national origin and required that the employer submit, on request, affirmative action data to the Guild. On 17 February 1981 the employers counterproposed that the employers provide the Guild, on request but not more frequently than once a calendar quarter, a report of the sex, ethnicity, and age of writers covered by the agreement. This proposal further provided for the creation of a nondiscrimination coordinating committee whose purpose would be, inter alia, to ananlyze and review employment data supplied by the Employers. The Employers' 1 April 1981 proposal, as well as the earlier counterproposal, provided that the employers submit a report of the sex and ethnicity of writers employed under the agreement, and further that the data "furnished in accordance with this Article shall be for the purpose of facilitating the meeting which the Guild may request" on 10 days notice "to discuss any matter relating to alleged discrimination, fair employment or the policy expressed [in Article 38]." There was no essential change in the employers' 28 April counterproposal.

The Guild's 10 July counterproposal did not restrict the submission of sex and ethnicity data to the purpose of "facilitating the meeting which the Guild or the employer may request . . . to discuss any matter relating to alleged discrimination, fair employment or the policy expressed [in Article 38]. It did provide for the creation of a human resources coordinating committee, one of whose purposes is "to establish and supervise the data submission program and to analyze and review the employment data submitted thereunder. . . ."

Dean Farris, an employer-member of the negotiating subcommittee on article 38, testified that when the Guild spokesperson presented the proposal for article 38 she expressed concern regarding the employment of minorities as writers in the motion picture and television industry and stated that the proposal was being made in an effort to stimulate employment opportunities for minorities.

Following the presentation of the Employers' counterproposal, and at the request of the Guild, an article 38 subcommittee was established. According to Farris, the emphasis in the subcommittee discussions was on enhancing the employment opportunities for minorities. Jim Tisdale, a Black Guild representative on the subcommittee, was insistent that efforts be focused on minorities, and concern was expressed by the Guild that a broadening of efforts would dilute minority opportunities. Employer-representatives expressed concern as to possible first amendment and reverse discrimination problems. A Guild spokesperson represented that there was a very vocal group of women within the Guild who did not want females incorporated in any affirmative action effort because they felt there was no discrimination being practiced within the industry against women in the writing categories. The Employers urged that failure to incorporate women would cause reverse discrimination problems.

As a result of this discussion, the Employers redrafted their counterproposal[1] to pinpoint, to the extent they felt it was legal, the employment of minorities and, according to Farris, agreement was reached to deal with race and sex only. However, he was unable to relate specifically what was said in this regard. According to him, the only time that an expansion of these two categories was discussed was at one session in which one of the producers said he would personally like to see the physically handicapped included. It was determined, however, that it was not necessary to incorporate the physically handicapped into the contract, as there were no problems with that group that needed to be rectified.

On the last night of the negotiations, according to Farris, the data submission program was one of the two or three open issues. The negotiating committee determined that the form to be utilized for submissions would be developed by the human resources coordinating committee. Farris further testified that during the drafting committee meetings, which commenced immediately following the negotiation, there was no discussion of the type of data to be included under the data submission program, nor was there any agreement to include anything other than sex and ethnicity.[2]

Following the 1981 negotiations, the human resources coordinating committee (HRCC), was established. On 29 December 1982 the Guild sent AMPTP a proposed data reporting form that it wished to discuss at the first meeting of HRCC scheduled for 7 January. This form provided for statistical data as to sex, ethnicity, age, and physical handicap by job classification. On 26 January 1983 AMPTP sent the Guild a proposed data reporting form that it wished to discuss at an HRCC meeting scheduled for 7 February. This form provided for employment data only as to sex and ethnicity.

[2] Farris was not a member of the drafting committee, but did attend some of the sessions.

According to Farris, at the 7 February meeting of HRCC, as primary spokesperson for the Employers, he objected to the inclusion of the age and physically handicapped categories on the grounds that they had not been negotiated and specifically had not been included in the requirements for data submission in the agreement. He stated that the breakdowns by job classification went far beyond what the Employers felt was necessary and agreed on. Farris also testified that it is his recollection that the Guild representatives on the committee agreed to his objections to the inclusion of age and physically handicapped, as not having been incorporated into the agreement and further agreed to exclude it from their format; but did not agree to exclude the breakdown by job classification. Jane Ellison, as spokesperson for the Guild, stated they felt the breakdown was necessary in order to identify in what categories writers were being employed. The Guild then proposed a data submission form identical to the one earlier proposed by them, except that it dropped the age and physical handicap categories and agreed to drop one of the job classification categories.[3] With these exceptions, no agreement was never reached as to what should or should not be included on the data submission form.

Commencing with the fourth quarter of 1982 and continuing through the first two or three quarters of 1983, the Guild requested sex and ethnicity data according to a job classification breakdown. With one exception, the Employers did not comply with these requests.

On 20 October 1983, the Guild filed an unfair labor practice charge in Case 31-CA-13606, alleging, inter alia, that Respondents failed and refused to provide the Guild with information relevant and necessary to its ability to enforce and administer article 38 of the parties' collective-bargaining agreement. The parties agreed to arbitrate the underlying dispute in this case and the Regional Director deferred the charge pursuant to the Board's arbitration deferral policy in Dubo Mfg. Corp., 142 NLRB 431 (1963). The Guild continued to request the same information for the remaining quarters of 1983 and for the first three quarters of 1984.

By letter dated 28 December 1984, the Guild requested that Respondents furnish the following information for the third quarter of 1984:

> 1. The number of writers age 40 and over;
> 2. The number of writers with physical handicap; and
> 3. For each category of writers (i.e., Caucasian, ethnic minority group, male, female, over 40, or physically handicapped) employed during the third quarter of 1984 under the 1981 basic agreement in television, an indication of job classification (i.e., freelance story assignment, freelance first draft assignment, staff writer, staff story editor, or staff writer/producer).

During the arbitration, the Guild alleged that Respondents breached the 1981 agreement in that, with one exception, they had submitted no data regarding the sex and ethnicity of writers in their employ despite the requirements of article 38D(1). Relying on article 38C(1), Respondents urged that because that provision requires the HRCC "to establish" the data submission program, their obligation to furnish sex and ethnicity data comes into being only after the committee had established the program; and, since the committee has not yet done so, they neither have, nor have had, any obligation to submit any data. The Guild urged that the data submission program was "established" when the agreement was executed and thus the Companies have been obligated to submit data, pursuant to the limitations of article 38D(2), since that time.

On 9 January 1985 Arbitrator Murray L. Schwartz issued an opinion in which he concluded that, based on the collective-bargaining history and the structure and policy of article 38, the data submission requirement of the contract is self-executing and the Companies are required by its terms to furnish sex and ethnicity data. He further concluded.:

> That determination does not render the "to establish" language of Article 38.C.1 meaningless. Article 38.C.1 contemplates a Data Submission Program that includes sex and ethnicity data at the minimum, but that may also be expanded to include other data, as determined by the [HRCC]. In this sense, Article 38.D.1 parallels the authority of the [HRCC] set forth in Article 38.C.4, namely, to "explore and consider additional programs."

Accordingly, the arbitrator found that Respondents were obligated to furnish sex and ethnicity data to the Guild under article 38D(1).

As to the Guild's request for a determination that it had not waived its statutory and contractual rights to receive such data by requesting a job classification breakdown, the arbitrator concluded that inasmuch as he had held that Respondents are required by article 38D to submit sex and ethnicity reports the Guild's statutory rights were not adversely affected. However, the arbitrator further found that, as the Guild's demand for data extended beyond sex and ethnicity into job classification areas, the refusal of the Respondents to submit sex and ethnicity data in response to the Guild's written request was not "unjustified" under article 38, and that consequently the Guild was not entitled to an award of liquidated damages because of the companies' failure to file reports prior to any that may have been demanded for the third quarter of 1984. Accordingly, the Respondents were ordered to submit a report of the sex and ethnicity of the writers employed by them during the fourth quarter of 1982, 1983, and the first two quarters of 1984 covering all employees employed in any capacity as writers.

[3] The classifications proposed by the Guild were:
1. Freelance
(a) story
(b) first draft
(c) second draft
2. Staff
(a) staff writer
(b) story editor
(c) writer producer
The category the Guild agreed to drop was that of second draft in the freelance category.

However, it was further ordered that the Guild should not recover liquidated damages for the Respondents' failure to submit such reports.

By letter dated 5 February 1985 the Guild requested that the Regional Director investigate that portion of the charge in Case 31–CA–13606, which alleged that Respondents "have failed and refused to provide [the Guild] with information relevant and necessary to [the Guild's] ability to enforce and administer Article 38 of the parties' collective-bargaining agreement in further violation of Section 8(a)(1) and (5) of the Act." In support thereof, the Guild argued that the arbitrator did not consider nor decide whether Respondents breached the contract or violated the Act with respect to their continuing refusal to provide the Guild with information concerning the writers' job classifications. On 9 May 1985 the Regional Director dismissed the charge in Case 31–CA–13606 on the grounds that the issues alleged were resolved in the arbitral forum. The Guild did not appeal this dismissal.

Following negotiations in January and February 1985, an oral agreement, in principle, was reached on a 1985 collective-bargaining agreement, which was ratified by the employees on or about 18 March 1985. According to Farris, there was some discussion within the 1985 article 38 subcommittee whether the HRCC was a viable committee to continue in existence. There were no proposals, as he recalls, to expand the data submission program. At the time of the hearing, the drafting committee had not completed its task. However, the working draft corrobates Farris' testimony that no significant changes were made in article 38.

Guild's 28 December 1984 request for information was repeated on 18 March 1985 for the fourth quarter of 1984; on 25 June 1985 for the first quarter of 1985; on 30 September 1985 for the second quarter of 1985; and on 31 December 1985 for the third quarter of 1985. Certain of the employer-signatories complied with these requests but most of them, including Respondents, did not.

Conclusions

1. The relevance of the requested information

It is well established that an employer is obligated to provide the collective-bargaining representative of its employees, on request, with information that is relevant and necessary for the proper performance of a union's duties as a collective-bargaining representative. This obligation extends not only to information that is useful and relevant for the purpose of contract negotiations, but also to information necessary for the administration of a collective-bargaining agreement. However, before the obligation to produce arises, it must be shown that the requested information is relevant and reasonably necessary for the labor organization's proper performance of its role as a collective-bargaining representative. Relevancy is to be determined by a liberal standard, and it is necessary to establish only the "probability that the desired information is relevant, and that it would be of use to the union in carrying out its statutory duties and responsibilities." NLRB v. Truitt Mfg. Co., 351 U.S. 149 (1965); NLRB v. Acme Industrial Co., 385 U.S. 432 (1967). Gunn & Briggs, Inc., 267 NLRB 944, 947 (1983); W-L Molding Co., 272 NLRB 1240.

Respondents do not dispute the relevance of the sequested information as related to "all writers." However, they do argue that the requested information is not relevant insofar as it requires a breakdown of such information by "job classification." In this regard Respondents contend that there is only one job classification at issue, which classification is accurately set forth in the bargaining unit description in the complaint as covering all writers employed to write literary material for Respondents' motion pictures. Thus, Respondents argue, the request is not actually calling for a breakdown of job classifications, but instead it calls for descriptions of the particular writing assignment and the nature of the writers' writing employment. Respondents further argue that this contention is supported by the fact that the annual employment data report required by the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission requests information only as to broad employment categories and does not require a further breakdown of information regarding job assignments within those categories.

I find these arguments unpersuasive. Here, the Guild requested information as to sex, ethnicity, handicapped status, and age of employees 40 and over. It is undisputed that this information was requested in order to monitor and administer the equal opportunity policy set forth in the collective-bargaining agreement. In view of the statutory bargaining representatives' obligation to insure that discriminatory practices are not established or continued, the Board has found that information, such as requested here, which relates to alleged discrimination is clearly relevant to a determination of whether discrimination exists. The Board has further concluded that it shall apply the same standard to requests for statistical data relating to employment practices as is applied to requests for wage data; namely, that such information is presumed relevant to the collective-bargaining process and that it shall not require the union initially to show the relevance of the requested information. Westinghouse Electric Corp., 239 NLRB 106, 107–109 (1978), enf. in pertinent part sub nom. Electrical Workers IUE, 648 F.2d 18 (D.C. Cir. 1981). I therefore find that the information requested by the Guild is relevant and reasonably necessary for the Guild's performance of its role as collective-bargaining representative.

2. The res judicata, collateral estoppel, and deferral to arbitration argument

On October 1983 the Guild filed an unfair labor practice charge in Case 31–CA–13606 alleging, inter alia, that Respondents had failed and refused to provide the Guild with information relevant and necessary to its ability to enforce and administer article 38 of the parties' collective-bargaining agreement. Thereafter, in view of the parties' agreement to arbitrate the underlying dispute, the Regional Director deferred the charge pursuant to the Board's arbitration deferral policy in Dubo Mfg. Corp., supra. Following the issuance of the arbitrator's opinion, and award, the Regional Director dismissed the charge for the stated reason that "the issues alleged were resolved in the arbitral forum." The Guild did not appeal this dismissal.

Respondents argue that the doctrines of res judicata and collateral estoppel apply because the relevant factual and legal issues are identical to those raised in the arbitration proceeding and in the charge in Case 31-CA-13606, the dismissal of which was not appealed. Under the res judicata doctrine "[a] valid, final judgment on the merits is a bar to a subsequent action between the same parties, or those in privity with them, upon the same claim or demand." 1B Moore Federal Practice 0.411[2], at 1281 fn. 1 (2d ed. 1982); and "such a judgment precludes the subsequent litigation both of issues actually decided in determining the claim asserted in the first action of issues that could have been raised in the adjudication of that claim." Id. § 0.045[3], at 631-632. The doctrine of collateral estoppel normally will bar the relitigation of an issue or law or fact that was raised, litigated, and actually decided by a judgment in a prior proceeding between the parties, if the determination of that issue was essential to the judgment, regardless of whether the two proceedings are based on the same claim. NLRB v. United Technologies Corp., 706 F.2d 1254 (2d Cir. 1983). Clearly, neither doctrine applies to the administrative dismissal of a charge, and an arbitrator's decision has preclusive effect only to the extent set forth in the Board's deferral to arbitration policy.

Under that policy, the following criteria must be met for the Board to defer to the decision of an arbitrator: (1) the proceeding must be fair and regular; (2) all parties must agree to be bound; and (3) the decision must not be repugnant to the purposes and policies of the Act. Spielberg Mfg. Co., 112 NLRB 1080 (1955). Further, the arbitrator must have considered the unfair labor practice issue. Raytheon Co., 140 NLRB 883 (1963). The current policy for the application of this latter standard and the burden of proof is set forth in Olin Corp., 268 NLRB 573, 574 (1984). There the Board held:

> We would find that an arbitrator has adequately considered the unfair labor practice if (1) the contractual issue is factually parallel to the unfair labor practice issue, and (2) the arbitrator was presented generally with the facts relevant to resolving the unfair labor practice. In this respect, differences, if any, between the contractual and statutory standards of review should be weighed by the Board as part of its determination under the Spielberg standards of whether an award is "clearly repugnant" to the Act. And, with regard with to the inquiry in to the "clearly repugnant" standard, we would not require an arbitrator's award to be totally consistent with Board precedent. Unless the award is "palpably wrong," i.e., unless the arbitrator's decision is not susceptible to an interpretation consistent with the Act, we will defer.
> Finally, we would require that the party seeking to have the Board reject deferral and consider the merits of a given case show that the above standards for deferral have not been met. Thus, the party seeking to have the Board ignore the determination of an arbitrator has the burden of affirmatively demonstrating the defects in the arbitral process or award.

Here, there is no contention or evidence that the arbitral proceedings were not fair and regular or that all parties did not agree to be bound. However, the evidence does not support Respondents' position that the issues before the arbitrator were the same as the issues here. Thus, according to the arbitrator's opinion, the dispute that gave rise to the arbitration related to the Employers; failure to submit requested sex and ethnicity data and the Employers' position that they were obligated to furnish sex and ethnicity data only after the HRCC established a data submission program; and since HRCC had not done so, they had no obligation to submit any data. Therefore, the basic issue before the arbitrator was whether, despite the provision of article 38(C)(1) that the HRCC establish the data submission program, the Employers were required by article 38(D)(1) to furnish sex and ethnicity data without regard to whether HRCC established a data submission program.

The arbitrator concluded that article 38 contemplated a data submission program that included sex and ethnicity data at the minimum, but that could be expanded to include other data as determined by the HRCC. Accordingly, he concluded that the data submission requirement of article 38(D)(1) relating to sex and ethnicity was self-executing and the Employers were required by its terms to furnish such data. Further, upon the Guild's request for a determination that it had not waived its statutory and contractual rights to receive such data by requesting a job classification breakdown, the arbitrator concluded that inasmuch as he had held that Respondents are required by article 38(D) to submit sex and ethnicity reports, the Guild's statutory rights were not adversely affected. However, he also found that since the Guild's demand for data extended beyond sex and ethnicity into job classification areas, the refusal of Respondents to submit such data was not "unjustified" under article 38 and, consequently, the Guild was not entitled to an award of liquidated damages. Thus, the arbitrator's findining was limited to a determination of whether Respondents' refusal to comply with the Guild's request for sex and ethnicity data by job classification was "unjustified" under article 38(G)(1), thereby making the employers obligated to pay the liquidated damages provided for therein. Thus, the arbitrator never reached the general question of whether the Employers could be required to furnish information according to a job classification breakdown.

Here, the issue is whether Respondents were obligated to furnish the requested data relating to discrimination, other than sex and ethnicity, prohibited by article 38; and were obligated to furnish such information, as well as that related to sex ethnicity, according to the job classification breakdowns requested by the Guild. Neither of these issues was before the arbitrator. Further, their resolution requires considerations in addition to those relevant to the issues before the arbitrator.

Accordingly, under the Board's deferral to arbitration policy, it is appropriate for me to make a determination in this matter. However, the record shows that the arbitrator interpreted certain provisions of article 38 of the collective-bargaining agreement underlying both the issue here and that in the arbitration proceeding. I, therefore, further find it appropriate, in the circumstances, to defer to the arbitrator's interpretation of these provisions. Thus my decision here will be based, in part, on the arbitrator's determination that sex and ethnicity is the minimum, rather than the exclusive, data required under article 38 to be submitted to the Guild by the employers.

3. Respondent's obligation to furnish the requested data

Respondents contend that by the provisions of article 38 the Guild waived any statutory rights it may have had with respect to the age and handicapped data requested by the Guild. The record does not support this contention. It is well established that waiver of a right to information must be "clear and unmistakeable." Hearst Corp., 113 NLRB 1067 (1955). Such a waiver must be in express terms and can never be found by implication. Skyway Luggage Co., 117 NLRB 681 (1957), W-L Molding Co., 272 NLRB 1239 (1984).

Here, the arbitrator concluded that sex and ethnicity data were the minimum data required and that, under article 38, the requirement could be expanded to include other data as determined by the HRCC. Thus, it is apparent that the Guild did not waive its rights to age and physical handicap data, nor to breakdowns by job classifications of data relevant to issues of actual or potential discrimination. Rather, the Guild agreed to further negotiate the specifics of a data submission program within HRCC. That section of article 38(C) constituted a commitment to continue negotiations rather than a waiver of the Guild's right to data except as required by the HRCC is apparent, not only from the failure to include express waiver language in the provision, but also from Farris' testimony as to the conclusion of the 1981 negotiations. According to him, on the last night negotiations the data submission program was one of the two or three open issues. An agreement to conclude the strike was reached, and they simply ran out of time to further refine the data submission program. So it was determined that development of a format for data submission would be turned over to HRCC.

However, even assuming arguendo that by article 38(C) the Guild did limit its right to data other than sex and ethnicity to only such data as required by HRCC, the arbitrator found, and I agree, that it is clear the parties did not contemplate a complete breakdown as occurred within the HRCC. Nevertheless, such a breakdown did occur, resulting in a complete abandonment of the process by 25 March 1983, only 2-1/2 months after the first HRCC meeting that was held on 7 January 1983.[4] In view of this breakdown of the agreed-upon process for determining the extent of the data to be submitted, the Guild may properly insist on its statutory right to information relevant to actual or potential discrimination despite the authority given to the HRCC under article 38. To conclude otherwise would give a recalcitrant employer the power to effectively evade its obligations under the Act.

In view of the above, I find that each of the Respondents violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act by its refusal to furnish the Guild with the requested data as to sex, ethnicity, age, and physical handicap status of unit employees by job classification.

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. The Respondents are employers within the meaning of Section 2(2) of the Act, engaged in commerce or a business affecting commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

2. The Guild is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

3. (a) From 2 March 1981 until 28 February 1985, the following-described employees of Respondents constituted a multiemployer unit appropriate for the purposes of collective bargaining within the meaning of Section 9(b) of the Act.

> Included: (a) Theatrical—all writers employed by the Respondents; and (b) Television—all writers engaged by Respondents as employees for the purpose of preparing literary material for the entertainment portion of motion pictures produced primarily for exhibition over television.
> Excluded: Producers, directors, story supervisors, composers, lyricists, non-professional writers, story analysts, employees employed in non-writing capacities, guards and supervisors as defined in the Act.

(b) From 2 March 1985 to date, the following described employees of each Respondent (other than AMPTP) have constituted individual units appropriate for the purposes of collective bargaining within the meaning of Section 9(b) of the Act:

> Included: (a) Theatrical—all writers employed by Respondent in the motion picture industry; and (b) Television—all writers engaged by Respondent as employees for the purpose of preparing literary material for the entertainment portion of motion pictures produced primarily for exhibition over television.
> Excluded: Producers, directors, story supervisors, composers, lyricists, non-professional writers, story analysts, employees employed in non-writing capacities, guards and supervisors as defined in the Act.

4. (a) From 2 March 1981 until 28 February 1985, the Guild was the designated exclusive bargaining representative of the employees in the multiemployer unit described above in paragraph 3(a) and during that period of time was recognized as such representative by Respondents.

[4] The arbitrator concluded the breakdown was occasioned by the Employers' insistence that data submitted other than as to sex and ethnicity be treated as confidential and that all data submitted be "prospective" only. The Guild refused to accede on either issue.

(b) Since on or about 2 March 1985 the Guild has been, and is now, the designated exclusive collective-bargaining representative of the employees in each unit described above in paragraph 3(b) and since that date has been recognized as such representative by each Respondent.

5. Respondents have engaged, and are engaging, in unfair labor practices within the meaning of Section 8(a)(1) and (5) of the Act by failing and refusing to provide the Guild with the following requested information relevant to actual or potential discrimination in the units described above:

1. The number of writers age 40 or over;

2. The number of writers who are physically handicapped;

3. For each category of writer (i.e., Caucasian, ethnic minority group, male, female, over 40, or physically handicapped) employed during the fourth quarter of 1984 and the first, and second, and third quarters of 1985 under the Guild's basic agreement in television, an indication of job classification (i.e., Freelance story assignment, freelance first draft assignment, staff writer, staff story editor, or staff writer/producer).

6. The above-described unfair labor practices are unfair labor practices affecting commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

THE REMEDY

Having found that Respondents have engaged in certain unfair labor practices, I shall recommend that Respondents cease and desist therefrom, and take certain affirmative action designed to effectuate the policies of the Act.

Having found that Respondents have violated Section 8(a)(1) and (5) of the Act by failing and refusing to furnish certain information requested by the Guild commencing on or about 28 December 1984, I shall recommend that each of the Respondents be ordered to furnish the Guild with the following information:

1. The number of writers age 40 or over;

2. The number of writers who are physically handicapped;

3. For each category of writer (i.e., Caucasian, ethnic minority group, male, female, over 40 or physically handicapped) employed during the 4th quarter of 1984 and the first, second, and third quarters of 1985 under the Guild's basic agreement in television, an indication of job classification (i.e., Freelance story assignment, freelance first draft assignment, staff writer, staff story editor, or staff writer/producer).

DECISION AND ORDER DISMISSING PETITION

BY CHAIRMAN STEPHENS AND MEMBERS BABSON AND CRACRAFT

Pursuant to a Stipulation for Certification Upon Consent UD Election, an election by secret ballot was conducted on January 6, 1984. The tally of ballots established that a majority of the eligible voters were in favor of withdrawing the authority of the Union to require, under its collective-bargaining agreement with the Employer, that membership in the Union be a condition of employment. Thereafter, the Union filed an objection to conduct affecting the election, alleging that the election could not be conducted in a fair and uncoerced atmosphere owing to the activities of the Petitioner, a statutory supervisor, who circulated and campaigned on behalf of the petition.

[1] The name of the Employer appears as amended at the hearing.

Subsequently, Hearing Officer Rowena Hodges issued a report and recommendations, in which she found that the Petitioner was a supervisor within the meaning of Section 2(11) of the Act, and recommended that the petition be dismissed on the ground that as a statutory supervisor, the Petitioner was not eligible to file the petition. The Employer filed exceptions to the hearing officer's report and recommendations,[2] and the Union filed an answering brief.

The Board, by a three-member panel, has reviewed the record in light of the exceptions and briefs and has adopted the hearing officer's findings and recommendations.

In Rose Metal Products, 289 NLRB 1153 (1988), the Board recently held that a statutory supervisor was ineligible to file a deauthorization petition. For the reasons set forth in Rose Metal Products, we find that the Petitioner, as a statutory supervisor, was ineligible to file the instant deauthorization petition. Accordingly, we shall dismiss the petition.

ORDER

The petition is dismissed.

[2] The Employer erroneously filed a request for review under Sec. 102.67(c)(1) of the Board's Rules and Regulations rather than filing exceptions under Sec. 102.69 as properly directed in the hearing officer's report. We have treated the request for review as exceptions.

ORDER DENYING MOTION

BY MEMBERS JOHANSEN, BABSON, CRACRAFT

On November 25, 1987, the Acting Regional Director for Region 18 of the National Labor Relations Board issued a complaint and notice of hearing in the above-entitled proceeding, alleging that the Respondent has engaged in unfair labor practices affecting commerce within the meaning of Section 8(a)(5) and (1) and Section 2(6) and (7) of the National Labor Relations Act. Subsequently, the Respondent filed an answer, admitting in part and denying in part the allegations of the complaint, stating defenses, and requesting that the complaint be dismissed.

On January 25, 1988, the General Counsel filed with the Board in Washington, D.C., a Motion for Summary Judgment, claiming the only issues raised by the complaint and answer are legal in nature and that there are no issues of disputed fact warranting or requiring a hearing. On February 1, 1988, the Board issued an order transferring the case to the Board and a Notice to Show Cause why the motion should not be granted. The Respondent did not file a response to the Notice to Show Cause.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board having considered the matter,

IT IS ORDERED that the General Counsel's Motion for Summary Judgment is denied with leave to renew before an administrative law judge as there are genuine issues of material fact that cannot be resolved without a hearing and the General Counsel is not entitled to judgment as a matter of law.[1]

IT IS FURTHER ORDERED that the above-entitled proceeding is remanded to the Regional Director for Region 18 for further appropriate action.

MEMBER JOHANSEN, dissenting.

Based on documentary evidence submitted in support of the General Counsel's Motion for Summary Judgment and admissions set forth in the Respondent's answer to the complaint, I agree with the General Counsel that the only issues raised in these proceedings are legal in nature. Finding no genuine dispute as to material facts, I must dissent from my colleagues' denial of the Motion for Summary Judgment.

The complaint alleges and the Respondent's answer admits that the Union was certified on December 22, 1986, as the exclusive collective-bargaining representative of the production and maintenance employees at its Albert Lea, Minnesota facility. The Respondent further admits in its answer that it closed its Albert Lea facility on August 13, 1987, without providing the Union with advance notice of the closure. The Respondent acknowledges that by letter dated August 18, 1987,[1] after implementation of the closure decision, it first provided the Union with formal notice of the plant closing. In addition, the record reveals that only then did the Respondent offer to bargain with the Union about the effects of the closure. Finally, the Respondent did not specifically deny in its answer the allegations contained in paragraphs 10, 11, and 12 of the complaint, i.e., that its actions constituted unfair labor practices within the meaning of the Act.

The Respondent raises two defenses to its failure to provide the Union with advance notice of the plant closing. The first defense is that it "extended an open offer to meet with the Union" after actually closing the Albert Lea facility.[2]

It is well settled that an employer is obligated to bargain with its employees' collective-bargaining representative regarding the effects of a decision to close a facility. In First National Maintenance Corp. v. NLRB, 452 U.S. 666, 681–682 (1981), the Supreme Court emphasized that bargaining over the effects of a decision to close must be conducted "in a meaningful manner and at a meaningful time." An important element in evaluating whether mean-

[1] Our dissenting colleague would grant the General Counsel's Motion for Summary Judgment. Contrary to our colleague, we cannot say, as a matter of law, that the defense raised by the Respondent could never amount to emergency circumstances relieving the Respondent of its obligation to notify and bargain with the Union before the closing. We emphasize that we are not deciding the merits of the Respondent's defense. When, as our colleague points out, the Board has never addressed this precise question, we believe it is inappropriate to do so without benefit of a full evidentiary hearing.

Our colleague argues that aside from a general assertion in its answer the Respondent has not come forward with one shred of evidence to substantiate its claim. However, in light of our finding that the General Counsel is not entitled to judgment as a matter of law, it is well established that the Respondent is not obligated to come forward with evidence and a simple denial of unlawful conduct is sufficient to warrant a hearing. See, e.g., Florida Steel Corp., 222 NLRB 586 (1976).

Our colleague states that the Respondent did not specifically deny the allegations in pars. 10 and 11 of the complaint that allege the specific violations of Sec. 8(a)(5) and (1), and that therefore they shall be deemed admitted true pursuant to Sec. 102.20 of the Board's Rules and Regulations. However, Sec. 102.20 provides that "any allegation in the complaint not specifically denied or explained in an answer filed . . . shall be deemed to be admitted to be true and shall be so found by the Board." (Emphasis added.) We believe Respondent's answer satisfies the rule.

[1] The record reveals that the correct date of the letter was August 17, 1987.

ingful bargaining has occurred is whether the union was provided with clear and timely notice of a plant closing.[3] In Metropolitan Teletronics Corp., 279 NLRB 957, 960–961 (1986), enfd. without opinion 819 F.2d 1130 (2d Cir. 1987), the Board reaffirmed the principle that notice to a union of a facility's closure after it has occurred is not timely and cannot serve as a defense to the obligation to bargain in good faith. The Board recognized that a belated offer to negotiate denies a union of the opportunity to bargain when it retains a measure of bargaining power. Ibid.[4] Thus, I find that the Respondent's postclosure offer to bargain is not legally cognizable as a defense to the complaint allegations.

The Respondent's answer raises as a second defense that the Company was privileged to withhold from the Union advance notice of the plant closing because of "concern that such notice would have led to a slowdown in the production rate and/or sabotage to the equipment or to the products manufactured."[5] As the General Counsel acknowledges, the rule regarding timely notice is not a per se rule—an employer can avoid 8(a)(5) liability by demonstrating that "emergency circumstances" justified late notice to the union.[6] While the Board has recognized as "emergencies" such occurrences as discontinuance of an ongoing line of credit,[7] lack of funds to continue in operation,[8] and theft of vehicles,[9] it has at no time found that concern for the mere conjectured possibility of employee sabotage of a plant or product amounts to "emergency circumstances." As the General Counsel points out, such speculation could be raised, with equal justification, by most employers deciding to close a facility. Should a vague and unspecified "concern" about employee sabotage or production slowdown be recognized by the Board as a valid defense, the exceptions to the advance notice rule would provide a loophole broad enough effectively to nullify an employer's obligation to engage in effects bargaining. In this case in particular (and I note that the Respondent failed to respond to the Notice to Show Cause), there is not a shred of evidence that would even hint that the Respondent has any basis for its unspecified apprehension or "concern." Even had such evidence been presented, however, the Board did not create (nor do I believe it intended to create) an exception based on "concern" for sabotage and/or production slowdown when it recognized that occasional exceptional circumstances may justify circumvention of the advance-notice requirement. Thus, I find, again, that the Respondent has failed to raise a legally cognizable defense to the complaint allegations.

Accordingly, as I find that the pleadings in this case fail to raise a disputed issue of fact which would warrant litigation, that the Respondent has admitted all the facts material to a resolution of the unfair labor practice issues raised by these proceedings, that the Respondent has failed to deny specifically that its actions constitute unfair labor practices,[10] and that the Respondent's affirmative defenses are legally insufficient as justification for the Respondent's conduct, I would grant the General Counsel's Motion for Summary Judgment. That is the appropriate action when a respondent fails to raise a legally cognizable defense.[11] Finally, I would enter an appropriate remedial order.[12]

[10] Sec. 102.20 of the Board's Rules and Regulations, provides that "any allegation in the complaint not specifically denied or explained . . . shall be deemed to be admitted to be true . . . ." In light of my finding that the Respondent has failed to raise a legally cognizable defense to the complaint allegations, I cannot agree with my colleagues that the Respondent's answer "explains" the complaint allegations as required by Sec. 102.20 of the Board's Rules and Regulations.

Further, contrary to my colleagues, I find that Florida Steel Corp., 222 NLRB 586 (1976), does not require that this case be remanded for a hearing. In Florida Steel, a distinguishable case, General Counsel filed a Motion for Summary Judgment contending that through its answer the respondent admitted facts sufficient for a Board determination finding the alleged violations of the Act. Through an amended answer, the respondent sought to withdraw its admission of the alleged unlawful conduct and entered instead a denial of such conduct. The Board denied the General Counsel's motion to strike the amended answer and found instead that respondent's denial of the commission of the alleged unlawful acts raised questions of fact and law requiring resolution through a hearing.

The critical difference between Florida Steel and this case is that we have here the Respondent's admission of all facts material to a resolution of the unfair labor practice issues, a failure by the Respondent to deny that its actions constitute unfair labor practices, and the assertion of defenses that are not legally cognizable. Thus, the factors which resulted in a remand for a hearing in Florida Steel are not present here.

[11] See, e.g., Auburn Die Co., 282 NLRB 1044(1987) (Motion for Summary Judgment granted because employer admitted factual allegations of complaint except for a contention that its actions resulted from economic circumstances, which is not a cognizable defense in a refusal to bargain case); General Split Corp., 284 NLRB 418 (1987) (Motion for Summary Judgment granted where employer's claim that it was financially unable to make contractually required severance pay disbursements was found not to constitute an adequate defense to a complaint's allegation that the employer unlawfully failed to abide by the provisions of a collective-bargaining agreement).

[12] I agree with the General Counsel that the appropriate remedy in this case would be a Transmarine remedy. See Transmarine Navigation Corp., 170 NLRB 389 (1968); Metropolitan Teletronics, supra; P. J. Hamill, supra.

DECISION AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN STEPHENS AND MEMBERS BABSON AND CRACRAFT

On May 26, 1987, Administrative Law Judge D. Barry Morris issued the attached decision. The Respondent filed exceptions and a supporting brief.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the decision and the record in light of the exceptions and brief and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings,[1] and conclusions[2] and to adopt the recommended Order.

The Respondent and the Union began negotiations for a new contract on October 14, 1986.[3] As of September, 7 of the 15 unit employees were union members on dues checkoff. Prior to the November 12 negotiating session the Respondent's counsel, Murray Kirshtein, informed the Union's business representative, Lawrence Manca, that because of promotions and resignations there were only 2 union members remaining in the now 10-person unit that were on dues checkoff.

At the November 12 session Manca, Kirshtein, and the Respondent's president, John Rushton, were present. Kirshtein and Rushton both testified that Kirshtein asked Manca, "Can you represent to me that you represent the majority of the unit?" Kirshtein testified that Manca replied, "I cannot represent to you that I do."

The Respondent contended that, based on Manca's statement, it had a reasonably grounded doubt as to the Union's majority status and that it therefore lawfully withdrew recognition from the Union. Manca denied that he made the statement attributed to him.

We agree with the judge that Manca's ambiguous response to Kirshtein's question, even if made as Kirshtein testified, was insufficient to rebut the Union's presumption of continuing majority status. Therefore, it is unneccessary to remand the case to the judge to resolve the credibility conflict.

If, in fact, Manca made such a statement, he could have meant only that he did not know that a majority of the unit were members of the Union or that a majority would agree to the contract terms he was negotiating. Futhermore, the statement is not couched in affirmative terms—that Manca did not represent a majority—but merely in terms of declining to make an express statement that he did. His alleged statement is in marked contrast to the statements in Upper Mississippi Towing Corp., 246 NLRB 262 (1979), relied on by our dissenting colleague. There, the majority relied on, among a number of factors rebutting the union's presumption of continuing majority status, three unambiguous statements. Those statements were found to "clearly state NMU's estimate that it lacked employee support" and that the NMU would "never be able to win the election." Manca's single ambiguous statement here simply does not rise to the level of the union representatives' "admissions" in Upper Mississippi.[4]

In short, we agree with the judge that Respondent was not justified in withdrawing recognition from the Union here. Accordingly, we shall adopt his recommended Order.

ORDER

The National Labor Relations Board adopts the recommended Order of the administrative law judge and orders that the Respondent, RDR Industries, Inc., Mohawk, New York, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall take the action set forth in the Order.

MEMBER CRACRAFT, dissenting in part.

Contrary to my colleagues, I would not adopt the judge's decision.[1] I would remand this case to the judge for resolution of the credibility conflict between the Respondent's witnesses (Attorney Kirshtein and President Rushton) and Union Business Representative Manca whether Manca was asked whether he could represent that the Union

[1] The Respondent has excepted to some of the judge's credibility findings. The Board's established policy is not to overrule an administrative law judge's credibility resolutions unless the clear preponderance of all the relevant evidence convinces us that they are incorrect. Standard Dry Wall Products, 91 NLRB 544 (1950), enfd. 188 F.2d 362 (3d Cir. 1951). We have carefully examined the record and find no basis for reversing the findings.

[2] We affirm the judge's quashing of the subpoena for the testimony of Federal Mediator Robert Clintshaw. The Respondent seeks Clintshaw's testimony to corroborate the testimony of its witnesses that they asked Union Negotiator Manca if he could "represent that he represented a majority" of the unit and that he answered that he could not. Clintshaw was not present when the question was allegedly asked and answered. At most he could testify that Kirshtein told him over the phone that the question was asked and answered. Thus, we find that Clintshaw's testimony would not be sufficiently probative to corroborate the Respondent's witnesses and that the judge did not abuse his discretion in excluding this testimony.

[3] All dates are in 1986.

[4] See United Supermarkets, 214 NLRB 958 (1974), in which a Board majority found that an unclear statement was not an admission by the union that it did not have majority status. That case bares a closer resemblance to the situation here.

[1] I do, however, agree with the majority's quashing of the subpoena for the testimony of Federal Mediator Robert Clintshaw for the reasons stated.

represented a majority of the unit employees and whether Manca replied that he could not so represent.

The complaint alleges only an unlawful withdrawal of recognition. There is no evidence that the Respondent sought to undermine the Union or that it committed any other unfair labor practices. The Respondent bargained in good faith with the Union to reach a successor agreement until the alleged question was asked and the alleged reply was given, whereupon the Respondent withdrew recognition. In the context of a sharp decline in the percentage of unit employees on dues checkoff, record evidence, if credited, reveals that the Respondent merely asked the Union to confirm that it remained the employees' 9(a) representative and that the Union admitted in its answer that it lacked majority support.[2] Under these circumstances, I would find that Manca's statement, if credited, would provide the Respondent with an objectively based, good-faith doubt of the Union's continuing majority status. Upper Mississippi Towing Corp., 246 NLRB 262 (1979). Therefore, I would remand the case to the judge for this vital credibility resolution.

[2] If the Union had merely relied on its presumption of majority support in responding to the Respondent's inquiry, I would have no problem affirming the judge. However, when, as here, it is alleged that the business representative and chief negotiator for the Union admitted that he could not represent that the Union had majority support, I believe a credibility resolution must be made.

Robert A. Ellison, Esq., for the General Counsel.
Murray J. S. Kirshtein, Esq., of Utica, New York, for the Respondent.

DECISION AND ORDER

D. BARRY MORRIS, Administrative Law Judge. This case was heard before me in Utica, New York, on 9 February 1987.[1] On a charge filed on 24 November 1986,[2] a complaint was issued on 16 December, alleging that RDR Industries, Inc. (Respondent) violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the National Labor Relations Act (the Act). The complaint alleged that Respondent withdrew its recognition of International Association of Machinists and Aerospace Workers, AFL–CIO, District Lodge 157 (the Union) as the exclusive collective-bargaining representative of its production and maintenance employees. In addition, the complaint alleged that Respondent failed to furnish the Union with information requested by it and increased the hourly wage rates of unit employees without prior notice to the Union. Respondent filed an answer denying the commission of the alleged unfair labor practices.

The parties were given full opportunity to participate, produce evidence, examine and cross-examine witnesses, argue orally, and file briefs. Briefs were filed by the General Counsel and by Respondent.

On the entire record of the case, including my observation of the demeanor of the witnesses, I make the following

FINDINGS OF FACT

I. JURISDICTION

Respondent, a New York corporation with an office and place of business in Mohawk, New York, is engaged in the fabrication of sheet metal and related products. It annually sells and ships from its New York facility goods valued in excess of $50,000 to consumers located outside the State of New York. Respondent admits that it is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act, and I so find. In addition, I find that the Union is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

II. THE ALLEGED UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

A. The Facts

1. Background

On 1 July 1980 the Union was certified as the exclusive collective-bargaining representative of Respondent's production and maintenance employees. The parties subsequently entered into a 3-year collective-bargaining agreement. In 1983, pursuant to a decertification petition, an election was conducted that resulted in the Union's recertification. At the time approximately 15 to 17 employees were in the unit. The parties then entered into a 3-year collective-bargaining agreement extending from 10 November 1983 to 10 November 1986.

On 22 and 26 August 1986 the parties notified each other, in writing, of their intent to enter into negotiations for a successor agreement. In early September, Union Business Representative Lawrence Manca orally requested that Respondent President John Rushton provide a listing of the hourly earnings of the unit employees. On 19 September Rushton provided the requested information, which disclosed that wage increases were given to some unit employees beyond that provided by the contract.

2. Negotiations

On 14, 21, and 23 October the parties met to negotiate a successor contract, with Manca and Steward Dennis Quatrino, representing the Union, and Rushton and Respondent's counsel, Murray Kirshtein, representing Respondent. Manca and Kirshtein were the chief spokesmen. During these discussions the parties reached a number of tentative agreements, including an agreement to increase wages.[3]

[1] The record was closed on 27 March 1987.
[2] All dates refer to 1986 unless otherwise specified.

[3] According to Manca, on 28 October the parties agreed to extend the 10 November expiration date of the then-existing agreement. Kirshtein denied that the contract extension was agreed to. Art. 30 of the agreement provides that any changes or modifications to the agreement must be in writing and Manca conceded that there was nothing in writing ex-

Continued

As of September, 7 of the 15 unit employees were union members whose dues were deducted from their earnings by Respondent. On 26 August Rushton posted an announcement that three foreman positions would be filled, advising those interested to apply by 29 August. Four employees, including Scott Fullington, all of whom were union members on dues checkoff, applied. During the last week of September, Fullington quit his employment with Respondent. On 7 November Leland Smith notified Respondent and the Union, in writing, that he was terminating his union membership as of 10 November.[4]

The parties resumed negotiations on 10 November, with Manca and Kirshtein present. Certain items were agreed on, subject to approval by Rushton and Quatrino. Manca and Kirshtein agreed to continue negotiations the following morning. The parties met again on 11 November, at which time various contract items were discussed. The Smith resignation letter was shown to Manca, who was then informed that the three foreman positions were being filled immediately. Those selected were the individuals who had signed the 26 August posting. Kirshtein then asked Manca whether all the members in the bargaining unit would vote on the agreement. Manca replied that only union members would vote. Kirshtein said he would be more "comfortable if everybody in the bargaining unit could vote on the agreement." Manca replied that he had no objection to meeting with everyone in the unit to inform them of the negotiations but that he could only permit union members to vote on the agreement. Manca and Kirshtein then agreed to speak with Robert Klimshaw, a mediator with the Federal Mediation and Conciliation Service, as to the legality of having the entire bargaining unit vote on the agreement. In addition, Manca said that he would discuss the question with the Union's legal department.

3. Withdrawal of recognition

Kirshtein testified that he told Manca that he and Rushton were concerned because less than a majority of the unit employees were on checkoff. According to Kirshtein he then asked Manca, "Can you represent to me that you represent the majority of the unit?" Kirshtein testified that Manca replied, "I cannot represent to you that I do." Kirshtein further testified that he told Manca:

> If you can't provide for a majority of the employees affected ratifying whatever agreement we come to, and we're very close, and you can't represent to me you represent a majority of the people, you give me a problem. I can't negotiate with you.

Manca denied that he was asked whether the Union represented a majority of the employees. Kirshtein and Manca then spoke by telephone to Clintshaw, who suggested that the Union obtain a legal opinion regarding nonmember participation in the ratification process.[5]

On 12 November Manca was informed by the Union's attorney that only members could participate in the ratification. Manca so informed Kirshtein who replied that Respondent would not negotiate further with the Union. Rushton acknowledged that Respondent would have continued to negotiate with the Union had the Union allowed the entire unit to ratify the agreement. Also on 12 November Manca made a written request for an updated list of employees' earnings. Respondent never answered the request. On 13 November Kirshtein and Rushton met with the unit employees and informed them that Respondent was implementing the wage increase that it had tentatively agreed to with the Union. This action was taken without prior notice to the Union. Respondent has refused to negotiate with the Union after 12 November.

B. Discussion

In Robertshaw Controls Co., 263 NLRB 958, 959 (1982), the Board stated:

> We have consistently held that a union enjoys a presumption of continuing majority status. In order to rebut that presumption, an employer must either show that the union in fact no longer retains majority support, or that its refusal to bargain was based on a reasonably grounded doubt as to the union's majority status. As to a reasonably grounded doubt, the doubt must be based on objective considerations.

When Respondent's representatives realized that less than a majority of the unit employees were on checkoff, they requested that all the unit employees ratify the agreement. The union representative refused to accede to this request and stated that only union members would be eligible to vote on the agreement.[6] Kirshtein testified that he then asked Manca whether Manca could affirm that the Union represented the majority of the unit, to which Manca replied that he could not so affirm. Manca denied that such a question was asked or that such an answer was given. It is not necessary for me to resolve the credibility issue, for even were I to credit Kirshtein's version of the events, Respondent has not sustained its burden of showing that the Union no longer retained majority support or that its refusal to bargain was based on a reasonably grounded doubt as to the Union's majority status.

Even crediting Kirshtein's version, the question and answer are ambiguous. Kirshtein conceded that he advised Manca that, "You may have other people who are tending the agreement. I find, therefore, that the agreement was not extended.

[4] Under the maintenance-of-membership clause of the 1983 contract, employees had the right to resign from union membership between 1 and 10 November.

[5] Respondent served a subpoena on Clintshaw to testify concerning the telephone conversation. The General Counsel moved to revoke the subpoena, arguing that Federal mediators should not be required to testify at Board proceedings. The petition to revoke the subpoena was granted. NLRB v. Lemon Tree, 618 F.2d 51, 54 (9th Cir. 1980); Tomlinson of High Point, Inc., 74 NLRB 681, 685 (1947).

[6] The ratification process is an internal union matter and a union's determination to limit participation to its members is a matter within its discretion. See Darlington Veneer Co., 113 NLRB 1101, 1117 (1955), enfd. 236 F.2d 85 (4th Cir. 1956).

union members who are not part of the checkoff." Thus, even if the question were asked as Kirshtein testified, it could have meant whether Manca could represent that a majority of the unit were union members. Indeed, it is unlikely that an experienced union agent like Manca would have told an employer with whom he was negotiating that the Union did not speak on behalf of the majority. This is so, especially here, where there was no underlying factual basis to make such a statement adverse to the Union's interest. Similarly, in United Supermarkets, 214 NLRB 958, 964 (1974), the union representative admitted that "he did not believe he had a majority." The Board, however, in observing that the number of dues-checkoff authorizations is immaterial to the issue of majority status, held that respondent did not establish that the union lost its majority status or that respondent had a reasonable basis for so believing. The Board pointed out that "the crucial question is whether a majority of employees have expressed dissatisfaction with the Union as their collective-bargaining representative, and there is no evidence showing such majority dissatisfaction" (id. at 958).

In Robertshaw Controls Co., supra, the Board found that the factors on which respondent based its refusal to bargain were insufficient to support a reasonable doubt as to the Union's continuing majority status. The Board stated (at 959):

> With regard to union membership, we have held that a showing that less than a majority of the employees in the unit are members of the union is not the equivalent of showing that the union lacked majority support, because no one can know with certainty how many employees who favor union representation do not become or remain members of the union.

As appears from his closing statement, Kirshtein understood that the fact that less than a majority of the unit employees were on checkoff was not sufficient to create a good-faith doubt of majority status, where Respondent was unaware of substantial dissatisfaction among the employees. Manca's ambiguous response, even if credited, that he did not represent a "majority," was insufficient to rebut the Union's presumption of continuing majority status.

I therefore conclude that Respondent was not justified in withdrawing recognition from the Union. I further conclude that Respondent violated the Act by failing to furnish the Union with the information it requested on 12 November[7] and by increasing the employees' wage rates on 13 November without prior notice to the Union.

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. Respondent is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act.

2. The Union is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

3. By withdrawing recognition of the Union as the exclusive collective-bargaining representative of its production and maintenance employees, by failing to furnish the Union with the information it requested, and by increasing the employees' wage rates without prior notice to the Union, Respondent has engaged in unfair labor practices within the meaning of Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act.

4. The aforesaid unfair labor practices constitute unfair labor practices affecting commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

THE REMEDY

Having found that Respondent has engaged in certain unfair labor practices, I find it necessary to order Respondent to cease and desist therefrom and to take further action necessary to effectuate the policies of the Act. Inasmuch as I have found that Respondent unlawfully refused to bargain collectively with the Union, I shall recommend that Respondent be ordered to bargain with the Union as the representative of its production and maintenance employees.

The General Counsel has requested that the order include a visitatorial clause authorizing the Board to engage in discovery under the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure for the purpose of securing compliance with the Board's Order. However, the General Counsel has not shown any special circumstances necessitating a departure from the standard remedy in similar cases. Accordingly, I will not include that requested remedy in this Order. See Northwind Maintenance Co., 281 NLRB 317 (1986); O. L. Willis, Inc., 278 NLRB 203 (1986).

On these findings of fact and conclusions of law and on the entire record, I issue the following recommended[8]

ORDER

The Respondents, RDR Industries, Inc., Mohawk, New York, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall

1. Cease and desist from

DECISION AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN STEPHENS AND MEMBERS JOHANSEN AND BABSON

On March 31, 1986, Administrative Law Judge Winifred D. Morio issued the attached decision. The Respondent filed exceptions and a supporting brief, the General Counsel filed an answering brief, and the Charging Party Petitioner filed cross-exceptions and a supporting brief.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the decision and the record in light of the exceptions, cross-exceptions, and briefs and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings,[1] and conclusions,[2] and to adopt her recommended Order as modified.[3]

We agree with the judge that the General Counsel has sustained her burden under Wright Line[4] of a prima facie showing that union activity was a motivating factor for the discharges of employees Phillip Greene and Cessil Chinfloo and that the Respondent has failed to demonstrate that these employees would have been discharged even in the absence of their union activity. As found by the judge, the discharges were precipitated by a locker room agreement among employees, including Greene and Chinfloo, on January 30, 1985, to attend a union meeting, and their attendance at that meeting where they signed authorization cards.

Regarding the prima facie case, we find that the General Counsel has established the Respondent's knowledge of employees' union activity by evidence that Brown, a supervisor who spent a considerable amount of time with the small complement of unit employees both on and off the job, was aware of the campaign, and we agree with the judge that Brown's knowledge is imputed to the Respondent's steel superintendent, Wardrop. We find support for the finding of knowledge not only in inferences drawn by the judge from the size of the unit and Brown's close relationship with employees and from Brown's incredible denials in seeking to distance himself from his subordinates' union activity, but also in direct evidence of Brown's knowledge contained in Greene's uncontroverted testimony concerning his confrontation with Brown on the construction site the morning before Greene's discharge.[5]

Greene testified that he had become upset after Brown approached the worksite where Greene, Chinfloo, and another employee were erecting fences and doors and criticized the quality of their work. Greene told Brown that he was "tired of being used" and that he would take "steps . . . to change that." Brown replied, in obvious references to the union meeting and solicitation of authorization cards that had taken place the previous evening, that "any steps or anything you guys are going to do, do not include me." This testimony contributes to establishing not only the Respondent's general knowledge of union activity within the unit but specific knowledge of the participation of the employees to whom Brown's remark was directed, which included Greene and presumably Chinfloo.

The Respondent's asserted justification for Greene's discharge was trumped up from events occurring the very morning after his activity in support of the Union—events which even his supervisor made clear he considered trivial, and

The Board's established policy is not to overrule an administrative law judge's credibility resolutions unless the clear preponderance of all the relevant evidence convinces us that they are incorrect. Standard Dry Wall Products, 91 NLRB 544 (1950), enfd. 188 F.2d 362 (3d Cir. 1951). We have carefully examined the record and find no basis for reversing the findings.

[2] The Respondent contends that the judge erred in finding Uriel Brown, on whose testimony the judge relies in finding that the Respondent had knowledge of union activity, to be a statutory supervisor because the complaint did not specifically allege that Brown was a supervisor and was not amended to so allege at hearing. The Respondent further contends that, in making her determination as to Brown's supervisory status, the judge failed to consider the parties' stipulation to Brown's voting eligibility in the representation proceeding. We find no merit to these exceptions. First, we find, based on a careful reading of the record, that the issue of Brown's supervisory status was fully and fairly litigated at the hearing. Second, the Board has held that failure to request review of a Regional Director's approval of a stipulation for a consent election has preclusive effect only to related subsequent unfair labor practice proceedings (i.e., 8(a)(5) refusal-to-bargain cases), and that subsequent unfair labor practice proceedings involving Sec. 8(a)(1) and (3) such as the instant proceeding are not related unfair labor practice proceedings. Farm Fans, Inc., 174 NLRB 723, 724 (1969); see also Clothing Workers, 365 F.2d 898, 902–905 (D.C. Cir. 1966); Reeves Bros., 277 NLRB 1568, 1573 (1986). We find that the judge properly resolved Brown's supervisory status in this proceeding and we affirm her findings in that regard.

which the judge found to be pretextual. Chinfloo's discharge occurred only hours after the Respondent was confronted by the Union with a demand for recognition. The fact that these employees' support for the Union was pivotal in this small unit—their discharges enabling the Respondent to frustrate the Union's efforts to achieve recognition—renders even their modest activities significant.[6] Further, having discredited Wardrop's confused and self-contradicting testimony and thus finding that his asserted reasons for the discharges were false, the judge properly inferred that the real reason was an unlawful one.[7] Accordingly, because the Respondent has not shown that it would have discharged the employees even in the absence of union activity, we affirm the judge's finding that it violated Section 8(a)(3) and (1) of the Act.

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

WINIFRED D. MORIO, Administrative Law Judge. This case, heard on 15, 24, 25, and 31 October 1985 at New York, New York, was based on a complaint issued by the Regional Director for Region 2, on 3 July 1985. The complaint alleges, in substance, that Clark & Wilkins Industries, Inc. (Respondent/Company) discharged its employees, Phillip Greene and Cessil Chinfloo, because of their activities on behalf of Shopmen's Local Union No. 455, International Association of Bridge, Structural & Ornamental Iron Workers, AFL-CIO (Union). The Respondent filed an answer in which it denied that it had committed the alleged unfair labor practices.

All parties were afforded the opportunity to present witnesses, to cross-examine witnesses, and to file briefs. Briefs were filed by all parties.

On the entire record, including my observation of the demeanor of the witnesses and on consideration of briefs filed by the parties, I make the following

FINDINGS OF FACT

I. JURISDICTION

At all times material, in the Respondent, a New York corporation, with a facility located in the City and State of New York, was engaged in providing general contracting services in the construction industry. Annually, the Respondent, in the course and conduct of its business operations, purchases and receives goods and materials valued at in excess of $50,000 directly from firms located outside of the State of New York. The parties admit, and I find, that the Respondent is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act. The parties also admit, and I find, that the Union is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

II. THE REPRESENTATION PETITION

On 7 February 1985, the Union filed a representation petition, in Case 2-RC-19908, seeking to represent all production and maintenance employees of Respondent. At a conference held on 25 February 1985, issues were raised concerning the status of four employees, Phillip Greene, Cessil Chinfloo, Leslie Earlington, and Carrol Dyall. It was the position of the Union that these four employees had been temporarily laid off and, therefore, they were eligible to vote. The Respondent contended that the four employees had been discharged for cause. A hearing was commenced on 25 February 1985 regarding the status of these individuals, but it was terminated when the parties entered into a Stipulation for Certification upon Consent Election. The parties agreed that Greene and Chinfloo would vote subject to challenge because the Union continued to maintain that the two employees were laid off, while Respondent maintained that they had been discharged.[1] An election was held on 20 march 1985, which resulted in six votes for the Union and six votes against the Union. The challenged ballots of Greene and Chinfloo, therefore, were determinative of the election. The Regional Director, on 9 April 1985, issued a notice of hearing to determine the status of these two individuals. The hearing, initially scheduled for 19 April 1985, was postponed to 29 April 1985. On 22 April 1985, the unfair labor practice charge in the instant case was filed and, as noted, on 3 July 1985 the complaint in this case issued. Subsequently, on 9 July 1985 an order consolidating the hearing on the challenged ballots with the hearing in the unfair labor practice case was issued by the Regional Director.

[1] The Union, apparently, did not pursue its position about the status of Earlington and Dyall and they did not vote in the election.

III. RESPONDENT'S MOTION TO DISMISS THE COMPLAINT

During the hearing, Respondent's counsel filed a motion to dismiss the complaint. It was counsel's position that the Union, by proceeding with the election on the basis that Greene and Chinfloo were eligible to vote because they had been temporarily laid off, waived the right to claim, subsequent to the election, that the two employees had been discharged for discriminatory reasons. Counsel argued that the instant case is similar to the situation that existed in Irving Air Chute, 149 NLRB 627 (1964), where the Board held that when a union loses an election it may seek a bargaining order pursuant to Section 8(a)(5) of the Act where it had failed to file timely objections to the conduct of the election. Counsel contends that it would be a logical extension of Irving Air Chute to hold that where a union proceeds to an election and fails to allege, in a timely manner, that certain individuals are eligible to vote as a result of unlawful discharges, it waives its right to subsequently assert the illegality of such discharges. The motion to dismiss was denied. However, counsel requested that he be permitted to amend his answer to include the grounds for his motion to dismiss as an affirmative defense. This motion was granted.

IV. THE ALLEGED UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICE

A. Background

Phillip Greene commenced his employment with Respondent in June 1983. According to Walter Wardrop, the Respondent's steel superintendent, he discharged Greene in March 1984 because he, together with another employee, drank while on the job and both individuals failed to perform the work assigned to them. Greene claimed that he was laid off and not discharged in March 1984 because of a slowdown in work. Greene did admit, however, that some weeks before he was laid off, both he and another employee were reprimanded by Wardrop because they had failed to perform assigned work, and Wardrop told both employees that he did not want them drinking on the job. Although Greene claimed that it was the other employee who was drinking, it does not appear that he told this to Wardrop at the time he was reprimanded. Greene testified that he was unable to perform the assigned work because he did not know how to drive the truck to the jobsites, it was driven usually by the other employee. However, Greene did not explain why he had failed to call Wardrop to explain what had happened.

Uriel Brown, employed by Respondent as a leadman, testified that he had been friendly with Greene. He claimed that Greene told him, that sometime in 1984, he went drinking with another employee and they failed to perform the work assigned to them and Wardrop was angry with them. About this time, Greene also told Brown that he had been fired. Although counsel for the General Counsel claimed that Brown, originally, testified that Greene told him he was fired for drinking and, subsequently, testified that he "guessed" Greene was fired for drinking, a careful examination of the record establishes that Brown, in both instances, testified that Greene told him he had been drinking and that he was fired and Brown "guessed" that Greene was fired for drinking on the job.

Greene admitted that between the time he was laid off in March and June 1984 he knew that Wardrop was hiring employees but did not recall him; however, he could not remember if he complained to Wardrop about this failure to recall him. Greene testified that in June 1984 he approached Wardrop and asked to be rehired, and he was rehired at that time. According to Uriel Brown and Wardrop, Wardrop rehired Greene only after Brown interceded with Wardrop, told him that Greene needed a job and asked him to hire Greene, which Wardrop did in June 1984.

B. Greene's Alleged Organizing Efforts

Antonio Schifano, the Union's business representative, testified that he was first approached by some of Respondent's employees at the union hall in December 1984 and they spoke to him about their interest in the Union. It is unclear whether Greene was one of the employees in the group at this first meeting, but Schifano did testify that he knew Greene[2] because Greene had assisted him with his organizing efforts at another company.[3] Schifano claimed that sometime in December 1984, whether it was at this meeting or another is unclear, he gave 12 authorization cards to Greene to distribute to the other employees. According to Schifano, these were the only authorization cards that he gave to Greene. Schifano also testified that during the following weeks he met with Greene once a week, on a Wednesday, to discuss the progress of his organizing efforts.

Greene's recollection of his first meeting with Schifano about organizing Respondent's employees differs from Schifano's recollection. Greene recalled that in early January 1985 he went alone to the union hall, between 5:30 and 6 p.m., and he spoke to Schifano about organizing the employees. Schifano told him to talk to the "other guys" to see if they were interested and to try to have them sign authorization cards. Schifano gave him two authorization cards to show "as specimens to the other guys." In response to a question about whether these two cards were signed, Greene responded that they were signed in January 1985. Greene testified that within a day or two after he spoke with Schifano he discussed the benefits of joining the Union with three employees at the 125th Street subway station and he gave one of the authorization cards to one of the employees and he kept the other as a sample to show to the other employees. It appears that the employee who Greene claimed he gave the card to was Carroll Dyall. Greene, initially, testified that the employee who took the card at the station did not return it to him until the last week in January. However, in subsequent testimony Greene stated that the employee who took the card at the subway station returned it to him "the second Wednesday in January." In the affidavit secured from Greene during the investigation of the case, Greene stated, "the first card was signed on or about January 28, 1985."[4] In fact, the evidence in the record establishes that authorization cards were signed by Leslie Earlington and Carrol Dyall on 28 December 1984 and 20 January 1985.[5] Greene claimed that he secured additional authorization cards from Schifano about 17 January and that he distributed about 12 of these cards to employees during January at various locations, and the evening of 30 January, during a union meeting at the union hall, he secured an additional 5 cards, which he distributed to employees at the meeting. At one point, Greene testified that he secured seven signed authorization cards, but he did not state where or when he secured these cards. At another point, Greene testified that with the exception of the one card that he gave to the employee at the subway station, all authorization cards, including his cards, were signed at the union meeting on 30 January 1985. Greene claimed that he did not sign an authorization card until the union meeting because he believed that the card he had signed previously while employed at B.R.B. Iron Works was sufficient. According to Greene, Schifano did not ask him to sign a new authorization card or explain to him why it was necessary to sign a new card at any time before the union meeting on 30 January 1985. Greene's recollection about when, where, or the number of employees he spoke to about the Union also varied constantly throughout his testimony. At one point, Greene testified that he spoke to 9 employees and at another point he testified that he spoke to 12 out of 15 employees.

[2] Schifano testified that he had known Greene for some time. However, it appears that Schifano first met Greene a few months earlier when he was organizing B.R.B. Iron Works.

[3] Greene had worked for B.R.B. Iron Works and while there he had signed an authorization card for the Union. He was discharged by that company on 7 May 1984. In Case 29-CA-11244 Administrative Law Judge Howard Edelman found Greene's discharge and the discharges of two other employees, Earl Mills and Carrol Dyall, to be violative of the Act.

According to Greene, a day or two before 30 January 1985, Schifano told him that he wanted to hold a union meeting at the union hall and he requested Greene to ask the other employers to be present. Greene testified that he spoke to other employees about the meeting, either by telephone or in the locker room, and he asked them to attend the meeting, which was scheduled for 5:30 p.m. Although the employees usually left work about 4:30 p.m., Greene testified that on 30 January 1985 the employees left the locker room about 5:10 p.m. and as they left they observed Wardrop and Colon, another supervisor, standing at the door. Greene admitted that it was not unusual for employees to leave in a group, nor was it unusual for supervisors to be standing at the entrance, which was also the exit, to shop. Schifano, Greene, and Chinfloo testified that the meeting was held on 30 January as planned and it was attended by 8 of the approximately 15 employees in the unit. Greene admitted that Brown was not present at the meeting, and there is no evidence that any supervisor was present. Schifano, Greene, and Chinfloo testified that during the meeting there was general discussion about the benefits the Union could secure and about the possibility of an election. However, their recollection about other events that took place at the meeting differed. As noted, at one point Greene claimed that he had secured seven signed authorization cards, but, subsequently, he claimed that he had received only one signed authorization card before the union meeting and the other eight or nine cards, including his card and that of Chinfloo, were signed by the employees during the meeting. Schifano claimed that Greene had returned some signed authorization cards to him before the meeting, he could not recall how many, and that other cards were signed by the employees during the meeting. Chinfloo testified that Greene gave him an authorization card in early January 1985, he took the card and told Greene he would think about it. Thereafter, on 30 January, but before the meeting, he signed the card and he handed it to Greene during the meeting. In the affidavit secured from Chinfloo during the investigation of the case, he stated that he signed the authorization card when Greene gave it to him and he returned it to Greene at the jobsite.

C. The Status of Brown

Greene testified the he became angry when Brown interfered with the work his group was doing on 31 January 1985 because he did not consider that Brown was his supervisor. It was Greene's position that his status was the same as Brown's status and, therefore, Brown had no right to tell him what to do. The record reveals that Greene applied for a position as a welder; however, he testified that he considered himself to be a welder-mechanic. When questioned whether he had been told by Respondent's representatives that that was his classification, Greene admitted that he had not been told this and that it was his opinion that that was his classification. It is undisputed that Brown, who had more seniority than Greene, was a mechanic who was paid, at the time of the events in this case, at the rate of $11.50 an hour, while Greene was paid at the rate of $8.50 and hour. Moreover, it was evident that Brown could read blueprints and that Greene, when tested during the hearing, could not do so, although he testified that he was capable of reading such prints. Wardrop and Brown both testified that Brown became a leadman about mid-1984 and in that position, he received instructions from Wardrop about the work to be performed and he transmitted these instructions to the men on the job. Wardrop testified that at the time of these events he had two leadmen, Brown and Earl Mills[6] and one person, Tom Wardrop, in training to be a leadman. According to Wardrop, leadmen do not work alone, they work with other employees and they decide when other employees are to work at the site and the work they are to perform. A leadman also has the authority to change the work employees are doing when the considers it necessary to do so and he does this without prior consultation with Wardrop, who normally rotates from job to job each day. Leadmen do not have the authority to hire or fire employees, but they are responsible to report to Wardrop when they consider that an employee's work is unsatisfactory. It is also the leadman's responsibilty to decide when a job is completed and to advise Wardrop of this fact. Finally, Chinfloo, who was hired after Greene, was paid at the same rate as Greene and he testified that when he worked with Greene he considered that he was an equal partner with Greene but, when he worked with Brown he worked as a helper.

[4] Greene testified that he made a mistake in the affidavit when he said the card was returned on 28 January 1985.

[5] Greene claimed that Dyall's card was the first one signed, in fact Earlington's card was the first one signed. Earlington's card, apparently, was submitted to the Board in connection with the representation petition because it bears the Board's stamp. Dyall's card was not submitted.

[6] Mills had been the employee responsible for the Union's organizing efforts at B.R.B. Iron Works.

D. Brown's Knowledge About the Union

Brown, initially, testified that he first became aware of the existence of the Union on the day before the election, which was held on 20 March 1985, when Schifano, the Union's representative, asked him to sign an authorization card, which he refused to do.[7] Later, Brown testified that 2 days before the election he saw the Board's election notices and it was then that he became aware of the Union. The record reveals that Brown was friendly with Greene and the other employees, he drank with them, had their telephone numbers and they had his, and he performed the same work they did and he used the same locker room. Further, it should be noted, regarding Brown's claim of a lack of knowledge, that the Union filed its representation petition on 7 February 1985, Respondent agreed to an election on 25 February 1985, and Roth and Wardrop distributed literature to employees in the weeks before the election in which they urged the employees to reject the Union.

E. The Discharge of Greene

On 31 January 1985, two groups of employees were assigned to erect railings and gates at 97th Street off Central Park. Greene, Chinfloo, and a new employee, Kevin Brennan, worked at one end of the project, while Uriel Brown and Tom Wardrop[8] worked at the other end of the project. It was Greene's position that Wardrop had assigned him to head one section of the project and had given him a sketch that detailed the work to be done, and that Wardrop had assigned Brown to head the other section and had given him a sketch to outline the work to be done by his group. Approximately several hours after the job started, Wardrop returned to the jobsite and, according to Greene and Chinfloo, he examined the work they were doing, expressed satisfaction with the job, and then left to speak with Brown. A few minutes after Wardrop left the jobsite, Brown walked over to where Greene and Chinfloo were working and he began to criticize their work and told them they were too slow. Greene testified that he was angry because his group had progressed on their section further than Brown's group and he told Brown to get off his job. Green claimed that he told Brown that he was tired of being used and that steps were being taken to change that. Brown responded that Greene was not to include him in any changes, he was not interested. Greene claimed that he had asked on prior occasion to sign an authorization card and Brown had refused. Brown denied that Greene had asked him to sign a card. Although Chinfloo testified that Brown criticized the work that they were doing, he did not testify that Greene told Brown that he was tired of being used, nor did he testify that Brown told Greene not to include him in any changes.

According to Wardrop, on 31 January 1985 he helped the men to unload the truck and then he left the site. He returned to the job between 1 and 2 p.m. and he observed that the section where Greene, Chinfloo, and Brennan were working was set up wrong, the job was being done incorrectly, and it was unsafe. He did not speak to Greene or Chinfloo but he did speak to Brown who was the leadman. He did not consider Greene a leadman. He told Brown the job was being done incorrectly and he instructed Brown to check the work. Brown told him he would take care of the problem and Wardrop left the jobsite. The affidavit secured from Wardrop contradicts this testimony. According to the affidavit, Brown informed Wardrop that he gave Greene an assignment and it was taking Greene too long to do it. Brown also told him that when he tried to correct Greene, Greene screamed at him.

Brown testified that on 31 January 1985 Wardrop gave him instructions and the documents for the job at 97th Street. According to Brown, he was the leadman on the job and he assigned Greene, Chinfloo, and Brennan, all of whom were helpers, to erect one section that he referred to as section C, the most difficult section to erect. He worked with Tom Wardrop to erect the other section. Initially, Brown testified that about 3:30 p.m. he went over to where Greene, Chinfloo, and Brennan were working in order "to give them a hand" and he noticed that they were not doing the work properly, they were attempted to assemble three pieces of the railing at once, when they first should have anchored one piece of the railing to the wall. When he attempted to give instructions about how the work should be done, Greene appeared to resent it and contradicted him. On cross-examination, Brown stated that he did not make a thorough check on the progress of the work being done by Greene's group, but he did make a quick check and the work seemed to be progressing at a normal rate. About 1 p.m., Wardrop returned to the jobsite, he checked the work done by Greene's group, and he returned and told Brown that the work was not being done properly, it was not safe, and he told Brown to check the job. Brown claimed that he had not noticed how Greene and the others were doing the work until Wardrop spoke to him. He then checked and saw that they had done one section correctly, but the section they were then working on was not being done properly, and he told this to the employees. He then instructed the employees about how the work should be done, and Chinfloo and Brennan followed his instruction but although Greene did not argue with him, he refused to change the way he was doing the work.

It is undisputed that later that day in the locker room, about 4:30 p.m., Greene and Brown had a confrontation about Brown's efforts to correct Greene's work. According to Greene, he told Brown to quit "messing around" with his job, voices were raised, and he might have said in more explicit language that Brown should not interfere with his work. Greene claimed that Wardrop came to the door of the locker room, asked what was going on, and when Brown replied that they were having a discussion, Wardrop left the room. Brown testified that when he went to the locker room later that day Greene confronted him and told him that he did not want Brown to interfere with his work again. Brown replied that he was trying to get the job done, and he told Greene that he thought the matter was finished. At this point, Wardrop passed by and he asked Brown what was the problem and he told Wardrop what had happened and that he thought the matter was closed but Greene confronted him about it in the locker room. According to Brown, when he spoke to Wardrop, Greene was still in the locker room. Brown testified that he did not ask Wardrop to do anything about the matter, it had not been his intention to tell Wardrop about the incident, that he had done so only because Wardrop questioned him as he left the locker room.

[7] Schifano claimed that it was in the week before 6 February 1985 that he asked Brown to sign an authorization card after Greene identified Brown for him.

[8] Tom Wardrop is the son of Walter Wardrop.

Wardrop's testimony differs from Brown's testimony. According to Wardrop, he heard yelling and screaming in the locker room, he opened the door and saw Greene, Brown, and other employees, and he asked what was the matter. Brown responded that he had an argument but he did not say with whom he had the argument. Wardrop left the room. Later, Brown came to him and told him that he had attempted to assist Greene and others at the jobsite and Greene had yelled at him and told him to leave his work alone. Brown told Wardrop that when he tried to explain to Greene that what he was doing was wrong, Greene continued to scream at him. Wardrop said that Brown did not ask him to do anything, but he did say that he did not want that to happen again. Initially, Wardrop claimed that he went immediately to look for Greene to fire him for insubordination but at that point Greene had left work.

According to Greene, on 1 February 1985 when he arrived at work at 7:30 a.m. Wardrop called him to his office and told him that he was laying him off for a few weeks but that a "big job" was coming up and he would then be called back to work. Greene claimed that he asked Wardrop if he was dissatisfied with his work and Wardrop responded that he was not, that Greene should file for unemployment benefits because he was being laid off.[9] Greene admitted that he did not question Wardrop about why Brennan and other employees with less seniority were being retained when he was being laid off. Greene testified that he spoke with Wardrop a week later about when he would be called back but Wardrop said that he was not ready to call him at that time.

Wardrop testified that on 1 February 1985 as soon as Greene arrived at work he told him that he was discharged for insubordination. He also told Greene, "You've been screwing up long enough and this is the final thing. I just can't take insubordination on the job anymore. You're fired." Although, as noted, Wardrop claimed, initially, that he had decided to fire Greene as soon as he heard Brown's story, on cross-examination, Wardrop testified that he did not make an immediate decision to discharge Greene when Brown reported the incident to him. Rather, he thought about the matter overnight and then he decided to discharge Greene, which he did the following morning. When counsel for the General Counsel asked Wardrop why he looked for Greene after his conversation with Brown, he stated that he looked for Greene, "Probably to raise hell with him." Further probing by counsel produced these responses by Wardrop.

> A. Not really.

According to Wardrop's affidavit, after he spoke with Brown he went out to fire Greene but Greene had left the building. When this statement in the affidavit was called to his attention, Wardrop changed his prior testimony again and testified that when he went to look for Greene it was his intention to discharge him. Wardrop admitted that he did not ask Greene for his version of the events on 30 January 1985.

Although Brown had not requested Wardrop to discharge Greene, Wardrop testified that he decided to discharge him because he considered insubordination to be a very serious matter. Wardrop claimed that it was necessary for the employees to work together and to obey the instructions of the leadman because the type of work they performed could be dangerous.

F. The Discharge of Chinfloo

Chinfloo began his employment with Respondent in September 1984. Chinfloo claimed that he applied for a position as a welder but when Wardrop hired him he did not tell him "definitely" what the job was for which he was hired. He denied, specifically, that Wardrop told him that he was hired as a helper or driver. Subsequently, he admitted that during the initial interview Wardrop asked to see his driver's license and told him that he would both drive a truck and go out on jobs. Chinfloo claimed that he told Wardrop that he was from the West Indies and was not familiar with the city but Wardrop assured him that it would not be a problem, he would be accompanied by other employees who would know the location of the jobsites.

During the period between September 1984 and February 1985, Chinfloo claimed that he drove the truck to jobsites on only 10 occasions and the remainder of the time he worked at the jobsites, frequently with Greene. Chinfloo testified that about January 1985, Greene spoke to him about the benefits of the Union and he gave him an authorization card to sign. As noted above, Chinfloo's recollection about when he signed the card varied at different points in this testimony but he did state that he did not believe that any representative of Respondent was aware that he had signed an authorization card. Both in the affidavit he gave the Board and in his initial testimony, Chinfloo claimed that it was on 7 February 1985 that he had a conversation with Wardrop, during which Wardrop told him that he had been instructed by "Jack"[10] to lay off a man and he, therefore, had to lay off Chinfloo. Chinfloo claimed that he recalled that the conversation occurred on 7 February because he wrote down the date. During this conversation, Wardrop told him that he would be laid off for only a few weeks, that he was a good man and he would be the first one to be recalled when Wardrop "gets this thing straightened out." Chinfloo testified that he did not ask what things Wardrop referred to and he did not ask why he was being laid off when he had more seniority than Brennan. Chinfloo told Wardrop that he was moving and he gave Wardrop his new address and Wardrop then told him that he would let him know, definitely, by noon, whether he was laid off. Later that day, a foreman told Chinfloo that Wardrop said that Chinfloo should leave by 3 p.m. When Chinfloo asked whether that meant he was laid off, the foreman replied that it did. Chinfloo denied that Wardrop had told him at any time that he would be discharged if he did not become familiar with the city streets.

On cross-examination, Chinfloo admitted the conversation with Wardrop about his layoff could have occurred on 6 February 1985. Chinfloo's payroll records establish that he worked 8 hours on both 4 and 5 February and for half a day on 6 February 1985 and that, thereafter, he did not work for the Respondent. Chinfloo also recalled, on cross-examination, that sometime in early February 1985 he was told by Wardrop to pick up debris at some location on Riverside Drive, but he could not remember where he was to make the pickup and he could not describe how to get to the location. According to Chinfloo, Kevin Brennan was present when Wardrop asked him to pick up the debris but Brennan also did not know how to get to the jobsite and, thereafter, they followed Wardrop to the site, made the pickup, and returned, without Wardrop's assistance, to the shop.

Wardrop testified that he hired Chinfloo as a driver-helper and he told him his classification when he hired him. Chinfloo said he was not familiar with the city but Wardrop told him he would learn. Thereafter, Chinfloo worked both in the field and the shop but, according to Wardrop, he was not a good worker, "he was slow and sloppy." After Chinfloo had been on the job for several months, Wardrop told him, a few days before 6 February 1985, to go to a site on 70th Street and West End Avenue to pick up some debris. Chinfloo said that he did not know how to get there, and Wardrop claimed that he then described, in detail, the route Chinfloo was to follow but Chinfloo did not appear to be able to follow Wardrop's instructions. Wardrop claimed that he then drew a map detailing the route for Chinfloo to follow but Chinfloo could not follow these directions. At this point, Wardrop decided he had no choice but to drive to the site and have Chinfloo follow him with the truck. Wardrop testified that this was the first time he realized that Chinfloo had not learned his way around the city and he decided that it was useless to keep Chinfloo, who had been hired primarily to drive, if he could not follow directions. Therefore, on 6 February he called Chinfloo to his office about 12:30 or 1 p.m. and he told him that he was discharging him because his work performance was not satisfactory.[11] Wardrop claimed that he had planned to talk to Chinfloo before 6 February 1985 but he became involved with another job and was unable to do so until that time.

G. The Schifano Meeting

There is no dispute that Schifano came to the premises of the Respondent, met with Roth, the Company's president, and requested Roth to recognize the Union as the representative of his employees. However, there is a disagreement about the date when this meeting occurred. The counsel for the General Counsel contends that the meeting occurred on 6 February 1985 and the meeting was a significant factor in the discharge of Chinfloo, which occurred on that date, although as noted, Chinfloo initially claimed that he was laid off on 7 February 1985. Respondent's counsel claims that the meeting occurred on 7 February 1985, after Chinfloo had been discharged.

According to Schifano, he went to the Respondent's premises on 6 February 1985 at 7:45 a.m., with two other union representatives to seek recognition. When he arrived at the premises, the employees told him which person was Wardrop, he then spoke to Wardrop and told him that he was seeking recognition as the representative of Respondent's employees. Wardrop told him that he could not help him, he would have to speak with Roth, the Respondent's president. Schifano left but he claimed that he returned about 10 a.m. on that same day and he met with Roth, told him that the employees had signed authorization cards for the Union, and he asked Roth to enter into negotiations. Roth asked who had signed cards, and Schifano agreed to show him the signed authorization cards provided that Roth would agree to recognize the Union. Ruth responded that he would go out of business but Schifano testified that he persuaded Roth to meet with him the following day at a nearby restaurant, the Fox & Hound, to discuss the matter. Schifano claimed that he was certain that this meeting with Roth took place on 6 February and not on 7 February 1985 because an entry in his calendar listed an appointment for 7 February at the Fox & Hound Restaurant. However, when asked where that restaurant was located Schifano was unable to respond and there does not appear to be a listing in the telephone directory for such a restaurant in the nearby boroughs. Moreover, an examination of Schifano's calendar reveals that words were erased in the space where the name Fox & Hound appears.

According to Schifano, later in the day on 6 February 1985 he received a call from Roth's office and he was told that the scheduled meeting for the following day was canceled and Schifano was told that he should contact Roth's attorneys. Schifano then called his office and advised them that they should file a representation petition.

In support of its position that Schifano met with Roth on 6 February, the Union called Harper, its counsel as a witness. Harper had no direct knowledge regarding Schifano's meeting with Roth. However, she did testify about an entry in her work diary concerning Respondent. According to that entry, Harper met with Don Bell, a union representative, at 10 a.m. on 7 February to discuss the filing of a representation petition for Respondent's employees. Harper could not state the precise time when that meeting was arranged but she believed that it had to be sometime before 10 a.m. on 7 February 1985, and she based this belief on her normal practice when she arranged meetings with clients. Harper testified that when a client sought an appointment she entered a notation in her diary for that future appointment, she would not make such an entry at the time she actually met with the client. Further, it was her practice to arrive at her office between 10:05 and 10:10 a.m. Harper admitted that her secretary does make entries in her diary, at times, before she arrives at work, but the entry respecting her meeting with Bell was in her handwriting. It was Harper's recollection, that the representation petition was prepared when Bell was present and that he hand delivered it to the Board. An examination of the petition, establishes that it was filed on 7 February 1985 at 2:05 p.m. and it shows that the space is blank with respect to when the request for recognition was made.

Roth did not testify, but Wardrop testified that it was on 7 February 1985 when Schifano came to the Respondent's premises, introduced himself, and asked to speak to the "boss" but he did not tell Wardrop why he wanted to see the "boss." Wardrop told Schifano that Roth, the president, would be in about 9 a.m. and Schifano left but returned about 9:30 a.m. and he met with Roth. Wardrop claimed that he was present for part of the meeting and he heard Schifano tell Roth that he had organized the employees and that he wanted to sit down to talk with Roth.

Discussion

It is the position of counsel for the General Counsel that Greene initiated the organizing activities on behalf of the Union, that in the plant and at jobsites, he urged employees to join the Union and to sign authorization cards for it, that Respondent became aware of the activities either through Brown or under the theory of the small plant doctrine and that Respondent discharged Greene because of these activities. Counsel concedes that Chinfloo's union activities were limited to signing a union authorization card and attending a union meeting but counsel contends, nevertheless, that Respondent discharged Chinfloo either because it perceived him as being "guilty" by virtue of his association with Greene, or in an effort to reduce the number of employees who supported the Union or to camouflage Greene's discharge. In any event, he argues, Chinfloo's union activity was the motivating factor in Respondent's decision to discharge Chinfloo. In the alternative, counsel argues that if the administrative law judge finds that these employees were not discharged, but were laid off, then their union activity was the reason for Respondent's failure to recall them. The counsel for the Union agrees with the arguments of the counsel for the General Counsel. In addition, she contends that if the discharges or layoffs are not found to be discriminatorily motivated, then the record supports a finding that the employees were temporarily laid off, had a reasonable expectancy of recall and, therefore, were entitled to vote and their ballots should be opened and counted. The Respondent has reiterated its argument that the Union failed to raise the issue of discriminatory discharges before the election and, therefore, it has waived its right to raise that issue in this proceeding. Counsel for Respondent also claims that the General Counsel has failed to establish any knowledge by Respondent's representatives of union activity by employees. Finally, he argues that these employees were not laid off, they were discharged for cause.

All counsel agree that the case presents credibility issues, but each contends that the witnesses who testified in support of their position were completely trustworthy and it was the witnesses for the other side who slanted the truth. Unfortunately, the resolution of the credibility issue in this case is not that simple. My observation of the demeanor of all the witnesses and my examination of the record convinces me that witnesses for both sides tended to tell only part of the truth. Accordingly, in resolving the credibility issues, I have accepted some portions of the testimony of the witnesses for both sides and have rejected other portions of their testimony. The court and the Board have stated that "a trier of the facts is not required to accept the entirety of a witness' testimony, but may believe some and not all of what a witness say." NLRB v. Universal Camera Corp., 179 F.2d 749, 754 (2d Cir. 1950); PBA Inc., 270 NLRB 998 (1984); L. D. Brinkman Southeast, 261 NLRB 204 (1982).

The first issue to consider is whether Greene was the employee who was responsible, initially, for the Union's presence at Respondent's premises. According to Greene, he was the employee who approached Schifano about organizing Respondent's employees and he, thereafter, urged employees to join the Union and to sign union authorization cards. More specifically, Greene testified that in early January 1985 he went, alone and without an appointment, to the union office where he spoke to Schifano about organizing the employees and Schifano gave him two authorization cards as "specimens" to show to the other employees. Schifano, who was called to testify on Greene's behalf, did not support this version of the alleged meeting. According to Schifano, in late December 1984 he first heard about Respondent because it was "brought to his attention by some—some of the employees working there." Schifano further testified that at some point in December 1984 he met with Greene, whether it was at the meeting with other employees or at another one is unclear, and he gave him 12 authorization cards to distribute to other employees. It is difficult to understand how the participants to this meeting could differ on such crucial points as to when the meeting occurred, who first informed Schifano about Respondent and the number of authorization cards given by Schifano to Greene. It is evident that the differences arose because Greene and Schifano testified about a meeting that had not occurred between them.

However, Schifano did meet to discuss organizing activities with an employee of Respondent in December 1984. The record reveals that on 28 December 1984 Leslie Earlington, then a Respondent employee, signed the first authorization card for the Union and he signed his card more than a month before Greene signed his authorization card. Generally speaking, the employee who contacts the Union signs either the first or one of the first authorization cards.[12] Greene recognized this fact and he knew that his failure to sign an authorization card until late January undercut his contention that he was the instigator of the organizing efforts on behalf of the Union. He, therefore, offered an explanation for his failure to sign the card before 30 January 1985. That explanation is not plausible. Greene claimed that he did not sign the authorization card at an earlier date because he believed that the authorization card that he had signed for the Union while employed at B.R.B. Iron Works was sufficient. It is unbelievable that Schifano, an experienced organizer, would have failed to inform Greene of the need to sign a new card, particularly if Schifano met with Greene as frequently as he claimed he did throughout January 1985.

There was further contradictory testimony given by Schifano and Greene, which casts doubt on Greene's assertion that he was the main employee organizer for the Union. Schifano claimed that he gave authorization cards to Greene on only one occasion. However, Greene testified that he received authorization cards from Schifano on two occasions, the first time was in early January, the second time was about the mid January 1985. According to Schifano, he received several signed authorization cards from Greene before 20 January 1985. Greene's testimony on this issue varied at different points. Although Greene testified, at one point, that he secured seven signed authorization cards, apparently before 30 January 1985, he did not state that he gave these cards to Schifano. Subsequently, he testified that he secured only one signed authorization card before 30 January 1985, the other cards, including his card and that of Chinfloo, were signed at the union meeting held at the end of January. Greene's testimony and the statements he made in his affidavit about when he secured the one signed authorization card also were not the same. He testified that he secured the card on the second Wednesday in Januray 1985, however, his affidavit stated that he secured the card on 28 January 1985. In fact, the card that Greene claimed he secured was signed on 20 January 1985. Greene's testimony concerning the number of employees he spoke to about the Union also varied depending on when he testified about the matter.

I do not credit Greene's assertion that he was the prime mover in the organizing efforts for the Union, and I base this conclusion not only on my observation of Greene's demeanor, but on the internal contradictions in his testimony and on the contradictions between his testimony and that of Schifano. In determining that Greene's testimony was not trustworthy regarding his contention that he instigated the union activity, I have also considered his testimony concerning his prior separation from Respondent in June 1984. Greene claimed that he was laid off and not fired for drinking. However, an examination of Greene's entire testimony and that of Brown on this issue establishes that Greene, in fact, was fired in June 1984 for drinking on the job.

The record establishes that the Union's efforts to organize Respondent's employees began at least as early as 28 December 1984, as evidenced by the fact that Earlington signed an authorization card for the Union on that day. The record establishes that these organizing efforts continued in January 1985 and that on 20 January 1985 Carrol Dyall also signed an authorization card for the Union.[13] Although I do not find that Greene was as actively involved in these organizing efforts as he claimed, I do find that both Greene and Chinfloo were part of the group who met in the locker room to attend the union meeting on 30 January 1985 during which they both signed authorization cards for the Union, which cards were submitted to the Board in support of the representation petition.[14] It is Respondent's position that it was unaware of any union activity by Greene, Chinfloo, or any of its employees prior to 7 February 1985 and that, therefore, it could not have discharged either Greene or Chinfloo because of such activity. I do not credit that contention.

Wardrop testified that Brown was a leadman and in that capacity, at the time of the events in this case, he had certain responsibilities over the actions of the other employees when Wardrop was not at the jobsite, which occurred frequently because Wardrop rotated one job to another. According to Wardrop, leadmen had the authority to assign men on the job, to determine the work the men were to do, to rotate them if he determined that it was necessary and to perform these functions without prior consultation with Wardrop. Leadmen also had the responsibility to decide lunch and breaks periods, to decide when a job was finished, and to tell the men when they could return to the shop. Although leadmen did not have the authority to hire, fire, or reprimand an employee, it was their responsibility to inform Wardrop about any dissatisfaction they had with an employee and about any problem that arose on the job. Greene's claim that he had the same status as Brown is not supported by the evidence in this record. The record reveals that Brown was paid at the rate of $11.50 an hour, while Greene was paid at the rate of $8.50 an hour, the same amount paid to Chinfloo, who was a new employee. Brown had greater seniority than Greene and unlike Greene he had the ability to read blueprints, which would be necessary in order to direct the work of the other employees. Significantly, Chinfloo testified that when he worked with Greene he considered that they worked on an equal basis but when he worked with Brown, he worked as a helper to Brown. Based on this record, I find that Brown responsibly directed other employees and that he was a supervisor within the meaning of Section 2(11) of the Act. Dale Service Corp., 269 NLRB 924 (1984); Serendippity-Un-Ltd. & Tigerrr, 263 NLRB 768, 771 (1982).

[12] As noted, Earlington was discharged in January 1985.

[13] Dyall also was discharged in January 1985.

[14] In view of my finding concerning Greene's role in the organizing efforts, I do not credit Chinfloo's testimony that Greene gave him an authorization card at a jobsite sometime in January 1985.

In efforts to establish Brown's knowledge of union activities, Greene claimed that in January 1985 he asked Brown to sign an authorization card. Because of my findings concerning Greene's role in the union organizing efforts, I do not credit that claim. Schifano testified that he solicited Brown to sign an authorization card in the week before 6 February 1985. Brown admitted that Schifano asked him to sign an authorization card, but he testified that the incident occurred a day or two before the election that was held on 19 March 1985. This disparity in the dates concerning this incident illustrates my prior statement that in the instant case witnesses for both sides tailored their testimony to suit the positions they held. Thus, Schifano claimed the incident occurred the week before 6 February 1985 in order to establish Respondent's knowledge of the union activities by employess before the layoff or discharge of Greene and Chinfloo. Brown testified that it occurred later to support his position that he had no knowledge of union activities until well after the discharges. Respondent has advanced many theories to support its position that the incident could not have occurred as early as Schifano claimed, and the counsel for the General Counsel has argued that it could not have occurred as late as Brown claimed. The fact is that the evidence in the record is insufficient to establish the exact date when the incident did occur. However, I am not convinced that it occurred as early as Schifano claimed or as late as Brown stated. Although the date of this particular incident is uncertain, I find, for other reasons, that Brown did have knowledge of the union activities of the employees before 1 February 1985.

Brown, initially, testified that he first became aware of the existence of the Union on 19 March 1985. He then testified that he became aware of the Union about a day or two before the election when he saw the Board's election notices in the plant. That testimony must be evaluated in light of the circumstances, which existed at that time in the plant. The shop where Brown and the other employees worked was a small one, there were 15 employees in the unit and Brown worked closely with these employees, often performing the same work they did. He shared a locker room with these employees, and he was on a friendly basis with them both during and after work hours. He exchanged telephone numbers with several of the employees and he frequently had drinks with them at a local restaurant. Despite his friendship with these employees, and his presence with them on the job and in the locker room, it was Brown's position that he had no knowledge about the Union until late March. If that testimony is credited, it means that Brown did not know that a representation petition had been filed in early February 1985 or that Respondent had agreed in late February 1985 that an election would be held. Further, it means that Brown continued to be unaware of any union activity even when that activity was well known to Wardrop, who was Brown's immediate supervisor, and to Roth, the Respondent's president, both of whom were writing letters to employees, in the weeks before the election urging them to vote against union representation. I do not credit Brown's testimony that he had not gained knowledge about the union activities of the employees in the circumstances that existed at the plant. In fact, Brown's efforts to distance himself from any knowledge of the employees union activities raises the inference, which I make, that Brown, due to his relationship with other employees and the size of the plant 1 February 1985. The Board has held that knowledge of union activities of employees need not always be established by direct evidence, reliance may be placed on circumstantial evidence and knowledge may be inferred from the record as a whole. Park General Clinic, 218 NLRB 540, 544 (1975); Thunderbird Motel, 180 NLRB 656, 658 (1978). Although there is no direct evidence that Brown transmitted this information to Wardrop, the Board has held that a supervisor's knowledge of the union activities of the employees can be imputed to his supervisor. Herb Kohn Electric Co., 272 NLRB 815, 819 (1984); Hawthorne Mazda, 251 NLRB 313, 316 (1980).

On the evening of 30 January 1985, after discussing the matter in the locker room, a group of employees, including Greene and Chinfloo, left work to attend a union meeting. Insofar as this record discloses, this was the first time this had happened. Greene claimed that as the men left work they were observed by Wardrop and Colon, another supervisor, but Greene admitted that this was not unusual. On the following day, an incident occurred that involved Greene and Brown. Wardrop claimed that the incident was of such a serious nature that it required him to discharge Greene. There is no dispute that Greene's work was criticized by Brown on 31 January 1985. However, I am not convinced that the criticism was justified or that Wardrop, under other circumstances would have viewed the events that followed thereafter as grounds to discharge Greene. Rather, I believe that Wardrop used the incident to discharge Greene because of his support for the Union.

An examination of the testimony given by Brown and Wardrop about the entire incident discloses significant differences in their versions of the events. According to Greene and Chinfloo, Wardrop came to the jobsite about 12:30 or 1 p.m. on 30 January 1985, expressed satisfaction with the work the men were doing, spoke to Brown, and left the site. Brown then came to where Greene and Chinfloo were working, and told the men to "push" the job. Statements made by Wardrop in his affidavit tend to support, at least in part, Greene's version of what happened. According to those statements, it was Brown who came to Wardrop to complain about the slow progress of the work being performed by Greene and Chinfloo. The testimony given by Wardrop, however, was completely different from the statements contained in his affidavit. According to Wardrop's testimony, he observed the work being done by Greene and his group, he considered that the work was being performed in a dangerous manner, and he instructed Brown to correct the way work was being done, after Brown completed his own work. If, in fact, the work was being done in a dangerous manner, it is surprising that Wardrop did not speak directly to Greene or at least that he did not direct Brown to speak immediately to Greene about the problem. According to Wardrop, he not only did not speak to Greene but he left the jobsite when he knew a dangerous condition existed that had not been corrected. Brown gave two versions concerning this incident. According to Brown's testimony on direct examination, about 3:30 p.m., which was almost the end of the workday, he observed that Greene's group was not performing the work correctly, he told this to the group and he instructed them about the way the work should be done. However, on cross-examination, Brown changed both the time the incident occurred and the individual who first observed the manner in which the work was being performed. Thus, he testified that the incident occurred at 12:30 or 1 p.m. and that it was Wardrop who first noticed that the work was being performed in an incorrect manner. These numerous contradictions by Respondent's witnesses about the event raises suspicions about whether there was, in fact, any real reason to criticize the work being performed by Greene's group. Admittedly, Greene did not consider that there was, and he expressed his irritation to Brown about what he considered to be unjustified criticism. Wardrop claimed that it was Greene's conduct in expressing this irritation that he considered so serious that it warranted Greene's discharged. I do not credit that assertion.

It was evident that Brown, who had the disagreement with Greene, considered the entire incident a trivial one. In fact, according to Brown, he had not intended to discuss the matter with Wardrop and did so only because he met Wardrop as he left the locker room and Wardrop questioned him about what had happened. Brown did tell Wardrop that Greene appeared to resent his criticism, but Brown did not ask Wardrop either to speak to Greene or to reprimand him. Wardrop did not agree with Brown's version of this incident. Wardrop, apparently to support his position of the seriousness of the incident, claimed that it was Brown who came to his office to complain about Greene's conduct. Although Wardrop admitted that Brown did not ask him to reprimand Greene, Wardrop claimed that he decided he had to do something about Greene's conduct. Brown testified that Greene was still in the locker room when he left the room and saw Wardrop. Wardrop claimed that after he spoke to Brown he looked for Greene, but Greene had left the building. Wardrop's testimony about what he intended to do about Greene's conduct and when he made that decision changed so frequently that it was difficult to follow it. Wardrop claimed that he looked for Greene immediately after he spoke to Brown because he wanted to "raise hell with him." However, later, he testified that he looked for Greene immediately after Brown spoke to him in order to discharge him. He then testified that he thought about it overnight and it was then that he decided to discharge Greene. Subsequently, he changed that testimony again and stated that he made an immediate decision to discharge Greene because of his insubordination. It is impossible to believe that Wardrop would be uncertain as to whether his decision was "to raise hell with Greene" or to discharge him. There is a significant difference between those two options. It is also unlikely that Wardrop would be confused about whether he made the decision after he spoke to Brown or at some point during the night when he thought about the matter. This confused and contradictory testimony establishes that Wardrop did not testify truthfully when he said that he told Greene he was discharged for insubordination.[15] It also establishes that he was not truthful when he claimed that it was Greene's insubordination that caused his discharge. The courts and the Board have held that if the stated motive for a discharge is false, then a judge may infer that there is another motive, an illegal one the employer desires to conceal. Shattuck Denn Mining Corp. v. NLRB, 362 F.2d 466, 470 (9th Cir. 1966); Professional Air Traffic Controllers Organization, 261 NLRB 922, 932 (1982); Kenco Plastics Co., 260 NLRB 1420, 1421 (1982).

Based on the evidence in this case I find, under the standard set forth in Wright Line, 251 NLRB 1083 (1980), that the General Counsel has established that Greene's support for the Union was a motivating factor in his discharge and Respondent has failed to demonstrate that it would have taken the same action against him absent his union activities. Thus, I find that Respondent's employees commenced their activities on behalf of the Union in December 1984, that Brown, a supervisor who spent a considerable amount of time with the small complement of employees, including Greene, both during and after work hours, became aware of these activities, that Respondent expressed its opposition to these union activities of its employees,[16] that Greene attended the meeting in the locker room where the employees agreed to go to the union meeting, that he attended the union meeting, and signed a union authorization card on 30 January 1985, that immediately thereafter he was discharged, and that absent his union activities Respondent would have not have discharged Greene for the trivial incident that occurred on 31 January 1985. Accordingly, I find that Greene was discharged in violation of Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act. Allied Lettercraft Co., 272 NLRB 612 (1984); Abbey Island Park Manor, 267 NLRB 163 (1983).

[15] In fact, Wardrop's lack of certainty about when the decision was made to discharge Greene, tends to support Greene's assertion that he was never told that he was discharged. Greene's testimony about this issue also is supported by the fact that he collected unemployment insurance because he claimed he was laid off. There is no evidence that Respondent filed an objection to the receipt of these benefits.

[16] Although I find that Roth expressed his opposition to the Union, both in letters he sent to employees and in his statement to Schifano that he would go out of business, it should be noted that direct evidence of union animus is not required to establish that a layoff or discharge was unlawful. Westinghouse Electric Corp., 235 NLRB 356, 358 (1978).

Schifano and Wardrop both agree that Schifano came to Respondent's premises in early February 1985, spoke to Roth, and demanded that he recognize the Union as the representative of his employees. However, they disagree about when the event occurred, about whether Chinfloo was discharged before or after this meeting, and about whether the meeting caused Chinfloo's discharge and/or layoff. Chinfloo had no knowledge about when a union representative came to Respondent's premises but he testified that he heard it was 7 February 1985, and Chinfloo then proceeded to tailor his testimony to suit those hearsay statements. Thus, he testified, originally, that it was 7 February 1985 when Wardrop told him he was laid off. Wardrop claimed that it was 6 February 1985 when he told Chinfloo that he was discharged and in support of this position he offered Chinfloo's timecard, which establishes the last time Chinfloo worked for Respondent was noon on 6 February 1985. Chinfloo, after much probing, finally agreed 6 February was the last day that he worked for Respondent. It was Wardrop's position that Schifano did not come to Respondent's premises until 7 February 1985 and, therefore, Chinfloo's discharge could not have been related to Schifano's visit. I do not credit Wardrop's testimony concerning the date of Schifano's visit to the plant.

Schifano testified that he spoke to Roth about 10 a.m. on 6 February 1985, told him he represented a majority of employees and demanded recognition. Schifano also testified that Roth, initially, stated that he would go out of business, but he then agreed to a meeting to discuss the matter the following day. Later that day, Roth's office called to cancel the meeting and, therefore, Schifano, on 6 February 1985, contacted his office and told them to file a representation petition with the Board. Although I find that Schifano embellished his testimony to establish that it was 6 February 1985 when he met with Roth, I credit the essential parts of his testimony for the following reasons. First, Roth, the president of the Company, was not called to testify and he did not refute Schifano's testimony about this meeting. It is well established that an adverse inference can be drawn when a witness within the control of a Respondent fails to testify. Laredo Coca Cola Bottling v. NLRB, 613 F.2d 1338 (5th Cir. 1980). Moreover, I observed Wardrop who did testify about the incident and I was not convinced that his testimony was truthful. Finally, I credit the testimony of the Union's counsel, which tends to support Schifano's testimony that he met with Roth on 6 February 1985, and I base my credibility resolution on my observation of counsel and on the notations contained in her work diary. Harper credibly testified that it was her practice to arrange appointments before they occurred, that her diary disclosed that she had scheduled an appointment for 10 a.m. on 7 February 1985, concerning Respondent's employees, with a representative of the Union, that she usually did not arrive at her office until 10 a.m. and that the notation about this appointment was in her handwriting. The implication of that testimony is that Harper scheduled an appointment with a union representative to discuss the situation at Respondent's premises sometime before 7 February 1985. Further, Harper credibly testified that the subject matter of her conversation with the union representative was the Union's request that a representation petition be filed for Respondent's employees. Harper's testimony supports Schifano's statements that it was 6 February 1985 when Roth called to cancel a scheduled meeting and that it was that day when he called his office and told them that a representation petition had to be filed. Accordingly, I find that it was the morning of 6 February 1985 when Schifano demanded that Respondent recognize the Union as the collective-bargaining representative of its employees and that it was within a few hours thereafter that Chinfloo was discharged.

As noted above, immediately after the employees, including Greene and Chinfloo agreed in the locker room to attend a union meeting, attended that meeting and signed authorization cards for the Union, Wardrop seized on an incumbent to discharge Greene because he supported the Union. The same pattern was followed concerning Chinfloo. Chinfloo was discharged, within hours after Schifano came to the plant, allegedly for an incident that occurred in early February 1985. I do not credit Wardrop's explanation that he did not discharge Chinfloo at the time of the incident because he was busy with other projects. It is obvious that if Wardrop considered Chinfloo's inability to locate a particular jobsite to be serious he would have discharged him at the time the incident occurred. That Wardrop did not consider the matter important is evident from the fact that he did not reprimand Chinfloo at the time the incident occurred or mention it to Chinfloo. Wardrop knew from the beginning of Chinfloo's employment that his knowledge of the city was limited but Chinfloo was able to cope with the problem, for many months, apparently to Wardrop's satisfaction. It is unlikely in these circumstances that Wardrop would have discharged Chinfloo because of his failure on one occasion to locate a particular site. As in the case of Greene, Wardrop seized on a situation to discharge Chinfloo, which absent Chinfloo's support for the Union he would not have done. In these circumstances, I find that Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) and (3) when it discharged Chinfloo. Taylor Hospital, 272 NLRB 697, 702 (1984).

Although, as I have observed, I have not credited all the testimony given by Greene and Chinfloo, I do credit their testimony that Wardrop told them they were laid off and did not tell them they were discharged. I base this conclusion on the contradictory testimony given by Wardrop regarding this issue and that both Greene and Chinfloo collected unemployment benefits without objection by Respondent. It is unlikely that Respondent would have permitted these employees to receive such benefits if they had been discharged for cause. However, although I find that Wardrop told Greene and Chinfloo that they were laid off and would be recalled, I have concluded that Wardrop, in fact, discriminatorily discharged the two employees.[17]

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. Respondent is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.
2. The Union is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.
3. The Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act by discharging Phillip Greene and Cessil Chinfloo.
4. The aforesaid unfair labor practices affect commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

THE REMEDY

Having found that Respondent has engaged in unfair labor practices within the meaning of Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act, I shall recommend that it cease and desist from engaging in such unfair labor practices and take certain affirmative action set forth below. Respondent shall offer to Phillip Greene and Cessil Chinfloo, immediate and full reinstatement to their former positions without prejudice to their seniority or other rights or privileges. In addition, Respondent shall make Greene and Chinfloo whole for any loss of earnings or other benefits they may have suffered by reasons of the discrimination practiced against them. All backpay shall be computed in the manner set forth in F. W. Woolworth Co., 231 NLRB 651 (1977). See generally Isis Plumbing Co., 138 NLRB 716 (1962). Additionally, I shall require that Respondent remove from its records any reference to the unlawful discharges of Greene and Chinfloo. Respondent shall also be required to provide written notice of such expunctions and to inform them that Respondent's unlawful conduct will not be used as a basis for further personnel actions concerning them. Sterling Sugars, 261 NLRB 472 (1982).

On these findings of fact and conclusions of law and on the entire record, I issue the following recommended[18]

ORDER

The Respondent, Clark & Wilkins Industries, Inc, New York, New York, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall

1. Cease and desist from

(a) Discharging and subsequently refusing to reinstate its employees because of their activities on behalf of or their support for Shopmen's Local Union No. 455, International Association of Bridge, Structural & Ornamental Iron Workers, AFL–CIO or any other labor organization.

(b) In any like or related manner interfering with, restraining, or coercing its employees in the exercise of their rights to self organization, to form, join, or assist labor organizations, to bargain collectively through representatives of their own choosing, and to engage concerted activities for the purpose of collective bargaining or other mutal aid or protection, or to refrain from any or all such activities.

2. Take the following affirmative action necessary to effectuate the policies of the Act.

(a) Offer to Phillip Greene and Cessil Chinfloo full and immediate reinstatement to their former or substantially equivalent positions of employment, without prejudice to their seniority or any other rights and privileges previously enjoyed.

(b) Make whole Greene and Chinfloo for any loss of earnings they may have suffered by reason of the discrimination against them in the manner set forth in the remedy section of this decision.

(c) Preserve and, on request, make available to the Board or its agents for examination and copying, all payroll records, social security payment records, timecards, personnel records and reports, and all other records necessary to analyze the amount of backpay due under the terms of this Order.

(d) Post at its place of business in New York, New York, copies of the attached notice marked "Appendix."[19] Copies of the notice, on forms provided by the Regional Director for Region 2, after being signed by the Respondent's authorized representative, shall be posted by the Respondent immediately upon receipt and maintained for 60 consecutive days in conspicuous places including all places where notices to employees are customarily posted. Reasonable steps shall be taken by the Respondent to ensure that the notices are not altered, defaced, or covered by any other material.

(e) Notify the Regional Director in writing within 20 days from the date of this Order what steps the Respondent has taken to comply.

IT IS FURTHER ORDERED that the Regional Director for Region 2 shall, within 10 days from the date of this decision, open and count the ballots cast by Phillip Greene and Cessil Chinfloo in Case 2–RC–19908 and prepare and serve on the parties a revised tally of ballots. If the revised tally reveals that the Union has received a majority of the valid ballots cast, the Regional Director shall issue a certification of representative. However, if the revised tally shows that the Union has not received a majority of the valid ballots cast the Regional Director

[17] Respondent has not cited any support for its position that the Union waived its right to argue the issue of discriminatory discharges because it failed to raise that issue prior to the election. I do not find any validity to that argument. Moreover, any ambiguity that exists with respect to the status of these employees is the result of the Wardrop's verbal statements to the employees and his actual intent with respect to that status.

[18] If no exceptions are filed as provided by Sec. 102.46 of the Board's Rules and Regulations, the findings, conclusions, and recommended Order shall, as provided in Sec. 102.48 of the Rules, be adopted by the Board and all objections to them shall be deemed waived for all purposes.

[19] If this Order is enforced by a judgment of a United States court of appeals, the words in the notice reading "Posted by Order of the National Labor Relations Board" shall read "Posted Pursuant to a Judgment of the United States Court of Appeals Enforcing an Order of the National Labor Relations Board."

shall set aside the election results and forward the case to the Board for further consideration.[20]

July 29, 1988

DECISION AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN STEPHENS AND MEMBERS JOHANSEN AND BABSON

On February 19, 1986, Administrative Law Judge Stephen M. Charno issued the attached decision. The Respondent filed exceptions and a supporting brief, and the General Counsel filed an answering brief.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the decision and the record in light of the exceptions and briefs and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings,[1] and conclusions as modified, to modify the remedy,[2] and to adopt the recommended Order.

The judge found that the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(3) and (1) of the Act by refusing to reassign and promote Charles Richardson, and violated Section 8(a)(1) by threatening to harass, retaliate against, and prevent Richardson's advancement because he had filed grievances or otherwise engaged in protected concerted activity. In its answer and at the hearing, the Respondent denied that it had violated the Act as alleged and argued that the dispute here was cognizable under the grievance-arbitration provisions of a collective-bargaining agreement between the Respondent and the American Postal Workers Union, which represents Richardson. Accordingly, relying on the Board's decision in United Technologies Corp., 268 NLRB 557 (1984), and Collyer Insulated Wire, 192 NLRB 837 (1971), the Respondent urged that the matter be deferred.

At the hearing, the judge refused to defer this dispute to the grievance procedure.[3] In refusing to defer at the hearing, the judge stated that it was not "altogether" clear that the issues which would be presented in the grievance procedure were sufficiently similar to those presented to the Board such that the standards set forth in Spielberg Mfg. Co., 112 NLRB 1080 (1955), could be applied.[4] Indicating that, if the General Counsel's prima facie case were believed, there was a violation of the Act here, the judge contrasted this with the Union's purported doubt as to whether a contract violation existed. The judge also noted that the Charging Party in this case was Richardson, not the Union. He found that when Richardson sought to use the grievance procedure, the use of that process was denied him by the Union. Thus, the judge concluded that it would be inappropriate to deny Richardson the protection of the Act's processes based on the actions of the Union, which did not appear to be motivated by a desire to avoid deferral to arbitration by the Board.

We agree with the judge that deferral in this case is inappropriate, but in doing so we rely on the fact that this grievance-arbitration procedure has been totally ineffective in curbing the Respondent's proclivity to retaliate against the Charging Party for filing grievances.

The record shows that Charging Party Richardson has filed numerous grievances since 1981. Richardson has also filed several EEO complaints against the Respondent, including one that alleged the Respondent had taken reprisals against him for filing complaints and grievances. The grievances and EEO complaints consistently were resolved in Richardson's favor.

In this proceeding the Respondent, through Postmaster Clarence Bounds (Richardson's supervisor), is alleged to have refused to reassign and promote Richardson, and to have threatened and harassed him because of his grievance-filing. The record contains evidence that Bounds told Richardson he would not be reassigned because he had filed complaints and grievances, that he could file a grievance if he did not like the work assignments, and that Bounds would "get back" at Richardson if he continued to file grievances.

We find that the record evidence establishes that the Respondent has engaged in a series of reprisals against Richardson for his grievance-filing activity. This pattern of hostile conduct is fundamentally at odds with the Act and the policy behind deferral.

[1] The Respondent has excepted to some of the judge's credibility findings. The Board's established policy is not to overrule an administrative law judge's credibility resolutions unless the clear preponderance of all the relevant evidence convinces us that they are incorrect. Standard Dry Wall Products, 91 NLRB 544 (1950), enfd. 188 F.2d 362 (3d Cir. 1951). We have carefully examined the record and find no basis for reversing the findings.

In agreement with the judge, we find that the instant charge involving the 8(a)(3) allegation was timely filed in accordance with Sec. 10(b) of the Act. In this respect, we note that the action by the Respondent which gives rise to the alleged 8(a)(3) violation did not occur until September 26, 1984, when the Respondent, by letter, notified Charging Party Richardson that another employee had been awarded the desired transfer. Inasmuch as the instant charge was filed on January 9, 1985, the event of September 26, 1984, is clearly encompassed within the statutory 6-month period for the filing of charges under Sec. 10(b) of the Act.

[2] In accordance with our decision in New Horizons for the Retarded, 283 NLRB 1173 (1987), interest on and after January 1, 1987, shall be computed at the "short-term Federal rate" for the underpayment of taxes as set out in the 1986 amendment to 26 U.S.C. § 6621. Interest on amounts accrued prior to January 1, 1987 (the effective date of the 1986 amendment to 26 U.S.C. § 6621), shall be computed in accordance with Florida Steel Corp., 231 NLRB 651 (1977).

[3] In his decision, the judge reaffirmed that refusal without elaboration.

[4] Spielberg deals with the issue of whether the Board will defer to an arbitration decision. The Respondent was not relying on Spielberg in seeking initial deferral to the arbitration procedure.

The facts of the case at bar show a continuation of the earlier coercive conduct, and the Respondent's recent statements reveal an intent to retaliate against Richardson in the future. In these circumstances, the grievance-arbitration machinery we are being asked to defer to has become meaningless in the extended campaign of reprisals against Richardson. Accordingly, we will not require Richardson to perform what has clearly become a futile act. The Respondent's own words have established the futility of future grievance-filing by Richardson.

Having concluded that deferral is inappropriate here, we have considered the merits of the alleged unfair labor practices. For the reasons set forth by the judge, we adopt his conclusions that the Respondent has violated Section 8(a)(3) and (1) as alleged in the complaint.

ORDER

The National Labor Relations Board adopts the recommended Order of the administrative law judge and orders that the Respondent, United States Postal Service, Joplin, Missouri, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall take the action set forth in the Order, except that the attached notice is substituted for that of the administrative law judge.

DECISION

STEVEN M. CHARNO, Administrative Law Judge. In response to a charge filed on 9 January 1985, a complaint was issued on 1 April 1985 alleging that the United States Postal Service (Respondent) had violated Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the National Labor Relations Act by refusing to reassign and promote Charles B. Richardson and by threatening and harassing him because he had engaged in protected concerted activity. Respondent's answer denied the commission of any unfair labor practice.

A hearing was held before me in Joplin, Missouri, on 29 May 1985 and 10–12 July 1985. At the hearing, the complaint was amended over Respondent's objection to allege an additional violation of Section 8(a)(1). On 23 August 1985, Respondent sought permission to file an interlocutory appeal on the issue of whether the Board should defer to arbitration concerning the matters involved in this case. The Board denied permission to appeal on 5 November 1985, without prejudice to the renewal of Respondent's request for deferral on exception. Briefs were thereafter filed by the General Counsel and Respondent under extended due date of 17 December 1985.

On the entire record and after due consideration, I make the following

FINDINGS OF FACT

I. JURISDICTION

Respondent provides postal services for the United States of America and operates various facilities throughout the country in the performance of that function, including the facility involved in this proceeding at Galena, Kansas. It is admitted, and I find, that the Board has jurisdiction over Respondent and the subject matter of this proceeding by virtue of section 1209 of the Postal Reorganization Act of 1970.

American Postal Workers Union is admitted to be, and I find is, a labor organization within the meaning of the Act.

II. THE ALLEGED UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

A. Background

At the Galena facility, clerical employees are represented by the Union and mail carriers on city routes are represented by the National Association of Letter Carriers (Association). At all times relevant, Respondent, the Union, and the Association were parties to a collective-bargaining agreement covering the represented employees. That agreement provides that work in the clerical craft and work in the carrier craft shall not normally be combined in a single job position. When Respondent wishes to fill a full-time position, the collective-bargaining agreement establishes that the most senior part-time employee in the same craft as the vacancy shall, under most circumstances, receive the job. When there are no eligible employees within the same craft, Respondent is free to select an outside applicant or choose an employee from another craft who has requested reassignment. Under the grievance procedure established by the collective-bargaining agreement, grievances arising at the Galena facility are to be heard at the first level by the local postmaster and at the second level by Respondent's management in Wichita, Kansas.

Charles B. Richardson was hired by Respondent on 9 April 1977 as a part-time clerk at its Joplin facility. In the fall of 1979, Richardson wished to transfer to Respondent's Galena facility and contacted that facility's postmaster, Clarence Bounds. In November 1979, Bounds offered Richardson a position as a part-time clerk-carrier[1] and indicated that Richardson could become a full-time carrier within 3 to 4 years. This offer did not constitute an absolute promise of advancement, but impliedly required that Richardson maintain a satisfactory level of performance. Richardson accepted the offer and transferred to Galena, effective 1 December 1979.

Respondent's Galena facility is relatively small. At the time of the hearing, the work force consisted of two full-time rural carriers, two full-time city route carriers, one part-time carrier, and two part-time clerks. Bounds was the sole supervisor.

B. The Alleged Discrimination

In February 1983,[2] Richardson was assigned to work holidays and days off for Lester Clarkson, a full-time city route carrier. It is unclear from the record whether there was any other employee who was eligible and willing to accept such an assignment at that time. Between February and the beginning of July 1983, no customer complaints were recorded concerning Richardson's performance as a carrier.

On 11 July 1983, Bounds began to document a series of customer complaints against Richardson. Although all of Respondent's employees are authorized to take complaints from customers, 18 of the 19 complaints recorded against Richardson were documented by Bounds. The remaining complaint was documented by Timothy Weston, and it is uncertain whether Bounds encouraged other employees to solicit complaints concerning Richardson.[3] Twelve of the complaints documented by Bounds concerned reported misdeliveries of mail by Richardson although Bounds admittedly did not consider identical reports of carrier Weston's misdeliveries to be complaints. Indeed, there is no evidence that any other carrier ever had a customer complaint documented against him for misdelivering mail, even though all the city route carriers who testified had made misdeliveries. The record is devoid of credible evidence of the number and nature of complaints received by Respondent concerning carriers of experience similar to that of Richardson during a comparable time period.[4]

On 24 February 1984,[5] Bounds disciplined Richardson for misdelivery of mail and discourtesy by giving him a letter of warning. On 8 March, Richardson filed a grievance concerning the letter and, at the second stage of the grievance procedure, the warning was reduced by Bounds' superiors to a job discussion, a nondisciplinary action. Later in March, Bounds denied Richardson a pay increase, and Richardson filed a grievance concerning that decision on 28 March. On 29 March,[6] Bounds relieved Richardson of all carrier duties, purportedly because of customer complaints and a failure to work efficiently. On 16 April, the grievance concerning the pay increase was decided in Richardson's favor by Bounds' superiors at the second level of the grievance procedure.

During the summer, Respondent created a part-time carrier position in anticipation of Clarkson's impending retirement. On 26 June, Weston requested reassignment to the carrier craft, and Richardson made a similar request on 6 July. In early July, Bounds took the unprecedented step[7] of asking carriers Clarkson and Teddy Watkins to recommend an employee to fill the upcoming carrier vacancy. When Bounds made the request, he was aware that the two carriers did not get along with Richardson and expected that they would recommend Weston. As Bounds planned, Clarkson and Watkins wrote a letter suggesting Weston for the vacancy, even though the latter had never worked as a carrier.[8]

On 11 July, Bounds told Richardson that Weston, rather than Richardson, would be reassigned as a carrier because of the complaints and grievances[9] filed by Rich-

[1] Richardson and his wife so testified. Bounds denied offering Richardson a position so denominated and advanced arguments in support of the denial. I do not credit Bounds in light of official documents that he prepared on 13 October 1981 and 8 November 1983 which describe Richardson's position as "clerk-carrier." Although determination of the correct title for Richardson's position is not necessary to the resolution of any issue in this case, Bounds' testimony on this question showed a lack of candor and reflected adversely on his credibility.

[2] The beginning date of Richardson's service as a carrier is taken from an employment history prepared by Bounds.

[3] When asked whether he encouraged Clarkson to solicit customer complaints about Richardson, Bounds refused to respond directly. His evasiveness, together with his evident nervousness during this line of questioning, reflect adversely on Bounds' credibility.

[4] Bounds testified that an average carrier would receive three to four complaints during a similar period, but no documentary evidence was offered on this question. In light of Bounds' disparate treatment of Richardson and Weston with regard to misdelivered mail, his demonstrated antipathy toward Richardson and his overall demeanor while testifying, I find his unsupported testimony on this point to be suppositious and do not credit it.

[6] This date is taken from contemporaneous records prepared by Bounds.

[7] Watkins testified that this was the only such request he had received in over 25 years as a carrier.

[8] Clarkson and Watkins, who are the sole members and, consequently, the officers of Local 793 of the Association, wrote the letter on the Association's stationery. I do not accept Respondent's contention on brief that the letter constituted the Association's official position.

[9] At the time of this conversation, Richardson had filed grievances and/or EEO complaints concerning at least seven matters. In the spring of 1981, Richardson filed a grievance over Bound's insistence that Richardson work as a supervisor. This was resolved when a union steward pointed out that the collective-bargaining agreement prevented a postmaster from requiring an employee to work as a supervisor. On 23 April 1981, Richardson filed an EEO complaint over Bounds' accusation that ardson and because of the Clarkson/Watkins letter.[10] Following this conversation, Richardson called the union business agent to discuss the possibility of filing a grievance. The agent advised Richardson to wait until a final decision was made concerning the position.

On 19 September, Bounds wrote a letter to higher management in Wichita recommending Weston for the carrier vacancy. Attached to the letter were employment histories that Bounds had prepared for both applicants. Weston's history mentioned his general work habits and concluded by referring to his tenure as a mail carrier, which had not begun until 13 September. No mention was made of the fact that Weston had not filed any grievances or complaints. The employment history Bounds prepared for Richardson mentioned the latter's tendency to file grievances and EEO complaints, discoursed on Richardson's "attitude," referred to the "customer complaints" documented by Bounds and concluded that Bounds would consider a future reassignment request from Richardson if the latter were "on a course which is for the team and not for one individual." Bounds' recommendation that Weston receive the carrier position was routinely approved by Respondent's management.

During a September 29 conversation overheard by carrier Earl Williams, Richardson asked Bounds about the vacancy, and Bounds stated that Richardson would not receive the reassignment because he had filed grievances and EEO complaints.[11] Bounds then suggested that Richardson file another complaint if he was dissatisfied.

Shortly thereafter, Richardson called the Union and asked that a grievance be filed concerning the reassignment. A union business agent told Richardson that the reassignment constituted a lateral move and was not, therefore, governed by or grievable under the collective-bargaining agreement. The agent then suggested that Richardson file an EEO complaint. Richardson did so, and that complaint was pending at the time of the hearing in this proceeding.

Weston became a part-time carrier on October 13.

On 21 November, Richardson asked Bounds for additional hours. Bounds refused and told Richardson that he could file a grievance or seek other employment if he did not like the decision.[12] On 23 November, Bounds scheduled carrier Weston to work as a clerk when Richardson was available for work. When confronted, Bounds again told Richardson that he could file a grievance or find another job if he did not like the decision.[13] Richardson's subsequent grievance over the cross-craft assignment was decided in his favor by Bounds' superiors.[14]

On 27 November, Richardson called one of Respondent's management officials in Wichita and provided him with citations to portions of the collective-bargaining agreement that Richardson thought had been violated by the reassignment. By letter of 29 November, Respondent informed Richardson that the agreement did not apply to the reassignment.

In January 1985, Weston, who was the senior part-time carrier, was promoted to fill a full-time carrier vacancy.

On 21 January 1985, Bounds altered the number of hours on Richardson's timecard by 1 hour because a power outage had stopped the timeclock. When Richardson protested this action, Bounds suggested that Richardson file another grievance. Bounds added that Richardson could continue to file grievances but that Bounds would continue to get back at Richardson for doing so.[15]

C. Discussion

Two prefatory issues require resolution. The first concerns Respondent's repeated request that the Board defer to the grievance procedure established by the collective-bargaining agreement between Respondent and the Union. Based on the foregoing findings and for the reasons I gave at the hearing, I reaffirm my ruling denying Respondent's request for deferral.

The second preliminary matter concerns Respondent's contention that the 11 July 1984 conversation falls outside of the 6-month statute of limitations mandated by Section 10(b) of the Act. The running of the statutory period is halted by the service of a charge, and service occurs on the date the charge is mailed. See Laborers

Richardson had $42 belonging to Bounds. The record does not indicate any resolution of the matter, but no reference to disciplinary action appears in Richardson's personnel folder. On 21 September 1981, Richardson filed a grievance concerning a warning issued to him by Bounds. At the second level of the grievance procedure, the matter was resolved in Richardson's favor by Bounds' superiors. On 13 October 1981, Richardson filed a grievance and an EEO complaint concerning Bounds' imposition of a 14-day suspension. Richardson was awarded 40 hours' pay as a result of the EEO complaint and an additional 40 hours' pay by Bounds' superiors at the second level of the grievance procedure. On 6 July 1982, Richardson filed an EEO complaint against Bounds for reprisals over past complaints and grievances. This was settled with both parties agreeing to strive to resolve their differences. The other grievances filed by Richardson prior to the July 11 conversation are outlined in the text. The content and resolution of Richardson's grievances and EEO complaints are significant only to the extent that they provide a motivation for Bounds' actions regarding Richardson.

[10] Richardson so testified. Although Bounds admitted the conversation, he denied referring to Richardson's grievances and complaints. Because of Bounds' overindulged penchant for mendacity while testifying and based on his demeanor on the stand and in the hearing room, I do not credit his denial. Indeed, the fact that Bounds mentioned grievances and complaints during this conversation is consonant with his undisputed reference to them in an employment history he prepared concerning Richardson only 2 months later.

[11] Richardson and Williams so testified. Bounds again admitted the conversation but denied making any reference to grievances and complaints. At the time Williams took the stand, he was in Respondent's employ and therefore testifying against his personal interest. See Georgia Rug Mill, 131 NLRB 1304, 1305 fn. 2 (1961). Unlike Respondent, I do not find it improbable that Williams would remember only the most startling portion of an overheard conversation that did not directly concern him and that had taken place more than 9 months before. Given Bounds' consistently demonstrated lack of candor in this proceeding, I do not credit his denial.

[12] This finding is based on the mutually corroborative testimony of Bounds and Richardson.

[13] Richardson so testified. Bounds stated that he did not recall the conversation in detail but admitted telling Richardson that "he could file a grievance" or "maybe he should seek other employment."

[14] Bounds' assertion under oath that he made the assignment because he was unaware of a recent change in the contract is of a piece with the remainder of his testimony. The record is clear that no such change had been made in the collective-bargaining agreement since at least 1981.

[15] This finding is based on Richardson's testimony. I do not credit Bounds' denial for the reasons set forth in prior credibility resolutions.

Local 264, 216 NLRB 40, 43 (1975), enfd. 529 F.2d 778 (8th Cir. 1976). Because the charge in this case was mailed on 9 January 1985, the events of 11 July 1984 are clearly within the statutory period. Respondent also appears to contend that, because Bounds threatened Richardson with loss of future preferment during a conversation that took place no later than 26 March 1984,[16] the statutory period relating to Respondent's refusal to reassign and promote Richardson should begin to run on that date. Because Richardson's application for reassignment was not denied until 26 September 1984, no final adverse employment action concerning him took place or could have taken place in March 1984. Accordingly, the statutory period did not begin to run in March. See Postal Service Marina Center, 271 NLRB 397, 400 (1984).

The central issue in this case is whether Bounds' decision not to reassign Richardson violated the Act. It is clear from the record that Respondent's decisions concerning a reassignment between crafts are discretionary and may, therefore, be made for any lawful reason or for no reason at all. Respondent cannot, however, make such a decision for a discriminatory reason. That is, Respondent cannot lawfully deny Richardson a reassignment because he exercised his right under the collective-bargaining agreement to file grievances.

Respondent contends that Bounds made the reassignment decision based on the superiority of Weston's performance, the customer complaints against Richardson, and the Clarkson/Watkins' letter recommending Weston. The significance of the superiority of Weston's performance as a carrier is rendered suspect by the fact that Bounds made his decision no later than 11 July—over 2 months before Weston began carrying mail. Similarly, the timing, manner of collection, and disparate nature of the complaints documented by Bounds against Richardson rob them of any probative value. Even if it were concluded that Bounds had not been "papering a case" against Richardson, the absence of any probative evidence concerning the number and nature of complaints received about other carriers makes it impossible to evaluate the significance of the complaints relating to Richardson. Finally, the carrier letter was not solicited by Bounds as an evaluative aid but as additional justification for a previously made decision. Accordingly, I conclude that the justifications advanced by Respondent were wholly pretextual. The real reason for refusing to reassign Richardson was the one repeatedly iterated by Bounds: Richardson filed too many grievances, almost all of which resulted in Bounds' decisions being reversed by his superiors.

Respondent also contends that the denial of Richardson's reassignment request cannot be discriminatory, even if Bounds was unlawfully motivated, because officials in Wichita made the final decision. In Frank Paxton Lumber Co., 235 NLRB 582, 583 (1978), the Board rejected this argument and held that a line supervisor's discriminatory recommendation bound the management official who made the final adverse action decision. In any event, it is clear that Respondent's managers relied on and routinely approved Bounds' decision. For the foregoing reasons, I find that Respondent's refusals to reassign and, consequently, to promote Richardson violate Section 8(a)(3) of the Act.

Resolution of the remaining issues raised by the complaint turns on the findings set out above. The record establishes that on 11 July and 29 September 1984 Bounds told Richardson that the latter would not be reassigned because he had filed complaints and grievances. On 23 and 25 November 1984, Bounds implied that he would continue to make decisions adversely affecting Richardson because of the complaints and grievances filed by the latter. Finally, on 21 January 1985, Bounds stated that he would "get back" at Richardson if the latter continued to file grievances. All of these statements by Bounds constitute threats designed to discourage protected concerted activity and are therefore violative of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. Respondent is an employer over whom the Board has jurisdiction by virtue of section 1209 of the Postal Reorganization Act of 1970.
2. The Union is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.
3. By threatening to harass, retaliate against, and prevent the advancement of Charles B. Richardson because he filed grievances, Respondent has engaged in unfair labor practices in violation of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.
4. By refusing to reassign and promote Charles B. Richardson because he filed grievances, Respondent has engaged and is engaging in unfair labor practices in violation of Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act.
5. The aforesaid unfair labor practices affect commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

REMEDY

Because Respondent engaged in unfair labor practices, it shall be ordered to cease and desist therefrom and to take certain affirmative action designed to effectuate the purposes of the Act. Such affirmative action shall include an offer to Charles B. Richardson of a full-time regular carrier position at the Galena facility, displacing if necessary any employee assigned to such a position since 31 December 1984. See Marlan Lewis, Inc., 270 NLRB 432, 434 (1984). Richardson shall be made whole for any loss he may have suffered as a result of Respondent's discriminatory refusals to reassign him on 13 October 1984 and to promote him in January 1985. Backpay will be calculated in accordance with the formula set forth in F. W. Woolworth Co., 90 NLRB 289 (150), to which interest shall be added in the manner provided in Florida Steel Corp., 231 NLRB 651 (1977).[17]

On these findings of fact and conclusions of law and on the entire record, I issue the following recommended[18]

[16] That threat was not alleged to be violative of the Act.

[17] See generally Isis Plumbing Co., 138 NLRB 716 (1962).

[18] If no exceptions are filed as provided by Sec. 102.46 of the Board's Rules and Regulations, the findings, conclusions, and recommended Order shall, as provided in Sec. 102.48 of the Rules, be adopted by the Board and all objections to them shall be deemed waived for all purposes.

ORDER

The Respondent, United States Postal Service, Galena, Missouri, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall

1. Cease and desist from

(a) Refusing to reassign or promote its employees because they file grievances or otherwise engage in protected concerted activity.

(b) Threatening to harass, retaliate against, or prevent the advancement of its employees because they file grievances or otherwise engage in protected concerted activity.

(c) In any like or related manner interfering with, restraining, or coercing its employees in the exercise of their rights to engage or refrain from engaging in any or all of the activities specified in Section 7 of the Act.

2. Take the following affirmative action necessary to effectuate the policies of the Act.

(a) Offer Charles B. Richardson a full-time regular carrier position at its Galena facility.

(b) Make Charles B. Richardson whole for any loss of earnings he may have suffered as a result of Respondent's discrimination against him in the manner set forth in the remedy section of this decision.

(d) Post at its Galena, Kansas facility copies of the attached notice marked "Appendix."[19] Copies of the notice, on forms provided by the Regional Director for Region 17, after being signed by the Respondent's authorized representative, shall be posted by the Respondent immediately upon receipt and maintained for 60 consecutive days in conspicuous places including all places where notices to employees are customarily posted. Reasonable steps shall be taken by the Respondent to ensure that the notices are not altered, defaced, or covered by any other material.

(e) Notify the Regional Director in writing within 20 days from the date of this Order what steps the Respondent has taken to comply.

July 29, 1988

DECISION AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN STEPHENS AND MEMBERS BABSON AND CRACRAFT

On October 15, 1985, Administrative Law Judge Richard D. Taplitz issued the attached decision. The General Counsel and the Charging Party filed exceptions and supporting briefs, and the Respondent filed an answering brief.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the decision and the record in light of the exceptions and briefs and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings,[1] and conclusions only to the extent consistent with this Decision and Order.

It is undisputed that the Respondent entered into its relationship with the Union pursuant to Section 8(f) of the Act. In John Deklewa & Sons, Inc., 282 NLRB 1375 (1987), enfd. sub nom. Iron Workers Local 3 v. NLRB, 843 F.2d 770 (3d Cir. 1988), the Board overruled R. J. Smith Construction Co., 191 NLRB 693 (1971), enf. denied sub nom. Operating Engineers Local 150 v. NLRB, 480 F.2d 1186 (D.C. Cir. 1973), abandoned the conversion doctrine,[2] and modified unit scope rules in 8(f) cases. As more fully set forth in Deklewa, supra at 1377, the Board decided to apply the following principles in 8(f) cases.

> (1) [A] collective-bargaining agreement permitted by Section 8(f) shall be enforceable through the mechanisms of Section 8(a)(5) and Section 8(b)(3); (2) such agreements will not bar the processing of valid petitions filed pursuant to Section 9(c) and Section 9(e); (3) in processing such petitions, the appropriate unit normally will be the single employer's employees covered by the agreement; and (4) upon the expiration of such agreements, the signatory union will enjoy no presumption of majority status, and either party may repudiate the 8(f) bargaining relationship.

Deklewa further held that "[i]n light of the legislative history and the traditional prevailing practice in the construction industry," in which the Respondent is engaged, "we will require the party asserting the existence of a 9(a) relationship to prove it,"[3] through either (1) a Board-conducted representation election or (2) a union's express demand for, and an employer's voluntary grant of, recognition, based on a showing of support for the union among a majority of the employees in an appropriate unit.[4]

Under Deklewa, we find that the General Counsel, while asserting that the Respondent is bound to recognize the Union under Section 9(a), has failed to establish that the relationship between the Respondent and the Union is anything other than an 8(f) relationship. There is no substantiated claim, nor any evidence, that a Board election was held or that there was a demand for and voluntary grant of recognition to the Union at any time premised on a showing of support for the Union among a majority of the Respondent's employees.[5]

Further applying Deklewa to the instant case, we reverse the judge and conclude that the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act. The contractual history shows that on November 1, 1983, the Respondent entered into a short-form agreement with the Union, which bound it to a master agreement between various employer associations and the Southern California District Council of Laborers, AFL–CIO. The contract was effective until June 15, 1986. By letter dated June 26, 1984, written in response to a June 4, 1984 letter of complaint from the Union, the Respondent repudiated article V, paragraph C, of the master agreement.[6] By letter dated December 20, 1984, the Respondent repudiated the entire agreement. The complaint alleges that by the above conduct the [1] We note that the Respondent did not except to the judge's decision not to reach the defenses raised by the Respondent to the judge. Accordingly, these defenses are not before us and we do not pass on them. Nonetheless, we note that were we to consider these defenses, we would find them to be without merit. Specifically, regarding the defense raised under Sec. 10(b), we note that even assuming that the repudiation of the collective-bargaining agreement took place, as argued by the Respondent, on November 1, 1983, the date of the execution of the contract, there is insufficient evidence of clear notice to the Union of this repudiation prior to the Respondent's June 26, 1984 and December 20, 1984 letters to the Union. See, e.g., L. C. Cassidy & Sons, Inc., 185 NLRB 920, 926 (1970).

[2] Under the conversion doctrine, a collective-bargaining relationship/agreement permitted under Sec. 8(f) could convert into one cognizable under Sec. 9(a) on the basis of a showing that during a relevant period the union enjoyed the support of a majority of the employer's employees in an appropriate unit.

[4] Ibid.

[5] The General Counsel excepts to the judge's finding that the General Counsel has not established by a preponderance of the credible evidence that the Union represented a majority of the employees in the bargaining unit at any relevant time. We find it unnecessary to pass on the judge's finding in this regard because such finding is predicated on precedent overruled by Deklewa.

[6] Art. V, par. C states:

> The Contractor shall not perform any work with employees at the site of the construction, alteration, painting or repair of a building, structure, or other work which comes within the recognized jurisdiction of the Carpenters, Cement Masons, Operating Engineers, or Teamsters, unless the contractor is signed to an appropriate current labor agreement with the appropriate craft.

Respondent has violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act.

Under the first Deklewa principle, the collective-bargaining agreement is enforceable under Section 8(a)(5) of the Act. However, under the fourth principle, the Union enjoyed no presumption of majority status following the contract's expiration date of June 15, 1986, and thus at that point the Respondent was free to repudiate the 8(f) bargaining relationship. Therefore, we find that the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act by repudiating the 1983–1986 contract with the Union during the contract term and shall limit the make-whole remedy accordingly.

THE REMEDY

Having found that the Respondent has engaged in certain unfair labor practices, we shall order that it cease and desist and take certain affirmative action necessary to effectuate the policies of the Act. We shall order the Respondent to make its employees whole, as prescribed in Ogle Protection Service, 183 NLRB 682, 683 (1970), for any losses they may have suffered as a result of the Respondent's failure to adhere to the contract from 6 months before the December 17, 1984 charge to the expiration of the agreement on June 15, 1986, with interest as computed in New Horizons for the Retarded.[7]

ORDER

The National Labor Relations Board orders that the Respondent, Meekins, Inc., Riverside, California, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall

1. Cease and desist from

(a) Withdrawing recognition during the term of a collective-bargaining agreement from Southern California District Council of Laborers, AFL–CIO, as the exclusive collective-bargaining representative of the Respondent's employees covered by the agreement.

(b) Repudiating its 1983–1986 collective-bargaining agreement with the Union until the June 15, 1986 expiration date.

(c) In any like or related manner interfering with, restraining, or coercing employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them by Section 7 of the Act.

2. Take the following affirmative action necessary to effectuate the policies of the Act.

(a) Make whole the above-described employees for any losses they may have suffered as a result of the Respondent's failure to adhere to the contract from 6 months before the December 17, 1984 charge until the contract's expiration date on June 15, 1986. The appropriate unit is:

> All job-site construction laborers employed by the Employer, excluding all other employees, clerical employees, guards and supervisors as described in the Act.

(b) Preserve and, on request, make available to the Board or its agents for examination and copying, all payroll records, social security payment records, timecards, personnel records and reports, and all other records necessary to analyze the amount of backpay due under the terms of this Order.

(c) Post at its Riverside, California office copies of the attached notice marked "Appendix."[8] Copies of the notice, on forms provided by the Regional Director for Region 21, after being signed by the Respondent's authorized representative, shall be posted by the Respondent immediately upon receipt and maintained for 60 consecutive days in conspicuous places including all places where notices to employees are customarily posted. Reasonable steps shall be taken by the Respondent to ensure that the notices are not altered, defaced, or covered by any other material.

(d) Sign and return to the Regional Director sufficient copies of the attached notice marked "Appendix" for posting by the Union, if willing, in conspicuous places where notices to employees and members are customarily posted.

(e) Notify the Regional Director in writing within 20 days from the date of this Order what steps the Respondent has taken to comply.

[7] In accordance with our decision in New Horizons for the Retarded, 283 NLRB 1173 (1987), interest on and after January 1, 1987, shall be computed at the "short-term Federal rate" for the underpayment of taxes as set out in the 1986 amendment to 26 U.S.C. § 6621. Interest on amounts accrued prior to January 1, 1987 (the effective date of the 1986 amendment to 26 U.S.C. § 6621), shall be computed in accordance with Florida Steel Corp., 231 NLRB 651 (1977).

Because the provisions of employee benefit fund agreements are variable and complex, the Board does not provide at the adjudicatory stage of the proceeding for the addition of interest at a fixed rate on unlawfully withheld fund payments. Therefore, any additional amount owed with respect to the health and welfare fund, pension fund, vacation fund, training and retraining fund, construction industry advancement fund shall be determined in accordance with the procedure set forth in Merryweather Optical Co., 240 NLRB 1213, 1216 fn. 7 (1979).

Our make-whole remedy includes the requirement that the Respondent remit to the Union all dues and fees that it should have deducted from employees' wages remitted pursuant to the terms of the collective-bargaining agreement.

[8] If this Order is enforced by a judgment of a United States court of appeals, the words in the notice reading "Posted by Order of the National Labor Relations Board" shall read "Posted Pursuant to a Judgment of the United States Court of Appeals Enforcing an Order of the National Labor Relations Board."

APPENDIX

NOTICE TO EMPLOYEES
POSTED BY ORDER OF THE
NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS BOARD
An Agency of the United States Government

The National Labor Relations Board has found that we violated the National Labor Relations Act and has ordered us to post and abide by this notice.

WE WILL NOT during the term of a collective-bargaining agreement repudiate that agreement and withdraw recognition from Southern California District Council of Laborers, AFL–CIO as the exclusive collective-bargaining representative of our employees covered by the agreement.

WE WILL NOT in any like or related manner interfere with, restrain, or coerce you in the exercise of the rights guaranteed you by Section 7 of the Act.

WE WILL make our employees whole for any losses they may have suffered as a result of our failure to adhere to the 1983–1986 contract with the Union until it expired on June 15, 1986.

MEEKINS, INC.

Lana Hill Parke, Esq., for the General Counsel.
Wilson Clark, Esq. (Clark & Tonigal), of Marina del Rey, California, for the Company.

DECISION

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

RICHARD D. TAPLITZ, Administrative Law Judge. This case was tried in Riverside, California, on June 5, 1985. The charge was filed on December 17, 1984, by Southern California District Council of Laborers, AFL–CIO (the District Council or the Union). The complaint, which issued on January 31, 1985, alleges that Meekins, Inc. (Respondent or the Company) violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the National Labor Relations Act.

Issue

The Company entered into a construction industry contract with the Union at a time when the Union did not represent the majority of the Company's employees. The contract was lawful under Section 8(f) of the Act but was unenforceable at that time. The key issue is whether the Union subsequently obtained majority status so that the contract became enforceable and the Company's renunciation of that contract constituted a violation of Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act. The Company has raised a number of defenses unrelated to the majority status question that need be resolved only if it is found that the Union did obtain majority status.

All parties were given full opportunity to participate, to introduce relevant evidence, to examine and cross-examine witnesses, to argue orally, and to file briefs. Briefs, which have been carefully considered, were filed on behalf of the General Counsel and the Company.

On the entire record,[1] and from my observation of the witnesses and their demeanor, I make the following

FINDINGS OF FACT

I. JURISDICTION

The Company, a California corporation with an office and place of business at 6293 Redley Road, Riverside, California, is a general contractor in the construction industry in the counties of Los Angeles, Orange, Riverside, and San Bernardino, California. During the year immediately preceeding issuance of the complaint, the Company performed services valued in excess of $50,000 for customers located in California, each of which, in turn, during the same period of time, purchased and received goods valued in excess of $50,000 directly from suppliers located outside the State of California. The complaint alleges, the answer admits, and I find that the Company is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

The complaint alleges that the Union is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act. The Company in its amended answer denies that allegation. The Union is a District Council that, under the authority of its International, and on behalf of itself and its affiliated locals, negotiates and services various collective-bargaining agreements with employers. A number of laborers locals in Southern California are affiliated with the District Council. Among them are Locals 300, 652, and 1184. Although the affiliated locals do negotiate some manufacturing agreements, the District Council is responsible for all construction industry agreements. Each affiliated local selects delegates to the District Council based on a vote of the membership. The number of delegates depend on the size of the membership of each affiliate. Section 2(5) of the Act defines a labor organization as "any organization of any kind, or any agency or employee representation committee or plan, in which employees participate and which exists for the purpose, in whole or in part, of dealing with employers concerning grievances, labor disputes, wage, rates of pay, hours of employment, or conditions of work." Employees who are members of the affiliated locals participate in the District Council through the delegates that they elect to that Council. The District Council exists in whole or in part to negotiate contracts with employers on behalf of the affiliated locals. The District Council meets all the requirements of the definition of a labor organization. See Plumbers Local 388 (Featherly Construction), 252 NLRB 452, 453–435 (1980), enfd. 703 F.2d 565 (6th Cir. 1982). In Southern California District Council of Laborers (Hahn, Inc.), 194 NLRB 471 (1971),[2] the Board held the very District Council involved in the instant case to be a labor organization within the meaning of

[1] The Company's unopposed motion to correct the transcript of the record is granted.

[2] The basic decision in that case was reported at 180 NLRB 364 (1969), enf. denied on other grounds 443 F.2d 220 (9th Cir. 1971).

Section 2(5) of the Act. I find that the District Council is a labor organization within the meaning of that section.

II. THE ALLEGED UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

A. Background

The Company is a general contractor in the construction industry. Most of the Company's work involves the digging of trenches and laying of pipe. Company employees use hand equipment such as shovels and picks to dig trenches and then lay the pipe in the trenches. That work is generally considered to be within the jurisdiction of the Laborers Union. Company employees also operate backhoes, loaders, cranes, and other heavy eqipment in the performance of their work. That work is generally considered to be within the jurisdiction of the Operating Engineers Union. In addition, employees drive water trucks over which the Teamsters generally have jurisdiction.

The issues in this case all concern a bargaining unit of construction laborers. Though the parties are in disagreement with regard to which employees should be included in a laborers bargaining agreement, they agree and I find that the following unit is appropriate for the purposes of collective bargaining within the meaning of Section 9(b) of the Act:

> All job-site construction laborers employed by the Employer, excluding all other employees, clerical employees, guards and supervisors as defined in the Act.

At one time, the Company had collective-bargaining agreements with both the District Council (Laborers) and with Local 12 of the Operating Engineers. Those contracts expired sometime in 1983 after the Company gave timely notification of its intention to terminate them.

Sometime after the Company gave its timely notice of intention to terminate the contracts, Charles Meekins, a 25-percent owner and vice president of the Company, met with Kenny Bell, a representative of Laborers Local 1184, and Bob Dye, and representative of Local 12, Operating Engineers. The union representatives asked Meekins to sign a contract and Meekins replied that he would not do so and that the Company was involved in litigation with Local 12.

During the last week of October 1983, Kenny Bell, the Laborers representative, came to Charles Meekins' office without a representative from the Operating Engineers. Bell asked Meekins to sign a laborers agreement. Charles Meekins, who had recent problems with the Operating Engineers but no such problems with the Laborers, agreed to sign. Bell left a "Laborers' Short-Form Agreement For The Construction Industry" with Meekins. On November 1, 1983, Charles Meekins signed it and delivered it to the District Council. The agreement bound the Company to the 1983–1986 Southern California Master Labor Agreement (MLA) between various employer associations and the District Council. The termination date of the MLA is June 15, 1986.

The Master Labor Agreement to which the Company bound itself contained a new provision that had not appeared in prior contracts. At the time he signed the short-form agreement, Charles Meekins was unaware of that provision. It was article V,C, which read:

> The Contractor shall not perform any work with employees at the site of the construction, alteration, painting, or repair of the building, structure, or other work which comes within the recognized jurisdiction of the Carpenters, Cement Masons, Operating Engineers, or Teamsters, unless the Contractor is signed to an appropriate current labor agreement with the appropriate craft.

Charles Meekins credibly testified that if he had known of that provision he would not have signed the short-form agreement.

After signing the agreement, the Company abided by some of the terms of the contract and disregarded others.

The first complaint that the Company received from the District Council concerning an alleged failure to abide by the terms of the contract was in a letter dated June 4, 1984, from Alexander Civitan, an attorney for the District Council. Though Civitan was the attorney for the Laborers (District Council) and the Company was bound by an agreement with the Laborers, the letter referred to article V, paragraph C of the Master Labor Agreement and asserted that the Company had violated that clause by performing work within the jurisdiction of the Operating Engineers when the Company was not signatory to an agreement with the Operating Engineers.

By letter dated June 26, 1984, Wilson Clark, an attorney for the Company, responded to the District Council's claim that the Company had violated the Master Labor Agreement. The letter stated:

> . . . we hereby repudiate the pre-hire provisions contained in Article V, paragraph C of the Southern California Master Labor Agreement, pursuant to 29 U.S.C. 158(f) and established NLRB and Supreme Court authority.

On December 20, 1984, Clark, on behalf of the Company, once again wrote to the District Council. In that letter, the Company stated that it "repudiated ab initio" the Master Labor Agreement and the short-form agreement, and that the Company had ceased making contributions to the various construction laborers trusts for Southern California.

The General Counsel concedes, and I find, that at the time the Company bound itself to the short-form agreement and the Master Labor Agreement, a majority of the Company's employees had not designated the District Council as their exclusive bargaining representative.

The Company does not obtain its employees through union hiring halls. Though there is some employee turnover, the employee complement is basically a stable one. Employees are assigned from job to job. They are not hired for a particular job and then terminated at the completion of that job.

B. The Enforceability of Construction Industry Contracts

1. The underlying law

As a general rule, it is unlawful for an employer to enter into a collective-bargaining contract with the union when the union does not represent a majority of that employer's employees.[3] However, a special exception exists for employers in the construction industry. With exceptions not relevant here, Section 8(f) of the Act provides that it is not an unfair labor practice for a construction industry employer to enter a collective-bargaining agreement with a construction industry union even though "the majority status of such labor organization has not been established under the provisions of Section 9 of this Act prior to the making of such agreement." In a nonconstruction industry contract situation, a presumption arises from the mere existence of a lawful contract that the union represents a majority of the employees throughout the life of the contract.[4] However, there is no such presumption arising from the existence of a construction industry contract where the union did not represent a majority of the employees at the time that the contract was executed. In such circumstances, though the contract is not unlawful, it is unenforceable until such time as the union obtains majority status. If such majority status is obtained, the contract becomes enforceable and an employer's renunciation of the contract constitutes a refusal to bargain in violation of Section 8(a)(5) of the Act. No such violation exists unless the union has obtained majority status, even where the employer unilaterally repudiates the agreement during its term.[5] The outstanding Board law in this regard was approved by the United States Supreme Court in NLRB v. Iron Workers Local 103 (Higdon Contracting Co.), 434 U.S. 335 (1978), in which the Court held:

> Section 8(f) is an exception to this rule [that contracting with a minority union violates the Act]. The execution of an agreement with a majority union, an act normally an unfair practice by both employer and union, is legitimated by Section 8(f) when the employer is in the construction industry. The exception is nevertheless of limited scope, for the usual rule protecting the union from inquiry into its majority status during the terms of a collective-bargaining contract does not apply to prehire agreements. A proviso to the section declares that a Section 8(f) contract, which would be invalid absent the section, "shall not be a bar to a petition filed, pursuant to section 9(c) or 9(e)." The employer and its employees—and the union itself for that matter—may call for a bargaining representative election at any time.
> The proviso exposing unions with prehire agreements to inquiry into their majority standing by elections under Section 9(c) led the Board to its decision in R. J. Smith: An employer does not commit an unfair practice under Section 8(a)(5) when he refuses to honor the contract and bargain with the union and the union fails to establish in the unfair labor practice proceeding that it has ever had majority support. As viewed by the Board, a "prehire agreement is merely a preliminary step that contemplates further action for the development of a full bargaining relationship." Ruttmann Construction Co., 191 NLRB 701, 702 (1971). The employer's duty to bargain and honor the contract is contingent on the union's attaining majority support at the various construction sites. In NLRB v. Irvin, 475 F.2d 1265 (C.A. 3, 1973), for example, the prehire contract was deemed binding on those projects at which the union had secured a majority but not with respect to those projects not yet begun before the union had terminated the contract.

The requirement that the General Counsel establish the Union's majority status on a jobsite-to-jobsite basis is appropriate where an employer hires different crews for each jobsite. That is not the situation in the instant case. Respondent does not use the Union's hiring hall and does not hire employees for a particular job and then discharge them at the end of the job. Respondent's employees are shifted from one job to the next. Although there is some turnover among Respondent's employees, there is basically a permanent and stable work force.[6] In Precision Striping, 245 NLRB 169 (1979),[7] the Board held that where a union, which was originally recognized under Section 8(f) of the Act, later achieves majority status among employees who make up the permanent, stable work force, the contract becomes fully binding and the union enjoys an irrebuttable presumption of majority status for the duration of the agreement.

In the instant case, Respondent and the District Council signed an 8(f) construction industry contract at a time when the Union did not represent the majority of Respondent's employees. Respondent's employees are hired for indefinite terms rather than on a jobsite-by-jobsite basis. There is a permanent, stable work force within the meaning of Precision Striping, supra. As no presumption of majority status can arise from the existence of the construction industry agreement, the General Counsel has the burden of establishing that the Union achieved majority status during the term of the contract. In the absence of such proof of majority, there can be no finding that Respondent refused to bargin in violation of Section 8(a)(5) of the Act even though the Respondent did renounce the contract.

As is set forth in more detail below, in order to establish the Union's majority status, the General Counsel must prove each of the following: (1) Chris Meekins performs so much operating engineers' work that his community of interest is not aligned with the laborers and he is excluded from the Laborers unit. (If Chris Meekins is included in the laborers unit, then the District Council could not have obtained majority status.) (2) Dale Meekins, Dean Meekins, Larry V. Meekins, Mike Meekins, and Woodrow J. Meekins should be excluded from the laborers unit because they are the sons of fathers who own 25 percent of the corporation and are corporate officers. (If the sons are included in the laborers unit, the District Council could not have obtained majority status.) (3) The District Council obtained majority status among the employees in the bargaining unit as distinguished from the employees who physically worked during the week that majority status was claimed. (4) It was sufficient for the Union to have majority status in 6 weeks out of a total of 56 weeks.

2. The failure to establish that the Union represented a majority of Respondent's employees in the bargaining unit as distinguished from employees who physically worked during particular weeks

At the times relevant herein, four employees in the bargaining unit have authorized locals of the District Council to represent them.[8]

By stipulation of the parties, Joint Exhibit 1(G) was received in evidence. The stipulation identified that exhibit as follows: "Exhibit (G)–Three-page chart showing the names of certain employees employed by Meekins, Inc., for the week of October 29, 1983 [the week in which the short-form agreement was signed] through November 17, 1984 [the Company repudiated the MLA by letter dated December 20, 1984]. Each week of employment for each individual is indicated by an 'X' in the appropriate line and column." The chart lists 18 names. They are Don Bennett Jr., E. Bowe, L. Frias, R. Hinojosa, T. Hinojosa, Chris Meekins, Dale Meekins, Dean Meekins, Gary Meekins, Larry Meekins Jr. (also referred to as Larry V. Meekins), Mike Meekins, Woodrow J. Meekins, M. McIver, Rick Rose, Gerrardo Serrano, Gerald Taja, Jeff Taranto, and Kirby Tonissen. The General Counsel concedes that all of those employees are properly included in the bargaining unit except for Chris, Dale, Dean, Larry V., and Mike and Woodrow J. Meekins. Though there is a serious question concerning the eligibility of those six employees, for the purpose of this section of the decision, I will assume that the General Counsel is correct in contending that all six are properly excluded. That leaves 12 employees in the bargaining unit during various parts of the 56 weeks covered by Joint Exhibit 1(G).

Joint Exhibit 1(G), together with the evidence regarding union affiliation, establishes that in 6 weeks out of the 56 weeks listed on the exhibit, a majority of the employees who worked were affiliated with the District Council. The record shows the following:

There is some ambiguity with respect to what Joint Exhibit 1(G) means. The stipulation refers to an "X" mark for each "week of employment." In introducing the exhibit, the General Counsel referred to it as showing employment times of employees. An examination of the exhibit itself leads to the conclusion that it shows the weeks in which employees actually worked. It does not appear to indicate employees who were in the bargaining unit but for one reason or another did not actually work that week. Employees who were on vacation, on temporary leave, and on sick leave, as well as employees who were laid off but had a reasonable expectation of recall would all be employees in the bargaining unit whether they worked in a particular week or not.[9] They would have to be counted in determining whether the Union had majority status. However, it does not appear that any such employees are included on Joint Exhibit 1(G). Many of the employees listed are shown as not having worked for certain weeks within the 56-week period. One employee, Gary Meekins, apparently worked 54 out of those 56 weeks. The only weeks in which there is no "X" on the chart for him are December 17, 1983, and June 23, 1984. Other employees had more missing weeks, but the exhibit shows that they worked both before and after those weeks. I am unable to infer from anything in the record that Gary Meekins or those other employees were terminated or otherwise lost their status as bargaining unit employees during those weeks that they were not actually on the job. If any inference is warranted, it would be that such employees remained in the bargaining unit. In any event, the General Counsel has the burden of proof in this regard and she has not established that they lost their status as bargaining unit employees.

There are 6 weeks in which the General Counsel claims that the Union has majority status. The first was June 9, 1984. Employees Jeff Taranto and Kirby Tonissen did not work that week or the week before. However, of the preceding 31 weeks, Tonissen worked every week and Taranto worked 28 weeks. Neither worked in the month of June but both resumed work on July 7. Taranto continued to work through the week of August 18 and Tonissen through the week of July 28, 1984. There is no explanation in the record of why Taranto and Tonissen were absent from work for the month of June. However, the General Counsel has not established that they ceased to be employees within the bargaining unit. If either or both of them are counted as employees in the bargaining unit, then the Union would not have majority status during the week of June 9, 1984.

The second week in which majority is claimed is June 23, 1984. That was 1 of the 2 weeks during the 56-week period that Gary Meekins did not work. In the absence of further evidence, the assumption is clearly warranted that Gary Meekins was an employee in the bargaining unit during the entire 56-week period. In addition, that was one of the June 1984 weeks in which Jeff Taranto and Kirby Tonissen did not work. As indicated above, they also should be included in the bargaining unit for those weeks even though they did not work. If any or all of those three employees were included in the bargaining unit, the Union would not have had a majority for that week.

The third week was August 25, 1984. That week employee Rick Rose did not work. He had worked the previous 16 weeks and he worked again the week of September 8, 1984. He did not work from then through the week of November 17, 1984, which was the last week listed on Joint Exhibit 1(G). The 2-week gap in his employment for August 25 and September 1 are not explained in the record. He worked both before and after those weeks and the inference is warranted that he was still an employee in the bargaining unit during that 2 weeks' absence. With the inclusion of Rose in the bargaining unit, the Union did not have a majority during that week. The next week was September 1, 1984. That was the second week that Rick Rose did not work, but for the reasons stated above, the General Counsel has not established that he had been terminated or otherwise removed as an employees in the bargaining unit.

The next week was September 15, 1984. Rick Rose had worked the previous week but did not work any of the following 10 weeks that are listed on Joint Exhibit 1(G). That 2-1/2 month absence is unexplained and there is no indication whether he came back to work after November 17, 1984. A similar situation exists with regard to Jeff Taranto and Kirby Tonissen, who were out for even longer periods. In addition, M. McIver worked on September 22, 1984, and for the 7 following weeks. There is no indication of when McIver was actually hired and became an employee in the bargaining unit. If any of those employees are counted as bargaining unit employees, the Union did not have a majority on September 15.

The last week is November 17, 1984. McIver had worked the 8 weeks preceding November 17, 1984, which was the last day shown on Joint Exhibit 1(G). There is no indication whether McIver was out for just that 1 week or for a longer period. The General Counsel has not established that McIver lost his status as an employee in the bargaining unit during that week.

In short, I find that the General Counsel has not established by a preponderance of the credible evidence that the Union represented a majority of the employees in the bargaining unit at any relevant time. It follows that the Company did not refuse to bargain in violation of Section 8(a)(5) of the Act when it renounced the collective-bargaining agreement.

3. The contention that if a majority was obtained at any time during the life of the contract, the contract became enforceable

Even if we were to assume that the General Counsel was correct in urging that Chris Meekins and the five sons of the corporate shareholders should be excluded from the bargaining unit, and were further to assume that the Union has majority status on 6 out of 56 weeks listed on Joint Exhibit 1(G), the complaint would still have to be dismissed.

The General Counsel's contention that a contract becomes enforceable if the Union obtains majority status at any time during the term of the contract is supported by some Board law. In Hageman Underground Construction, 253 NLRB 60, 62 (1980), the Board said that if a union achieves majority status "at any time" during the term of a contract, the union is entitled to an irrebutable presumption of majority status for the duration of the agreement. However, in Construction Erectors, 265 NLRB 786, 787 (1982), the Board elaborated on its concept of a "permanent and stable" work force, saying:

> At the outset, we believe it is important to emphasize that the determination of whether a work force is "permanent and stable" is more than a mechanical exercise in tabulating the makeup, longevity, and fluctuation of a group of employees. For in making the determination, the Board ultimately is deciding whether the work force is of such a nature that a showing of majority support made at a particular point in time reasonably can be said to have significance at a subsequent time.

That logic applies both to the determination of whether there was a "permanent and stable" work force and to whether the Union obtained majority status in such a work force. Looking at the record as a whole, I am unable to find that the atypical weeks in which the Union may have had majority status could be reasonably said "to have significance at a subsequent time." There is not even a contention that a majority of the employees were union supporters in 50 out of the 56 weeks listed on the exhibit. The typical rather than the atypical situation should be controlling. It follows that the 8(f) construction industry contract remained unenforceable and that the Company did not violate Section 8(a)(5) of the Act by renouncing it.

As indicated above, the General Counsel contends that Chris Meekins, as well as the five sons of owners and officers of the corporation, should be excluded from the bargaining unit. For the sake of argument, I have assumed in section B,2 and 3 above, that such exclusions were justified. In fact, there is substantial question whether any of those persons should be excluded. However, such unit eligibility questions need not be resolved in this case. Even if those issues are decided in a way that is most favorable for the General Counsel, the General Counsel still has not established a violation of Section 8(a)(5) of the Act. In a like vein, there is no need to consider a number of defenses raised by Respondent that do not pertain to the majority status issue. Though those defenses, as well as the unit eligibility issues, may be of considerable academic interest, their resolution is not necessary to the disposition of this case and they therefore will not be considered.

CONCLUSION OF LAW

The General Counsel has not established by a preponderance of the credible evidence that the Company violated the Act as alleged in the complaint.

SECOND SUPPLEMENTAL DECISION AND ORDER

BY MEMBERS JOHANSEN, BABSON, AND CRACRAFT

On February 11, 1987, Administrative Law Judge Clifford H. Anderson issued the attached second supplemental decision. The Applicant filed exceptions and a supporting brief. The General Counsel filed limited cross-exceptions and an answering brief to the Applicant's exceptions.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the decision and the record in light of the exceptions and briefs and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings, and conclusions only to the extent consistent with this Decision and Order.

On August 23, 1984, the National Labor Relations Board issued a Supplemental Decision and Order[2] in this proceeding denying the Applicant's application for an award under the Equal Access to Justice Act (EAJA) on grounds that the Applicant's net worth exceeded $5 million. The Applicant filed a petition for review with the United States Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit, which on April 25, 1986, reversed the Board's finding that the Applicant was disqualified from an EAJA award on the basis of its net worth, and remanded the case for further proceedings on the Applicant's claim.[3] The Board accepted the court's remand and, after considering position statements from the Applicant and the General Counsel, on October 7, 1986, remanded the case to the administrative law judge for a second supplemental decision consistent with the court's remand.

1. In the attached decision, the judge found that the General Counsel was substantially justified in including discriminatee Milton Womack in a backpay specification and pursuing his claim until she moved to withdraw his claim from the proceedings on the second day of the backpay hearing. The judge concluded that the General Counsel possessed conflicting evidence concerning whether Womack was unable to work because of disability during the backpay period and therefore was justified in refusing to resolve the evidence administratively. He therefore recommended that the Applicant's application for fees be denied. Contrary to the judge, we agree with the Applicant that the General Counsel's failure to investigate the disability issue was unreasonable, and resulted in her taking a position that was not substantially justified.

The relevant facts are undisputed. Following a Board and court adjudication[4] that the Applicant, inter alia, unlawfully refused to recall Womack in April 1980, the parties could not agree on a backpay figure and a backpay specification issued September 23, 1983, covering the period from January 28, 1981 to September 30, 1982. Womack worked for the Applicant as a truckdriver until March 1979, when he was injured. He was physically unable to work until January 1981.

In 1983 Womack informed the General Counsel that in January 1981 his physician, Dr. Freedle, signed a release stating Womack was fit to work, after which Womack sought truckdriving jobs but found none. According to Womack, the release Freedle signed was destroyed in a garage fire. Womack later returned to Dr. Freedle's office and obtained another written release, dated June 28, 1983, which stated Womack was fit to work beginning January 28, 1981.[5] Womack gave this release to the General Counsel. By September 2, 1983, however, the Applicant had informed the General Counsel that Womack had been disabled during the entire backpay period, and on September 15, 1983, the Applicant provided a letter renewing this argument and enclosing a February 25, 1982 report from Dr. Freedle to the Applicant's insurance company stating Womack had been unable to work at any time since the 1979 accident and was completely disabled.[6] The Applicant further asserted that Womack had been receiving disability payments from its insurer during the backpay period.

The General Counsel concedes that if Womack was unable to work, he is not entitled to any backpay. Nonetheless, the General Counsel made no effort to contact Dr. Freedle in order to resolve the conflicting evidence in her possession. The September 23, 1983 backpay specification named Womack as a claimant entitled to $43,186.79, ex-luding interest; and the General Counsel contin-ed to press Womack's claim until January 31, 984, when at the hearing she withdrew his name rom the specification without giving a reason.

[5] Although the release bore Dr. Freedle's name on his office letterhead, the judge found that it was apparently signed by someone else because the initials "ss" had been parenthetically inserted under his signature.

The judge regarded the conflicting reports from Dr. Freedle as disputed evidence concerning vhether Womack was disabled. The judge held the lisability issue was an affirmative defense and herefore the General Counsel was under no obli-ation to investigate the disability issue further.

Although the evidence in the General Counsel's ossession was indeed "conflicting," it did not re-uire a credibility determination by a judge be-ause the inconsistent medical reports came from he same physician—Dr. Freedle. The judge found, nd we agree, that the conflict could have been re-olved if the General Counsel had contacted the loctor and ascertained, if possible, whether Womack was disabled during the backpay period. After the General Counsel learned that Dr. Freedle ad issued reports directly at variance with one an-ther and critical to the resolution of Womack's ackpay issue, she was not substantially justified in efusing to make a simple inquiry to the one wit-ess whose account could have resolved the con-flict. We conclude that the General Counsel must at least assess the information she obtains during the investigation and address patent inconsistencies susceptible to conclusive resolution. In the context presented here, this obligation would have been minimal. Consequently, we find no merit in the General Counsel's position that she was justified in prosecuting the backpay issue because the Appli-cant has the burden of adducing evidence to dis-prove backpay liability.[7]

The judge, in the event the Board disagreed with the finding that the General Counsel was substan-tially justified in the Womack matter, made condi-tional findings concerning the fees and expenses to which the Applicant is entitled. We agree with the judge's denial of the Applicant's expenses incurred before September 23, 1983, when the backpay spec-ification issued, and denial of compensation for the Applicant's costs incurred in an unsuccessful U.S. district court suit in October 1983 to compel pre-hearing discovery. We also agree with the judge that the attorney's fees shall be limited to $75 an hour. The Applicant's original Application sought $8845 in fees and $538.59 in expenses; it subse-quently amended the Application for an additional $1682.85 in fees and expenses. The judge noted, and we agree, that liquidation of the award would not require a remand because the General Counsel did not challenge the Applicant's fees and expenses but for the $75 ceiling on attorney fees, the discov-ery lawsuit, and expenses incurred before the back-pay specification issued.[8]

We have taken the total claimed fees and ex-penses and reduced them in accord with the above limitations. Where it is unclear whether the Appli-cant incurred costs relating to Womack's backpay specification or the discovery suit, we have drawn reasonable inferences based on the Applicant's entry descriptions and the time period in which the fee or expenditure occurred. We will award attor-neys fees of $3086.25, based on the $75-per-hour rate, and expenses of $1456.47, for a total of $4542.72. In addition, the Applicant requests its costs involved in appealing the judge's decision. We award those expenses as well on the submission of an adequately documented request.[9]

ORDER

The National Labor Relations Board orders that the Applicant, American Pacific Concrete Pipe Company, Inc., Los Angeles, California, be award-ed the sum of $4542.72, pursuant to its application for an award under the Equal Access to Justice Act, plus additional fees and expenses incurred in connection with its appeal of the judge's decision.

SECOND SUPPLEMENTAL DECISION

Equal Access to Justice Act

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

CLIFFORD H. ANDERSON, Administrative Law Judge. This second supplmental decision follows an Order of the United States Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit remanding the instant matter for further proceedings to determine the Applicant's entitlement to an award of attorneys' fees under the Equal Access to Justice Act, 5 U.S.C. § 504 (1982), as amended by Pub. L. 99-80, 99 Stat. 183 (1985) (EAJA). More particularly the case arose as follows.

On 23 July 1982, the Board issued a Decision and Order[1] finding American Pacific Concrete Pipe Company, Inc. (the Applicant) had committed certain unfair labor practices among which were the discharges of certain individuals including Milton L. Womack. The Applicant was ordered to make these individuals whole. The United States Circuit Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit enforced that decision on 28 April 1983.[2] Thereafter the parties were unable to reach agreement regarding the backpay due certain individuals including Womack. As a consequence, on 23 September 1983, the Regional Director for Region 31 issued a backpay specification and notice of hearing alleging Womack and others were entitled to backpay for certain periods. The backpay period alleged for Womack spanned the period 28 January 1981 to 30 September 1982. The amount sought, excluding interest, was $43,186.79. On 31 January 1984, during the hearing on the backpay specification, counsel for the General Counsel moved to delete from the backpay specification all reference to Womack thus abandoning all claims made on his behalf. This motion was approved by me without opposition on that date.[3]

On 1 March 1984 the Applicant filed with the Board an application for an award of fees and other expenses pursuant to the EAJA with respect to the Womack litigation. The Board on 9 March 1984 issued an Order referring the application to me for appropriate action. On 29 March 1984 the General Counsel filed a motion to dismiss the application and, on 2 April 1984, the Applicant filed an amendment to its application alleging additional expenses. On 27 April 1984, I issued a supplemental decision dismissing the Applicant's application based on a determination that under the Board's Rules and Regulations the Applicant was not eligible for an award. On 23 August 1984 the Board affirmed this finding and denied the Applicant's application.[4] On review of the Board's Supplemental Decision and Order, the United States Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit reversed the Board's finding and remanded the matter to the Board on 25 April 1986.[5]

Thereafter the Board solicited statements of position from the parties. The Applicant submitted a statement of position dated 27 August 1986 and the General Counsel submitted a statement of position on 3 September 1986. On 16 September 1986 the Applicant submitted a response to the General Counsel's statement of position. On 7 October 1986 the Board by supplemental order remanding proceedings to the administrative law judge remanded the matter to me for further proceedings as necessary to determine the Applicant's entitlement for an award for attorneys' fees and expenses under the EAJA in light of the court's decision.

On 20 October 1986 I issued an order denying the General Counsel's 29 March 1984 motion to dismiss and setting the time for filing of the General Counsel's answer to the application and for the receipt of any response by the Applicant. On 24 November 1986, the General Counsel filed its answer to the application for award under EAJA and memorandum in support and, on 9 December 1986, the Applicant filed a response.

Based on all the above and the record of the backpay hearing, I make the following

FINDINGS AND CONCLUSIONS

I. ISSUES NOT NOW IN DISPUTE

As a result of the pleadings, the court of appeal's decision in this matter and the parties' statements to the Board, the following findings and conclusions are not disputed and are found to be true.

A. The Applicant Meets the Board's Standard for Eligibility to Apply for an EAJA Award

The United States Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit decided, supra, that the Applicant met the net worth requirements of the EAJA and is an eligible applicant. Therefore, I find that the applicant is eligible pursuant to Section 102.143(c)(5) of the Board's Rules and Regulations[6] to seek such an award.

[6] Sec. 102.143(c)(5) defines applicants eligible to receive awards as "any other partnership, corporation, association, public or private organizaiton with a net worth of not more than $5,000,000 and not more than 500 employees." This $5 million limit was raised in the 1985 amendments to the EAJA (Pub. L. 99-80, 99 Stat. 183 (1985)), to $7 million. The court's decision in this matter, however, determined that the original amount was appropriate for testing eligibility in the instant case.

B. A Backpay Proceeding Is an Adversary Adjudication Within the Meaning of the EAJA

The EAJA provides for fees incurred during an adversary adjudication. The Board's Rules and Regulations, Section 102.143(a) defines the term "adversary adjudication" as including backpay proceedings. Accordingly, the applicant is eligible to seek appropriate fees and expenses incurred during the litigation of the backpay proceeding.

C. The Applicant's Application Was Timely Filed

Although there was some initial dispute concerning the dates on which certain events occurred, it is clear and I find: (1) that the General Counsel withdrew the Womack allegation from the backpay specification on 31 January 1984, and (2) the Applicant filed the instant application with the Board on 1 March 1984. The Board's standard for filing an application is set forth in Section 102.148 of the Board's Rules and Regulations and requires a filing within 30 days of the operative event ending the proceeding. The General Counsel does not dispute, and I find, that Respondent's application was timely filed.

D. The Applicant Was a Prevailing Party in Connection with a Discrete Portion of the Backpay Proceeding

As a result of the General Counsel's motion to withdraw the Womack allegation from the backpay specification and my approval of that motion, there was no formal finding that the General Counsel's claims as to Womack were without merit. There can be no doubt, however, that, on the withdrawal of the allegation, the Applicant was in the identical situation as if it had prevailed on this issue after full litigation. Where a government agency withdraws or changes its position after initiating an action, it is clear the applicant must be viewed as if it had prevailed in the litigation. The Board so holds. Shrewsbury Motors, 281 NLRB 486 (1986). There is no dispute that the Womack allegations constitute a discrete portion of the backpay proceeding as required in the Board's Rules and Regulations Section 102.143(b). Accordingly, and without dispute by the General Counsel, I find that the Applicant was a prevailing party with respect to the Womack allegations.

II. DISPUTED ISSUES

The issues in dispute at this stage of the proceeding may be divided into three categories. First, the General Counsel makes various threshold attacks on the sufficiency of the application and its supporting documentation, which were opposed by the Applicant. Second, the parties strongly differ over the question of whether the General Counsel was "substantially justified" in including Womack in the backpay specification. Finally, assuming the substantial justification issue is decided in favor of the Applicant, the parties dispute what portions of the Applicant's claim should be included in an award. It is appropriate to consider these issues separately.

A. The General Counsel's Threshold Arguments

1. The deferral issue

The General Counsel argues that resolution of the instant matter should be deferred until the remaining portions of the backpay specification now before the Board are covered by a "final Order of the Board." A similar motion from the General Counsel was denied with Board approval in the initial decision in this matter.[7] The General Counsel made a similar motion to the Board in its statement of position on remand after which the Board remanded the matter for further proceedings without comment. Under all the circumstances, I can see no reason why the circumstances supporting the earlier refusal to defer this case have changed. Accordingly, I deny the General Counsel's motion to defer this case.

2. The General Counsel's allegation that the Applicant failed to properly serve all parties

The Board's Rules and Regulations, Section 102.148(a) states in part:

> The application shall be served on the Regional Director and all parties to the adversary adjudication in the same manner as other pleadings in that proceeding. . . .

The General Counsel correctly asserts that there is no evidence that the application or the amended application was served by the Applicant on the Charging Party in the original unfair labor practice case or its attorney. The Applicant made the following statement in its response to the General Counsel's statement of position to the Board:

> The Charging Party "Union and its attorney" may have been parties to the charge (backpay specification) but when Mr. Womack dismissed voluntarily on January 31, 1984 with the placet of the General Counsel, and of the Administrative Law Judge, and the only matter remaining before the ALJ was the application for fees (not directed against the charging Union) your applicant's counsel is at a loss to determine why the Charging Union or its attorney are still "parties" through the "adversary adjudication."

The Applicant renewed its argument that such service was unnecessary in its response to the answer.

It is clear that the General Counsel is correct that the Rules and Regulations require service on all parties to the adversary proceeding. The clarity of the rule binds me irrespective of the Applicant's questioning of the underlying rationale of the rule. It is a separate matter, however, to determine the consequences of the lack of service at this stage of the proceeding after substantial litigation both before the Board and the court. Given the current status of the case, I find that the earlier service omissions are not fatal to the Applicant's claim and, therefore, the General Counsel's motion to dismiss the application based on failure of service is denied.[8]

3. The General Counsel's attack on the Applicant's documentation

The General Counsel attacks the specificity of the Applicant's documentation of its fees and expenses. The Applicant notes the General Counsel's attack is essentially de minimis. I do not find that the Applicant's documentation of fees and expenses is so inadequate as to require either a dismissal of the application or an order under Rule 102.147(h) of the Board's Rules and Regulations for other substantiation.

B. Was the General Counsel "Substantially Justified" in Including Womack in the Backpay Specification and not Withdrawing the Womack Allegation Until Midhearing on 31 January 1984

In order to consider whether the General Counsel was "substantially justified" in including Womack in the backpay specification and in not withdrawing the claim until 31 January 1984, it is necessary to consider: (1) the Board's procedures and substantive law concerning backpay specifications, (2) the actual actions and knowledge of the General Counsel during the backpay litigation in the instant matter, and (3) the decisional law applying the EAJA to Board procedures.

1. Backpay specifications generally

The Board litigates unfair labor practices in a two-step procedure. Generally, allegations of wrongdoing are litigated in an initial or unfair labor practice stage. Thereafter, if a respondent has been found to have committed unfair labor practices and has been ordered to remedy those unfair labor practices by the Board and/or a United States court of appeals and, if a dispute arises over whether compliance with that order has been achieved, the Board utilizes a second-step or compliance stage. Where, in an initial unfair labor practice proceeding, a respondent has been found to have wrongfully discharged an individual and has been ordered to reinstate that individual and to make him or her whole for losses suffered and, if a dispute arises concerning the amount of money necessary to make such an individual whole, the compliance stage is initiated through the use of a backpay specification. A backpay specification normally alleges the period of time an individual was deprived of employment, the gross amount of wages and other benefits that individual would have accrued had his or her employment not been terminated, and admits interim earnings or other events relevant to the individual, which would reduce the amount claimed. There is a substantial body of law dealing with backpay specifications and the burdens of proof assigned to respondent and the General Counsel. Generally, the burden of proof lies with the General Counsel in establishing elements of gross backpay and, equally generally, the burden of proof falls to a respondent to show that there should be deductions from gross backpay.[9]

2. The Womack allegations[10]

The General Counsel's backpay specification alleged Womack as a discriminatee named in the unfair labor practice case and entitled to backpay for the period 28 January 1981 to 30 September 1982. No interim earnings were admitted in the backpay specification and at no time during the backpay period was Womack conceded by the General Counsel to have been out of the job market or unable to work. The Applicant's answer to the backpay specification denied generally all allegations of the backpay specification pertaining to Womack but specifically alleged that Womack's "physical and mental condition" made it impossible for him to work during the backpay period.

In October 1983, before the hearing on the backpay specification was held, the Applicant sought from the Regional Director subpoenas to conduct prehearing depositions of Womack and others to obtain evidence in support of its affirmative defenses. The Regional Director denied the subpoena application and the Applicant sued the Regional Director in United States District Court for the Central District of California (Case 83-6481 (EMT) PX) seeking an order compelling discovery or an order restraining the Board from proceeding with the backpay hearing until discovery could be accomplished. This suit was not successful and, after a postponement, the Board's backpay specification hearing opened on 13 December 1983 without the Applicant having obtained pretrial discovery.

On the opening day of trial on 13 December 1983 testimony was heard from the General Counsel's compliance officer concerning how the backpay specification was prepared. The Applicant moved for and was granted a postponement of the hearing until 31 January 1984 to obtain subpoenaed evidence and prepare its defenses. On the second day of trial, 31 January 1984, the Applicant sought an additional postponement in order to obtain documents relevant to the Womack matter. This postponement was rendered unnecessary when the General Counsel withdrew the Womack allegations in midtrial that day.

Evaluating the substantive merits on the basis of the record before me, I make the following conclusions. The General Counsel's evidence concerning the gross backpay formula regarding Womack and the calculation of his gross backpay was never under substantial attack[11]

[8] I also note that the Charging Party in the unfair labor practice case did not make an appearance through counsel or otherwise in the backpay specification litigation. Thus a question exists whether the Charging Party was in fact a "party" to the backpay specification within the meaning of the rule.

[9] Big Three Industrial Gas, 263 NLRB 1189 (1982).

[10] The Womack allegations were withdrawn without an evidentiary record on the merits or a statement by the parties of the reasons for the withdrawal of the allegations from the backpay litigation. The following recital of the motivations and actions taken in the backpay litigation are based on the statements of the parties contained in the filings in the EAJA portion of the case.

[11] The Applicant in its various statements of position never challenged the gross backpay allegations. Indeed, its general denials in its answer may have been inadequate as a matter of law to put the allegations into contest.

and was sufficient to carry the General Counsel's burden of proof. With respect to the Applicant's affirmative defense of Womack's disability, I find there was never a difference of legal interpretation rather there was one solely of fact. If Womack had been disabled and unable to work, all parties agreed he would take nothing under the specification. The Applicant's position at all relevant times was that Womack was disabled during the entire backpay period. The General Counsel apparently believed until the specification was withdrawn that there was insufficient evidence to accept the Applicant's arguments until the matter had been fully litigated. On 31 January 1984 the General Counsel determined it was appropriate to withdraw the Womack allegations in the face of this defense.

3. The General Counsel's knowledge of the Applicant's disability defense

The substantial justification, if any, of the General Counsel's proceeding in the face of the Applicant's disability defense is the heart of the instant case. It is appropriate to consider what the Government knew and when it knew it.[12]

a. Womack's report to the General Counsel

Initially the General Counsel obtained backpay information from the discriminatees including Womack. This information was obtained on an ongoing basis throughout the unfair labor practice litigation. Womack told the General Counsel he had been employed as a truckdriver by the Applicant until March 1979 when he was injured on the job. Womack reported that his doctor, Dr. Freedle, told him he could not go "back to driving a truck at this time." Womack drew workman's compensation for a year, after that he received a payment from the Applicant's insurance carrier. Womack reported that some 18 months after his injury he began receiving temporary social security payments. Womack recalled being told the payments were temporary and recalled applying for temporary disability. His papers however had been destroyed in a February 1981 garage fire.

Womack told the General Counsel's agents that in January 1981, Dr. Freedle told him to "look for something to do" and that the doctor was considering releasing him. Dr. Freedle did not tell Womack what work to seek and did not tell him he could not return to truckdriving work. Dr. Freedle released Womack to work a week later, signing a slip so indicating. Womack claimed this release was later destroyed in the fire in his garage. He immediately began looking for truckdriving employment and continued his search through 1981 continuing in 1982 with two interruptions of a "couple of months" each. Womack did not find employment.

Womack reported that in June 1983 the Applicant offered him reinstatement and also sought health information. Womack called Dr. Freedle's office and asked for a copy of his 1981 release. He was told it would take a few days. A few days later Womack went to the doctor's office and was given a release dated 28 June 1983 signed by Dr. Freedle that declared Womack able to return to work as of 28 January 1981.[13] This release was given to the General Counsel. Womack further told the General Counsel's agents that after his 1981 release he believed he could return to driving and that Dr. Freedle told him nothing to the contrary.

b. The General Counsel's prebackpay specification exchange of information with the Applicant

It is clear that by 2 September 1983, Counsel for the Applicant Carlos Bea, had informed the Board's Regional compliance agent, James Middleton, of the Applicant's disability defense concerning Womack. Middleton by letter dated that day informed Bea that, if the Applicant supplied "conclusive evidence" that Womack or others were ineligible for backpay, the backpay specification concerning them would be amended.

On 15 September 1983 Bea wrote Middleton arguing that Womack had been unemployable throughout the backpay period and attaching as evidence a report by Dr. Freedle dated 25 February 1982 to the Applicant's insurance carrier.[14] This report indicates Dr. Freedle examined Womack both before and on 28 January and that at all times since his accident Womack had not been physically able to work.

c. Postbackpay specification developments

The Regional Director issued the backpay specification on 23 September 1983 including the Womack allegations. There is no evidence that the General Counsel's agents received additional information on the Womack claim until the opening day of trial on 13 December 1983. On that date, in support of the Applicant's motion for a postponement of the trial of Womack's claims, counsel for the Applicant asserted that, pursuant to subpoena, the Applicant had received records that indicated that Womack, in addition to receiving disability payments from the Applicant's insurance carrier, had filed disability claims with four other insurance carriers. Further counsel for the Applicant represented that the records indicated that Womack had applied to social security for some type of disability and had obtained a doctor's certificate in support thereof.

No evidence was taken on the Womack disability defense that day and the trial was adjourned until 31 January 1984. There is no evidence that the General Counsel sought or obtained additional information on the issue or changed its position until the second day of trial.

On 31 January 1984 at the opening of the hearing the Applicant sought a further postponement in order to obtain Womack's social security file, which counsel for [12] While there was initial dispute regarding certain facts, the General Counsel's answer and the Applicant's response are not at essential difference concerning the relevant facts. While the Applicant points out the General Counsel did not obtain Womacks' affidavit which it submitted with its answer until the instant Application had been filed, the Applicant did not otherwise contest the factual assertions contained therein.

[13] The release was on a medical office letterhead and was apparently signed by another on behalf of Dr. Freedle as the parenthetical initials "(ss)" appeared under the signature.

[14] This report, like the release described supra, was on medical letterhead and bore the same handwritten signature followed by the same parenthetical "(ss)."

the Applicant indicated he believed would show that Womack had sought and obtained social security disability benefits whose benefits would have been predicated on a finding that Womack was unable to work at any gainful employment. Evidence was taken only on portions of the backpay specification independent of Womack and, following an afternoon recess, the General Counsel withdrew all claims regarding to Womack.

4. The contention of the parties

The General Counsel's position on its substantial justification for including Womack in the backpay specification is stated in its memorandum in support of answer to application for award of attorneys' fees and expenses. The General Counsel initially asserts:

> In backpay proceedings it is well settled that the General Counsel has the burden of proving gross backpay and that the Respondent has the burden of establishing facts which would negate the existence of backpay liability or which would mitigate that liability. M Restaurants, Inc. d/b/a The Mandarin, 238 NLRB 1575 (1978); Big 3 Industrial Gas & Equipment Co., 263 NLRB 1189 (1982).
> In the instant matter Mr. Womack's eligibility to receive backpay, based upon his fitness to function as a truckdriver, was at issue. Respondent contended that Mr. Womack was totally disabled and therefore ineligible for backpay. Respondent, through Counsel, submitted a medical report from a Dr. Ernest M. Freedle which proported to establish Mr. Womack's total disability [footnote omitted].
> However, conflicting evidence was submitted that Mr. Womack had been released by his physican to work, and that Mr. Womack had looked for interim employment [citations to evidence omitted].
> Where, as here, there is a genuine issue as to which evidence should be credited, the matter is customarily placed, and herein the General Counsel was substantially justified in initially placing, that issue before the Administrative Law Judge, rather than resolving that issue administratively. For the General Counsel to have done otherwise would have undercut the division of functions between the General Counsel and the Board and would be inconsistent with the fair and just administration of the National Labor Relations Act.
> While Respondent may contend that the evidence submitted in regard to Mr. Womack was conclusive, it was in fact one doctor's opinion as to Womack's condition. Therefore, it was not unreasonable for General Counsel to name Womack in the Backpay Specification even considering Respondent's submission and particularly as General Counsel had contrary evidence. While there can be disagreement as weight given the respective submissions, it is just such disagreement which makes appropriate consideration of the evidence by a trier of fact in this case the administrative law judge.
> An evaluation of evidence submitted, in this circumstance, is an ongoing process. The fact that at some point, based on such a reevaluation, the General Counsel may alter positions previous taken, does not mean that the position taken was unreasonable. Herein, as there was conflicting evidence, it was not unreasonable for the General Counsel to proceed cautiously as there was a good deal at stake, i.e., the Agency's statutory responsibility to the public in remedying the judged unfair labor practices in Mr. Womack's entitlement to backpay. Further, as the burden of proof regarding litigation of backpay liability is upon Respondent, it was not unreasonable for General Counsel to evaluate its position based upon that premise and to make the initial decision to include Mr. Womack in the backpay proceedings.
> While General Counsel did move on January 31, 1984 to withdraw Mr. Womack from the backpay proceedings, underlying this application, General Counsel was substantially justified in naming Mr. Womack and proceeding on that aspect of the case until that time.

The Applicant's reply to the General Counsel's answer contains the Applicant's most refined position regarding the substantial justification issue. Relying on the factual background described, supra, the Applicant asserts that it early provided evidence of Womack's disability in the form of Dr. Freedle's report but that the General Counsel took several unjustifiable positions respecting the evidence. First, the General Counsel refused to make any investigation to determine which of Dr. Freedle's seemingly contradictory documents was correct. Second, the General Counsel declined to allow prehearing depositions by the Applicant that would have allowed the Applicant to depose Dr. Freedle. Third, the General Counsel opposed the Applicant's action in U.S. district court that would have allowed pretrial depositions of Dr. Freedle and others relevant to the Womack claim.

In summary, the Applicant asserts:

> This is not the case of a General Counsel "surprised" at the hearing with a report which shows physical disability by the alleged discriminatee in the period of the claimed backpay specification. This is a case of conscious, determined refusal to investigate proffered evidence, resulting in a "we'll see you in court" attitude which the Courts have denounced as "bad faith."

5. Analysis and conclusions regarding substantial justification

The Applicant's argument in the instant case is implicitly twofold. First is the argument that the General Counsel, on the basis of the evidence before it, was not substantially justified in pursuing the Womack allegations. Second is the argument that, had the General Counsel only investigated the Applicant's defense or acquiesced in the Applicant's attempts to investigate through prehearing depositions, the necessary evidence would have been uncovered, which would have conclusively demonstrated that the Womack claim was without merit. Because the General Counsel wrongfully failed to do either, argues the Applicant, it must be held to have known what would have been uncovered. Those facts fully support a finding that the General Counsel was not substantially justified in pursuing the Womack allegations. Finally, the Applicant argues that the General Counsel's hindrance of the Applicant's attempts to obtain pretrial discovery also justifies a finding of no substantial justification.

Each argument raises separate issues that are best addressed separately.

a. Was the General Counsel substantially justified in issuing and maintaining the Womack allegations based on the information actually before it?

(1) The decisional law with respect to substantial justification in disputed fact situations

The Board had recently reiterated its view of the General Counsel's substantial justification for maintaining actions based on conflicting evidence, which is ultimately resolved against the General Counsel. In National Fire Protection, 281 NLRB 624 (1986), the Board found it proper for the General Counsel to maintain an action where credibility conflicts could not be resolved administratively through documentary evidence because Board practice requires that such credibility issues be resolved at a hearing before an administrative law judge.

(2) Findings regarding the General Counsel's substantial justification given the evidence before it

Because the evidence known to the General Counsel varied over time, three separate dates must be considered in evaluating the General Counsel's substantial justification.

(a) The General Counsel's substantial justification for issuing the backpay specification on 23 September 1983

On 23 September 1983 the General Counsel had received Dr. Freedle's report[15] which, if credited, clearly indicated Womack was totally disabled at least through the date of the report, 25 February 1982. It also had Womack's assertions that Dr. Freedle had certified his ability to return to work in January 1981 and Womack's statements that he had in fact sought such employment. Womack's assertions were importantly corroborated by Dr. Freedle's signed certification dated 23 June 1983 which asserted on its face that Womack had been eligible to return to work as of 28 January 1981.

Faced with this conflicting documentary evidence the General Counsel issued a backpay specification asserting Womack was eligible for backpay as of 28 January 1981. Given the Board's holding in National Fire Protection, supra, it cannot be found that the General Counsel was not substantially justified in placing the disputed evidence, i.e., the conflicting documents attributed to Dr. Freedle and Womack's assertions, before an administrative law judge for resolution. Accordingly, I find that as of 23 September 1983 the General Counsel was substantially justified in issuing the backpay specification with the Womack allegations.

(b) The General Counsel's substantial justification on and after 13 December 1983

On 13 December 1983, in open court, counsel for the Applicant asserted it had obtained documentary evidence showing that Womack had made multiple claims for disability. Does this additional information make the General Counsel's continuing prosecution of the Womack claim no longer substantially justified?

Considering the evidence Womack had supplied earlier to the General Counsel, see discussion, supra, that his disability claims were temporary, I do not believe the 13 December assertions of counsel for Applicant rendered the General Counsel's claim unjustifiable given the continuing factual conflicts. Nor do I believe counsel for Applicant considered this evidence conclusive. Immediately after making these assertions at the opening of the trial, Counsel for Applicant pressed his motion for a postponement to allow additional time to subpoena additional evidence. Counsel Bea stated:

> I want to go get the records of those insurance companies to show—to see what declarations [Womack] made to them regarding his physical condition and whether he was able to work as a truckdriver or not. I'm not in a position to do that here at the present time without applying for depositions . . . . But, that is, on Womack's case, I simply am not ready to proceed with him and I need a continuance to take some depositions of those custodians to find out what he said to them about his physical condition. [Tr. 15]

For the same reason that counsel for the Applicant felt he needed time to obtain more evidence, i.e, that the matter was not conclusively resolved by the evidence on hand,[16] I find the General Counsel, too, was entitled to maintain its position unless and until documentary evidence could be obtained that would show that Womack's representations and Dr. Freedle's release were incorrect.[17]

Accordingly, I find that the General Counsel was substantially justified in maintaining the Womack allegations through the conclusion of the day's hearing on 13 December 1983.

[15] This report would have been mailed on Thursday, 15 September 1983 and received on or about Monday, 19 September 1983. Before its receipt the General Counsel had no documentary evidence tending to support the Applicant's defense. Thus, the General Counsel was clearly justified in maintaining its position regarding Womack at least until receipt of the report. However, because I find elsewhere in this decision that prebackpay specification fees and expenses are not recoverable, it is not necessary to consider the General Counsel's justification or lack thereof at any time prior to the issuance of the backpay specification on 23 September 1983.

[16] Mr. Middleton's testimony on 13 December 1983 makes it clear the Applicant had by that time been provided a copy of the Dr. Freedle's 28 June 1983 release.

[17] The apparent belief of counsel for the Applicant that his evidence was not conclusive on the issue is not independently relevant to the issue of the General Counsel's substantial justification. The statements of counsel for the Applicant regarding the inconclusiveness of the evidence on hand made in the presence of counsel for the General Counsel is a factor to be considered in deciding the issue.

(c) The General Counsel's substantial justification from 13 December 1983 through withdrawal of the allegation on 31 January 1984

The only new information obtained by the General Counsel after the close of the hearing on 13 December, at least as is evident on this record, was the assertion by counsel for the Applicant on the opening of the second day of hearings on 31 January 1986 that additional time was necessary to obtain Womack's social security file, which counsel for the Applicant hoped would contain claims of permanent disability by Womack.[18]

Given Womack's assertion to the General Counsel that his only claims with social security were for temporary disability, I do not find this information modifies my earlier analysis, nor do I find the General Counsel's change of position on the afternoon of 31 January 1984 when she withdrew the Womack claims undermines these findings. As the General Counsel argues on brief, subsequent reevaluation of an earlier position does not render the earlier position unjustified. Accordingly, I find the General Counsel's maintenance of the Womack assertion substantially justified until its withdrawal.

(b) Was the General Counsel substantially justified in proceeding to trial without further investigation of the Applicant's defense?

I have found that the conflicting reports of Dr. Freedle—each apparently in the same handwriting—justified the General Counsel taking the Womack allegation to a hearing. I also accept the Applicant's assertion that, if the General Counsel had contacted Dr. Freedle, the conflict could have been resolved. So, too, I find that if the General Counsel had obtained Womack's complete social security file, the evidentiary conflict would have been resolved.

May the General Counsel rely with impunity on conflicting evidence as justification for maintaining an adversary action when a simple investigation would have resolved the conflicting evidence in favor of the Applicant? Without asserting the proposition more broadly, I believe that where the disputed evidence concerns an affirmative defense in a backpay proceeding in which the burden of proof is on the Applicant, the General Counsel is under no obligation to investigate further. I also believe there is clear Board precedent for such a finding.

A backpay proceeding does not involve findings of wrongdoing. Rather, it liquidates or renders specific an order previously issued and determines compliance with that order. Generally, respondents are obligated as part of the original order to participate in the investigative portion of the compliance stage.[19]

As noted, supra, the burden of proof regarding mitigation of backpay, including issues of disability, is explicitly on respondents. Paragraph 10737.2 of the National Labor Relations Board's Casehandling Manual, Part Three, Compliance Proceedings, makes it clear that with respect to these matters, while the General Counsel may make evidence available to Respondent and admit adverse facts, > it is not the General Counsel's policy to assume respondent's burden of proof and attempt to establish that there are no facts in mitigation . . . .

The Board has explicitly recognized and approved this practice in an EAJA case, Phil Smidt & Son, 276 NLRB 1157 (1985). In that case the Board found the General Counsel substantially justified in issuing and litigating a backpay specification in which the General Counsel did not prevail on the issue of interim earnings—which like disability is an area where respondent bears the burden of proof. The Board approved the following language of the administrative law judge, 276 NLRB at 1158:

> That does not mean that Applicant is entitled to some portion of his fees and expenses [under the Equal Access to Justice Act]. The finding of an unfair labor practice is "presumptive proof that some backpay is owed." Mastro Plastics Corp., 354 F.2d 170, 178 (2d Cir. 1965), cert. denied 384 US 972 (1966). The General Counsel bears the burden of proving the applicable backpay period and an appropriate formula for computing backpay. It is the Respondent which bears the burden to prove interim earnings. NLRB v. Brown & Root, 311 F.2d 447, 454 (8th Cir. 1963); DeLorean Cadillac, 231 NLRB 329 (1977), enfd. in relevant part 614 F.2d 554 (6th Cir. 1980); NLRB v. Izzi, 395 F.2d 241, 244 (1st Cir. 1968); NLRB v. McCann Steel Co., 570 F.2d 652, 655 (6th Cir. 1978); NLRB v. Mercy Peninsula Ambulance Service, 589 F.2d 1014, 1017 (9th Cir. 1979).
> Thus, Applicant's principle contention that [the backpay claimant's] interim earnings were not analyzed with the care and scrutiny that the Applicant applied has no merit. It may have been incumbent upon the General Counsel in a backpay proceeding to go forward with testimony from [backpay claimant] as to her interim earnings, but the ultimate burden of proof on this subject must be on Applicant. NLRB v. Izzi, supra. Applicant was not taken advantage of by the institution of the compliance proceeding. Rather, it caused the proceeding to be instituted by its unlawful discharge of [the backpay claimant]. The General Counsel, having determined

[18] The Applicant introduced into evidence on 31 January in support of its motion for further continuance an affidavit of Cocounsel Richardson which contained, inter alia, the following assertion:

> Documents and record (above described) which AMPAC has subpoenaed but which will not be available at the hearing on January 31, 1984, are necessary for the proper presentation of AMPAC's case. AMPAC cannot meet its burden concerning . . . the ability of alleged discriminatee Womack to work nor effectively cross-examine these alleged discriminatees concerning these matters in the absence of these records.

[19] The Board's original Order in the instant case, with court approval, directed the Applicant to:

> Preserve and, on request, make available to the Board or its agent, for examining and copying, all payroll records, social security payment records, timecards, personnel records, and reports, and all other records necessary to analyze the amount of backpay due under the terms of this Order [262 NLRB 1223, 1238 (1982)].

> that [backpay claimant] was not in Applicant's employ for five quarters, was justified in issuing the backpay specification.

Given all the above, I am satified that in the particular and quite narrow situation presented here, the General Counsel did not act improperly in considering both the evidence submitted by the backpay claimant and the Applicant but not further investigating the disability issue. In these circumstances the General Counsel could properly place the matter before an administrative law judge.

c. Are the refusal of the Regional Director to allow pretrial depositions and/or the General Counsel's opposition to the Applicant's U.S. district court action seeking to compel discovery relevant to the instant case?

I agree with the Applicant's assertion that, had the Regional Director allowed prehearing discovery or had the General Counsel not opposed the Applicant's attempt to compel such discovery in U.S. district court, the Womack allegations would most probably have been resolved in the Applicant's favor before the commencement of trial. I further find these facts irrelevant to the instant proceeding and find that they do not support the Applicant's claim that the General Counsel was not substantially justified regarding the Womack allegations.

I make this finding because no substantial contention is made, nor does the evidence show, any error by the Regional Director or the U.S. district court in refusing to allow pretrial depositions. The National Labor Relations Act and the Board's Rules and Regulations place the issuance of orders requiring pretrial depositions within the discretion of the Regional Director. See, e.g., Board's Rules and Regulations, Section 102.30. Insofar as the record reflects, the sole basis offered by the Applicant for seeking pretrial rather than trial discovery was speed and asserted convenience. These are not grounds sufficient to require depositions as a matter of right.[20]

To penalize the General Counsel—even in an EAJA proceeding—for the failure to allow prehearing depositions, would however indirectly, undermine the current policy of the Agency, buttressed by its Rules and Regulations and case law, of placing such orders entirely within the discretion of the Regional Director. Absent Board direction in such an important area—and the Applicant cites no authority—I will not make such a holding. If limiting such discretion is appropriate it should be done directly not indirectly after the fact in an EAJA action.

Accordingly, I find the denial of pretrial depositions irrelevant to the issue of substantial justification. For the same reason, if the original action of the Regional Director was not inappropriate, it was not inappropriate for the General Counsel to oppose the Federal district court suit attacking the Regional director's exercise of discretion.[21]

[20] All requests for depositions and related postponements made to the trial judge by the Applicant were granted.

[21] The issue of the compensability of time spent in the U.S. district court proceeding is discussed, infra.

d. Summary and conclusions on substantial justification

I have found that, at all relevant times, there was sufficient conflicting evidence on the issue of Womack's disability to substantially justify the General Counsel's maintenance of its allegations regarding Womack. I have further found no obligation on the General Counsel to make further investigation to resolve the conflicting evidence before it regarding Womack's disability. Finally, I have found the Regional Director's denial of pretrial depositions and the General Counsel's opposition to the Applicant's U.S. Federal court lawsuit irrelevant to the issue of the General Counsel's substantial justification in maintaining the Womack action.

C. Conditional Findings on Arguments Concerning the Amount of the Award

Having determined the General Counsel was substantially justified in issuing and maintaining the backpay specification allegation regarding Womack at all relevant times, it is unnecessary to resolve further arguments with respect to the Applicant's claim. Resolution of this matter, however, has been substantially delayed and, in my view, it is incumbent on me to avoid if at all possible a new remand with all the associated delays if reviewing authority should differ about my determination concerning the issue of substantial justification. Accordingly, in the unusual situation where this decision issues on a remand from the court of appeals, I believe it is appropriate to deal with other arguments made by the parties, even if only in a conditional sense, in order to maximize the likelihood of resolving this case without a second remand should reviewing authority differ from my findings above. Accordingly, I make the following conditional findings on the assumption that reviewing authority has found that the General Counsel was not substantially justified in the Womack matter and that an award should issue.

1. The compensability of fees or expenses incurred before issuance of the backpay specification

The backpay specification underlying the instant matter issued on 23 September 1983. I have found that the General Counsel did not have evidence, beyond the Applicant's bare assertion, that Womack had a disability sufficient to deny him all recovery during the backpay period until the receipt of the Applicant's 15 September 1983 letter and attached doctor's report. It may be fairly argued that even if that report was sufficient evidence to charge the General Counsel with the duty to omit Womack from the backpay specification, the General Counsel's duty to act would not have occurred instantly upon the receipt of the letter dated 15 September and that it would be reasonable to assume that the General Counsel, under any interpretation of the facts, would not be charged with having acted without justification until after 23 September 1983, a time sufficient to have received and considered the submitted evidence. Setting aside these questions of fact however and working on the assumption that reviewing authority may entirely reject this factual analysis, the General Counsel makes an independent argument that as a matter of law no applicant is entitled to fees and expenses incurred prior to the issuance of the formal documents initiating the adversary procedure, in this case the backpay specification.

The Board's Rules and Regulations Section 102.144 states in part:

> An eligible applicant may receive an award for fees and expenses incurred in connection with an adversary adjudication . . . .

The General Counsel argues that the cited "in connection with" limitation is grounded in the principle that the EAJA is designed to recompense litigants for defending against discretionary actions by the Government which are not substantially justified. Since both the investigation of an unfair labor practice charge and the compliance investigation following a Board order or Court decree are not discretionary actions by the Agency but are rather required under the Act, the General Counsel argues that the Equal Access to Justice Act does not apply to those nondiscretionary procedures. The General Counsel further notes that the Board's original Order, quoted supra, required Respondent, the Applicant here, to preserve records and cooperate in the compliance investigation necessary to liquidate backpay. Therefore, argues the General Counsel, the Applicant should not be compensated for the investigative or prebackpay specification stage of the procedures under any circumstances.

The Applicant asserts that even before the issuance of the United States Court of Appeals order enforcing the Board's Order, it was clear to the Applicant that the Government was proceeding with the backpay specification and, as a consequence, the Applicant's efforts during the prebackpay specification period were part of its defense of the allegations and thus should be fully compensated.

No party cited Board authority on the question. The Board in Phil Smidt & Son, 276 NLRB 1157 (1985), approved the decision of an administrative law judge, including the following footnote (Id. fn. 4 at 1158):

> However, it appears firmly established that, until issuance of a complaint in an unfair labor practice proceeding, no previous incurred expenses may be awarded in the EAJA application. Carthage & Sheet Metal Heating Co., Similarly, until the issuance of a backpay specification, here May 11, 1984, no fees and expenses may be awarded.

In Evergreen Lumber Co., 278 NLRB 656 (1986), the Board approved the decision of an administrative law judge who awarded an applicant only postcomplaint fees specifically denying the compensability of precomplaint fees. See also DeBolt Transfer, 271 NLRB 299 (1984). Based on these holdings I find the EAJA and the Board's Rules and Regulations do not allow recompense of fees and expenses incurred before the issuance of the backpay specification even were an award otherwise appropriate in the instant case.

2. The compensability of fees and expenses incurred during the litigation of a collateral action in a United States district court

In October 1983, the Applicant filed suit in the United States District Court for the Central District of California in Case 83-6481 (EMT PX) seeking, inter alia, a temporary restraining order postponing the hearing on the backpay specification until the Applicant could obtain information and records from the backpay claimants and an order directing the Regional Director to order depositions which the Applicant felt was necessary before it could defend itself in the backpay specification hearing.[22] Although the record is not completely clear on the matter, it appears the Applicant's action in Federal district court was totally unsuccessful.

The Applicant seeks fees and expenses in connection with the Federal district court action as part of its general claim.[23] The General Counsel opposes this claim under two theories. First, the General Counsel argues that since the Federal district court action was a judicial proceeding, any application for fees and expenses arising out of that proceeding must be governed by section 504(a)(1) and 2412(b) and (d) of the EAJA and such application must be filed in the appropriate Federal court. The General Counsel cites the Board decision in Granite State Minerals, 261 NLRB 619 (1982), in which the Board dismissed an EAJA application seeking fees and expenses incurred in an enforcement proceeding in the court of appeals. As the Applicant points out however that decision was based on the language of sections 504(c)(1) and 2312(d)(3) of the EAJA and dealt expressly with fees and expenses in an enforcement action. The Applicant argues that the Federal district court action was in response to the Regional Director's refusal to issue prehearing subpoenas in the backpay litigation and that, accordingly, the Federal court suit was in connection with the Board's backpay specification.

Second, the General Counsel asserts, correctly, that the Applicant did not prevail in the Federal district court action and, accordingly, even viewing that action as within the Board's jurisdiction under the EAJA, the Applicant did not prevail and therefore is not entitled to compensation. The Applicant did not explicitly address this argument.

These arguments may be separately addressed.

a. The Board's EAJA jurisdiction over a U.S. district court action

The Equal Access to Justice Act at section 504(c)(1) requires that awards for fees and expenses involved in court review of the underlying decision of an agency adversary adjudication be made pursuant to section 2412(d)(3) of the EAJA, which provides for court not [22] The Applicant had earlier filed with the Regional Director a request for issuance of subpoenas, but the Regional Director had denied this motion. See discussion, supra.

[23] Because the Federal district court action also involved other backpay claimants who are not part of the instant application, the Applicant determined a proportionate share of the fees and expenses in the Federal district court action and alloted them to the Womack claim in litigation herein.

agency jurisdiction. That situation and the Granite State Minerals circumstances, supra, which rely on this language, are not present here. Here the agency decision, which was challenged was an intermediate procedural action undertaken before the merits of the underlying adversary adjudication were addressed.

Section 2412 of EAJA ,which covers judicial jurisdiction, clearly puts Federal court actions under Federal court jurisdiction unless otherwise specifically provided by statute. I find no suggestion that the language of the EAJA otherwise limits this judicial jurisdiction that I regard as exclusive unless clearly stated otherwise. I therefore conclude that agencies, the Board included, have no jurisdiction to consider applications or portions of applications under EAJA, which seek compensation for U.S. district court litigation.

The General Counsel's cited Granite State Minerals case is distinguishable and no other case law or legislative history on the issue was cited by the parties. The advantages of one unified consideration of EAJA claims after a final decision has been reached in a complicated litigation is evident. It is also true that the case law does not tend to support the consideration of costs litigation based on rulings on evidentiary or procedural grounds or on the obtaining of preliminary injunctions where no determination has been made on the ultimate merits of the case. See Hanrahn v. Hampton, 446 U.S. 754 (1980); Smith v. University of North Carolina, 632 F.2d 316 (4th Cir. 1980); Grubbs v. Butz, 548 F.2d 973 (D.C. Cir. 1976). Cases do exist however awarding interim attorney fees. See Hanrahn v. Hampton, Ibid.; Bradley v. Richmond School Board, 416 U.S. 699 (1974); Grubbs v. Butz, Ibid.

At bottom I am persuaded a Federal court action must be considered by the Federal court under the EAJA based on fundamental notions of the separation of powers and the limited expertise of administrative agencies. Where the statute is not crystal clear on the question, I am very reluctant to find agency EAJA jurisdiction over Federal court proceedings. Such a finding would seem to turn the question of expertise on its head. I simply do not think any administrative agency has the skills to evaluate an action in the Federal courts. Further, I do not believe Congress intended to create such a right in administrative agencies under the EAJA.

Accordingly, I find the U.S. district court action involved here outside the jurisdiction of the Board under the EAJA. Therefore, I would exclude all claims for recompense for fees and costs incurred in that litigation.

b. Assuming the Board has EAJA jurisdiction over the U.S. district court action herein, should fees and costs for that litigation be awarded[24]

The General Counsel, arguing in the alternative, asserts, if the Board has EAJA jurisdiction over the U.S. district court action, no award should issue because the Applicant did not prevail in that litigation. The Applicant asserts: "[T]he time and effort expended [to] try to show the General Counsel the error of her ways was necessarily incurred as the subsequent development of events has proved."

Viewing the district court litigation as part and parcel of the entire Womack litigation, all of which, under this alternative view, is before the Board in an EAJA action, the fact that the Applicant did not prevail in this preliminary portion of the entire Womack litigation does not in and of itself defeat the Applicant's claim. Litigation in this sense is viewed as a unity. If the Applicant has prevailed in the final result, as here, it is not compensated only for the intermediate rulings favorable to it. Rather, with a single exception, the entire litigation is considered in determining an award.

The single exception is set forth in the first sentence of EAJA Section 504(3):

> The adjudicative officer of the agency may reduce the amount to be awarded or deny an award to the extent that the party during the course of the proceedings engaged in conduct which unduly and unreasonably protracted the final resolution of the matter in controversy.

This language is carried forward essentially unchanged in Section 102.144(b) of the Board's Rules and Regulations.

As noted, supra, I have found the Applicant's U.S. district court action unreasonable. It is clear that it protracted the final resolution of the matter in controversy.[25] This being the case, pursuant to Section 504(3) of the EAJA and Board's Rules and Regulations Section 102.144(b), I would deny the Applicant any recompense for the U.S. district court litigation even were it found such litigation were within the jurisdiction of the Board to evaluate under the EAJA.

3. The $75-per-hour fee limit

As part of the Applicant's application, the Applicant asserted the regular billing rate for counsel to the Applicant exceeded $75 per hour and further asserted "a Petition is made under Section 102.146, 29 C.F.R. Part 102 for adjustment of the $75 limitation to reflect these fees." The General Counsel opposes this request citing several cases by the Board denying such petitions. The General Counsel further notes that Section 102.146 of the Board's Rules and Regulations as well as the EAJA "both contemplate the separate petition to be made to the Board for rule making."

My research having uncovered no case in which the Board has modified the $75-per-hour limitation and, further, not finding it appropriate for an administrative law judge to initially grant such a petition, I find the petition is appropriately placed before the Board. I would, therefore, decline to grant any exception to the $75-per-hour rule.

[24] I am here again attempting to avoid a remand should reviewing authority differ with my previous findings regarding agency EAJA jurisdiction over actions in the U.S. district court.

[25] The Applicant argues that, had it prevailed, the suit would have speeded final resolution of the case. That statement is irrelevant because as a matter of current law the action was without merit and was simply not reasonably likely to succeed as the final result in U.S. district court confirmed. In the event, the backpay specification hearing was postponed due to the Federal court action.

III. SUMMARY AND CONCLUSIONS

I have found the General Counsel's inclusion of the Womack allegations in the backpay specification to have been substantially justified within the meaning of the EAJA and the Board's Rules and Regulations and decisional law. Accordingly, I have denied the Applicant's application in its entirety.

In order to avoid a second remand with its attendant delays in the event reviewing authority should differ from my findings concerning substantial justification, I have taken the admittedly unusual step of making further alternative findings that are designed to obviate a second remand if at all possible. Accordingly, I found that, were the conduct of the General Counsel in including the Womack allegation in the backpay specification without substantial justification, the Applicant's claims would be further limited as follows. First, all claims for time and expenses occurring before the issuance of the backpay specification would be denied. Second, all claims and expenses for the preparation and litigation of the matter in district court, as described more completely supra, would be denied. Third, the $75 per hour limitation would remain in effect and claims for higher hourly rates would be denied. Given those exclusions, assuming again that the General Counsel's inclusion of the Womack allegation in the backpay specification were to be found not substantially justified, I would award fees and expenses with the limitations described above, commencing at the time the General Counsel was found to no longer be substantially justified in maintaining the Womack action.[26]

Recommendation

Having concluded that the Applicant's application is without merit because the General Counsel was substantially justified in including the Womack allegation in its backpay specification and in maintaining that allegation until its withdrawal, I find the Applicant's application for fees should be denied.

Accordingly, based on the above, I issue the following recommended[27]

ORDER

The application of American Pacific Concrete Pipe Company, Inc. for attorneys' fees and expenses under the EAJA is denied.

[26] I make no arithmetic calculations here for two reasons. First, the amount conditionally awarded depends on the further specification of the date the General Counsel was first without substantial jurisdiction to continue the Womack action. Second, the General Counsel did not challenge the Applicant's assertions of hours worked nor the expenses incurred save as previously discussed; thus liquidation of the award would be essentially automatic given the determination of the dates of the commencement of the General Counsel's insufficient justification and no remand would be necessary to produce a fixed dollar award.

[27] If no exceptions are filed as provided by Sec. 102.154 of the Board's Rules and Regulations, the findings, conclusions and recommended order shall as provided in the Board's Rules and Regulations, be adopted by the Board and all objections to them shall be waived for all purposes.

July 29, 1988

DECISION AND DIRECTION OF ELECTION

BY CHAIRMAN STEPHENS AND MEMBERS JOHANSEN, BABSON, AND CRACRAFT

On July 16, 1987, a hearing was held before Hearing Officer Mark E. Wirick. Pursuant to Section 102.67 of the National Labor Relations Board Rules and Regulations, the Regional Director for Region 6 transferred this proceeding to the Board for determination of an appropriate bargaining unit. The Petitioner and the Employer filed briefs.

On the entire record, the Board finds

1. The Employer is engaged in commerce within the meaning of the Act.

2. The labor organization involved claims to represent certain employees of the Employer.

3. A question affecting commerce exists concerning the representation of employees of the Employer within the meaning of Section 9(c)(1) and Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

Formed in 1979, the Employer is engaged in building construction. It joined the Master Builders Association (MBA), a multiemployer bargaining association, and assigned it bargaining rights. The MBA entered a series of 8(f) prehire agreements with the Petitioner in 11 Pennsylvania counties. The Petitioner seeks an election to establish its status as majority representative under Section 9(a).

The record consists of stipulated evidence. No oral testimony was offered. The only point of contention between the parties is the scope of an appropriate bargaining unit.

I. CONTENTIONS AND STIPULATIONS

A. The Petitioner

The Petitioner contends the Employer's operating engineers[2] working within its 33 county International Union's geographic jurisdiction constitute an appropriate unit. According to the Petitioner, the Employer performs the majority of its work in Allegheny County, Pennsylvania. However, because of expanded operations, an operating engineer can reasonably expect employment with the Employer in all 33 counties.

Alternatively, the Petitioner requests a unit composed of the Employer's operating engineers working within the 11 counties of the current MBA agreement. It asserts that the bargaining history of this unit illustrates an established and operational relationship and should be preserved. Additionally, according to the Petitioner, the parties' 8(f) prehire agreement is currently enforceable in all 11 counties of the current MBA jurisdiction. Finding this unit appropriate, contends the Petitioner, merely continues the existing voluntary relationship.

B. The Employer

The Employer's primary proposal for an appropriate unit is one limited to the operating engineers employed by it in Allegheny County where it performs the majority of its contracts. The Employer contends that work performed in other counties is sporadic and insignificant. Working on those projects, the Employer insists, does not provide an operating engineer with a reasonable expectation of future employment. The Employer maintains that the scope of an appropriate bargaining unit is controlled by the presence of a core group or common nucleus of employees. Only where this core group is present, argues the Employer, is an election a barometer of future employee choice of bargaining representative, permitting broad geographical units.

The Employer alternatively proposes a unit composed of its operating engineers working within the counties of the current MBA agreement, where it has performed projects since 1985.

C. Stipulations

The parties stipulated to the following relevant facts.

1. The operating engineers not employed on a project-by-project basis possess sufficient continuity of interest to merit continued reliance on the results of an election.

2. The Employer's operating engineers are hired exclusively through the Petitioner's referral system.

3. The Employer uses a core group of operating engineers on projects performed in the 11 counties of the current MBA agreement.

4. Because of the Employer's common wages, hours, centralized control of labor relations, and other terms and conditions of employment, voter eligibility is determined by the rule of Daniel Construction Co.[3]

[2] For ease of reference, all the Employer's operators of heavy equipment, oilers, mechanics, and mechanic's helpers shall be referred to as "operating engineers."

Accordingly, we direct that in addition to those in the unit who were employed during the payroll period immediately preceding the date of the Decision and Direction of Election, all employees in the unit who have been employed for a total of 30 days or more within the period of 12 months, or who have had some employ-

II. ANALYSIS

Determination of an appropriate bargaining unit is guided by the objectives of ensuring employee self-organization, promoting freedom of choice in collective bargaining, and advancement of industrial peace and stability. These objectives are realized when the members of an appropriate unit share, inter alia, a community of interest in wages, hours, and other terms and conditions of employment.

Board inquiry pursues not the most appropriate or comprehensive unit but simply an appropriate unit.[4] Once this unit is determined, the requirements of the Act are satisfied. The inquiry first considers the petitioning union's proposals.[5] If the union's proposed unit is inappropriate, the employer's proposals are then scrutinized. Factors relevant to appropriateness are the similarity of skills, functions, and working conditions throughout the proposed unit; the central control of labor relations; transfer of employees among the Employer's other construction sites; and the extent of the parties' bargaining history.[6] Units with extensive bargaining history remain intact unless repugnant to Board policy or interfere with rights guaranteed by the Act.[7]

The Petitioner proposes a unit which includes all 33 counties within its geographical jurisdiction. However, the limited evidence introduced by the Petitioner at the hearing provides inadequate support under the above-listed factors for this proposed unit. Without supporting evidence, we cannot find the Petitioner's proposed 33-county unit appropriate.[8]

The Petitioner's alternative unit proposal of the 11 counties of the current MBA agreement is an appropriate unit. It is significant that the parties have bargained in this unit, albeit through a bargaining association, since 1979. The Employer recognized the Petitioner as the 8(f) bargaining representative of its operating engineers and used its hiring halls exclusively.

Reliance on 8(f) bargaining history is supported by our decision in John Deklewa & Sons, 282 NLRB 1375 (1987), enfd. 843 F.2d 770 (3d Cir. 1988). Although that case concerned an alleged unfair labor practice not present here, the Board enumerated several principles relevant to representation issues, including the statement that:

> [8(f)] agreements will not bar the processing of valid petitions filed pursuant to Section 9(c) and Section 9(e) . . . [and] in processing such petitions, the appropriate unit normally will be the single employer's employees covered by the agreement . . . .[9]

We further noted, in Deklewa at fn. 42, that existing eligibility and election rules would be applied to the extent feasible. Accordingly, the Board's traditional deference to bargaining history is generally applicable in the construction industry. Indeed, based on the limited evidence presented, it is the determinative factor in finding in this case that the 11-county jurisdiction of the MBA agreement is an appropriate unit.[10]

Finding the 11-county unit of the current MBA agreement an appropriate unit ends the inquiry. We do not reach the Employer's proposals.

III. CONCLUSION

We find the following unit appropriate for the purpose of collective bargaining within the meaning of Section 9(a) of the Act:

> All operators of heavy equipment, oilers, mechanics and mechanics' helpers, employed by the Employer within the 11 Pennsylvania counties of Allegheny, Armstrong, Beaver, Butler, Fayette, Green, Indiana, Lawrence, Mercer, Washington, and Westmoreland, excluding: office clerical employees, guards and supervisors as defined in the Act, and all other employees.

[10] Historically, the Board has not defined the scope of an appropriate bargaining unit in geographic terms. However, as each of the Petitioner's proposed units are so described, we give deference to this terminology.

DECISION AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN STEPHENS AND MEMBERS BABSON AND CRACRAFT

On February 27, 1987, Administrative Law Judge Harold Bernard Jr. issued the attached decision. The Respondent filed exceptions and a supporting brief,[1] and the General Counsel and Charging Party filed answering briefs.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the decision and the record[2] in light of the exceptions and briefs and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings,[3] and conclusions as modified, to modify the remedy,[4] and to adopt the recommended Order as modified.

1. We agree with the judge that the Respondent's proposal to remove all the electron beam welder work from the bargaining unit constituted an attempt to alter the unit's composition. Like the judge, we do not find that the evidence establishes that the Respondent, through its offer concerning the electron beam welder, was merely attempting to promote the employee in that classification out of the unit into a supervisory position after bargaining in good faith over the transfer of the individual and his work into supervisory status. See, e.g., Tesoro Petroleum Corp., 192 NLRB 354 (1971); Fry Foods, 241 NLRB 76 (1979), enfd. 609 F.2d 267 (6th Cir. 1979). Rather, we find, as he did, that the Respondent's bargaining over this matter represented an attempt to remove the electron beam welder classification from the unit under the guise of promoting the incumbent welder to a supervisory position. That it was not a genuine promotion to supervisory status is shown by the evidence that the welder simply continued to perform his same duties after being removed from the unit. Consequently, it is evident that the Respondent was not insisting simply on transferring unit work to supervisors through the device of promoting unit employees to supervisory positions—a mandatory subject of bargaining. Tesoro Petroleum Corp., supra. It was actually trying to alter unit composition by placing an employee classification outside the unit—a permissive subject of bargaining. See Newport News Shipbuilding v. NLRB, 602 F.2d 73, 77–78 (4th Cir. 1979) (employer may not insist on altering composition of a unit under guise of a work transfer), cited in Idaho Statesman, 281 NLRB 272, 277 (1986), enfd. in relevant part 836 F.2d 1396, 1403–1406 (D.C. Cir. 1988). Accordingly, we agree with the judge's finding that the Respondent unlawfully insisted to impasse on a permissive subject of bargaining.

2. Although we agree with the judge's rejection of the Respondent's defense under Trident Seafoods Corp., 244 NLRB 566 (1979), affd. 642 F.2d 1148 (9th Cir. 1981), and his finding that the notice sent to employees during the first week of February 1984 did not adequately cure the electron beam

[1] The Charging Party filed a motion to strike the Respondent's exceptions and supporting brief, and the General Counsel filed a request for an order directing the Respondent to resubmit its supporting brief. The Respondent filed an opposition. We deny both the Charging Party's motion and the General Counsel's request.

[2] The Respondent has requested oral argument. The request is denied as the record, exceptions, and briefs adequately present the issues and the positions of the parties.

[3] The Respondent has excepted to some of the judge's credibility findings. The Board's established policy is not to overrule an administrative law judge's credibility resolutions unless the clear preponderance of all the relevant evidence convinces us that they are incorrect. Standard Dry Wall Products, 91 NLRB 544 (1950), enfd. 188 F.2d 362 (3d Cir. 1951). We have carefully examined the record and find no basis for reversing the findings.

[4] As discussed in sec. 5 below, we find the unfair labor practice strike conversion date at Madison Heights to be November 6, 1983. We also find the unfair labor practice strike conversion dates at Elmira and Detroit to be the third week of December 1983 and December 24, 1983, respectively. Accordingly, we modify the remedy to reflect those dates instead of the November 3 and December 2 dates found therein.

In making his multiplant unit determination, the judge relied in part on the Union's method of submitting master agreement proposals to a pooling of votes by employees at all three plants. Although we agree with the judge that the parties intended to bargain on the basis of a single multiplant unit, we note that this pooling process indicates only the Union's belief that the three plants constitute one unit and has no bearing on the Respondent's view of the appropriate unit.

We agree with the judge's finding that an impasse had not been reached in local Detroit plant negotiations regarding the Respondent's proposal to reduce the number of shop stewards from six to three. The judge also found that, despite the absence of impasse, the Respondent advised the Union at the strike's conclusion that the number of shop stewards it would recognize in the Detroit plant would be reduced to three. Because the Respondent implemented its proposal before bargaining to impasse and refused to recognize three of the six shop stewards as union representatives, we agree with the judge that the Respondent violated Sec. 8(a)(5).

We find it unnecessary to address the issue of whether the Respondent would have been privileged to implement its proposal had the parties reached a valid impasse. See Lehigh Portland Cement Co., 287 NLRB 978 (1987).

In his discussion of the Respondent's unlawful refusal to provide the Union with information concerning the removal of jobs and machinery from the Detroit plant, the judge stated that the strike at the three plants concluded in February 1985. The judge also stated in the remedy section of his decision that the strike concluded in February 1964. We correct these inadvertent errors as the strike actually ended in February 1984.

In accordance with our decision in New Horizons for the Retarded, 283 NLRB 1173 (1987), interest on and after January 1, 1987, shall be computed at the "short-term Federal rate" for the underpayment of taxes as set out in the 1986 amendment to 26 U.S.C. § 6621. Interest on amounts accrued prior to January 1, 1987 (the effective date of the 1986 amendment to 26 U.S.C. § 6621), shall be computed in accordance with Florida Steel Corp., 231 NLRB 651 (1977).

welder and direct dealing violations, we find it unnecessary to pass on the judge's finding that the notice was untimely sent to the Respondent's employees. Rather, we rely on the judge's finding that the notice was ineffective because shortly thereafter the Respondent engaged in further unlawful conduct.

3. We also find no merit in the Respondent's argument that it did not unlawfully refuse to provide the Union with financial information because it merely claimed competitive disadvantage at the Elmira and Madison Heights facilities. By linking plant survivals to economic recoveries from the Union and announcing the closing of Madison Heights, the Respondent by its words and conduct clearly pleaded an inability to pay existing wages and benefits and was therefore legally obligated to turn over books and records so that the Union could verify that poverty claim.[5]

4. We clarify the judge's finding that the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(5) of the Act by engaging in conduct calculated to split off the Detroit plant from the established multiplant bargaining unit. We observe that the Respondent's proposal for a separate contract covering the Detroit plant was not per se unlawful. Rather, our finding of an 8(a)(5) violation here is based on the Respondent's coercive verbal and written communications to the Detroit employees, which went beyond the boundaries of protected speech as provided in Section 8(c) of the Act. Thus, we agree with the judge that the Respondent sought to create a division between the Detroit employees and the Union by pitting one part of the bargaining unit (the Detroit employees) against another part (the Elmira and Madison Heights employees), thereby undermining the Union's representative status.

We note that our decisions in United Technologies Corp., 274 NLRB 609 (1985), affd. 789 F.2d 121 (2d Cir. 1986) (United Technologies I); United Technologies Corp., 274 NLRB 1069 (1985), affd. 789 F.2d 121 (2d Cir. 1986) (United Technologies II); and Putnam Buick, 280 NLRB 868 (1986), affd. sub nom. Machinists District 190 v. NLRB, 827 F.2d 557 (9th Cir. 1987), do not dictate a different result. In United Technologies I and II, the Board found no 8(a)(5) violations because the employer's public communications to its employees did not urge the employees to abandon their representative in favor of receiving benefits from the employer. Furthermore, the employer genuinely acknowledged the union's rightful role as the employees' bargaining representative. In Putnam Buick, the employer's conduct was also found to be protected by Section 8(c) of the Act. The Board, there, however, relied on a union officer's admission that one employer-employee meeting was merely informational in nature and found that at another meeting the employer impliedly suggested that the employees present an offer (already presented to the union) to the union leadership for further consideration. We note that none of these cases involved an employer's attempt to achieve its bargaining objectives by pitting one group of employees against another, which is evident here. We also find that the instant case is distinguishable because the Respondent's communications to the Detroit employees denigrated the Union's concern for its representative duties and, in a coercive manner, suggested that the Detroit employees return to work without involving the Union in the decisional process.

We further note that although the complaint did not specifically allege a direct dealing violation, the complaint does challenge the legality of the Respondent's communications to the Detroit employees on the ground that they constitute conduct designed to split apart the historic multiplant unit in violation of Section 8(a)(5). At the hearing, the Respondent had the opportunity to fully litigate the nature and extent of its communications to the Detroit employees. It is well established that the Board may find a violation, although not specifically alleged in the complaint, if it is related to the allegations in the complaint, the matter was fully and fairly litigated, and the respondent has not been prejudiced. Baytown Sun, 255 NLRB 154 fn. 1 (1981). That is the situation here. Accordingly, we conclude that a finding of an 8(a)(5) direct dealing violation is fully warranted. We shall modify paragraph 1(b) of the judge's recommended Order to conform to the violation found.

5. The judge found that the Madison Heights strike was an unfair labor practice strike from its inception on November 3, 1983. We modify the judge's finding to reflect that the Madison Heights strike was an economic strike at its inception which converted to an unfair labor practice strike commencing on November 6, 1983.

On October 11, Madison Heights Local 771 President Thomas Butler handed out a list of unresolved issues between the Respondent and the Union to the Madison Heights membership during the strike vote meeting. The list contained several economic items but did not mention the electron beam welder issue. The Madison Heights membership voted to strike. The union leadership, however, chose not to proceed with the strike authorization process at that point but continued to negotiate with the Respondent.

[5] We note that Harvstone Mfg. Corp., 272 NLRB 939 (1984), on which the judge relied, was denied enforcement in part by the court of appeals, NLRB v. Harvstone Mfg. Corp., 785 F.2d 570 (7th Cir. 1986), on the ground that a claim of competitive disadvantage, without more, does not amount to a claim of inability to pay. Because, as noted above, the Respondent here indicated that its plants might not survive without concessions from the Union, we need not rely on Harvstone in order to find a violation here.

On the afternoon of November 2, International Servicing Representative Smith sought final strike approval from the Union's office of the regional director, as it had final discretion on whether to implement the strike. Smith discussed with Assistant Regional Director Preston Harris the Respondent's position on the electron beam welder issue and orally amended the statement of strike issues to include that dispute. There is no evidence that the membership was either apprised of or consented to the oral amendment at that time. Following the discussion, Harris gave Smith final approval to implement the strike.

The strike at the Madison Heights plant began on November 3. On November 6, the Madison Heights membership confirmed by vote their representatives' rejection of the Respondent's final proposal. Prior to voting, and for the first time, the employees were informed of the electron beam welder issue.

We find that the Madison Heights strike was not an unfair labor practice strike at its inception, but was converted to that status on November 6, when the membership was informed of the Respondent's position on the electron beam welder position and voted to confirm their representatives' rejection of the Respondent's final offer and remain on strike. We do not dispute the notion that unit employees may give standing authorization to their bargaining agents to commence a strike in response to what those agents believe is an employer's unfair labor practice. But we find no evidence that such generalized authority was ever given by the rank-and-file employees to the Local's officers, either at the October 11 meeting, when the employees approved the strike authorization, or at any time before. In requesting that strike vote, the only grounds offered by the Local's officials dealt with economic issues.[6]

6. The judge also determined that the Elmira and Detroit plant strikes were converted to unfair labor practice strikes on December 2 when the Respondent sent a letter solely to the Detroit employees urging their return to work. Although we agree with the judge that the strikes were converted to unfair labor practice strikes, we disagree with the judge's selection of the December 2 date.

At the Elmira union membership meeting held in the third week of December, District Representative Jack Manione read to the membership a list of unfair labor practice charges filed December 15. These charges included the Respondent's unlawful attempt to bypass the Union and deal directly with the Detroit employees. After Manione read the charges, approximately 50 to 60 members voiced their opposition to the Respondent's conduct. Elmira Local Vice President Fred McElligott credibly testified that these members expressed the position that "there is no way one plant will go back to work without the other two units."[7] McElligott also testified that on December 21 or 22 the Elmira picketers began carrying signs which read, "Facet Charged with Unfair Labor Charges." These signs were carried until the strike's conclusion on February 17, 1984.

At the Detroit union membership meeting held on December 24, Union Vice President Jim Ellis credibly testified that he informed the membership that the Union had filed unfair labor practice charges in December and Respondent President James Malone had told Ellis over the phone that "he [Malone] had been down on the picket lines talking to the people, asking them were they satisfied . . . would they come back." Staff Representative Wally Waller also credibly testified that Ellis told the Detroit employees the Respondent was "badgering" some picketers into coming back to work and that Ellis asked whether other employees had been approached by the Respondent. Detroit Local President Tony Rahall similarly testified that he was informed by either Ellis or International Representative John Mando that the Detroit meeting was called because "people . . . were complaining about management coming out talking to the people, going in without a contract, and no union." Two picketers, Ilah Drake and Jack Muhaw, both credibly testified that Malone had admitted to them that "he thought he could get into trouble for talking to the people on the picket line, [b]ecause he thought that the [U]nion would think that he was trying to bargain and talk us back to work." Finally, Mando credibly testified that in mid-December he issued instructions to each Local to change some of the picket signs to read "Unfair Labor Practice Charges."

[6] Member Cracraft would find that the Madison Heights strike was an unfair labor practice strike from its inception. In voting to strike on October 11, the Madison Heights membership gave its union representatives the authority to respond to the progress of negotiations in the manner they saw fit. On November 3, Representative Smith decided to call the strike in protest of the Respondent's position on the electron beam welder issue. Thus, in Member Cracraft's view, Smith's decision was well within the broad authority a collective-bargaining agent possesses to act on behalf of employees in a strike situation. See Woodlawn Hospital, 274 NLRB 796 (1985), and Michigan Ladder Co., 286 NLRB 21 (1987) (continued and vigorous objections of union negotiators to the unlawful company decision to subcontract unit work warrant the conclusion that the strike was an unfair labor practice strike).

[7] As stated in sec. 4, supra, the Respondent's direct dealing violation includes coercive solicitation of the Detroit employees to return to work.

Based on the record as a whole, we find that the Respondent's unlawful attempt to bypass the Union and deal directly with the Detroit employees in part caused the Elmira and Detroit memberships to resolve to stay out on strike and actually prolonged the strike. Blu-Fountain Manor, 270 NLRB 199, 206 fn. 14 (1984), enfd. sub nom. NLRB v. Jarm Enterprises, 785 F.2d 195 (7th Cir. 1986). Accordingly, we modify the judge's conversion findings and find that the Elmira and Detroit plant strikes converted to unfair labor practice strikes as of the dates of the membership meetings when the memberships were informed of and objected to the Respondent's unlawful direct dealing. Because the record is unclear concerning the date of the Elmira membership meeting, we leave its determination to the compliance stage of this proceeding.

In light of our modification of the judge's findings, we shall issue Amended Conclusions of Law, a modified Order, and a new notice to employees.

AMENDED CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. Substitute the following for Conclusion of Law 7.

"7. Due to the Respondent's conduct described above in paragraph 6, the economic strike at the Madison Heights plant underway since November 3, 1983, was prolonged and thereby converted to an unfair labor practice strike commencing on November 6, 1983."

2. Substitute the following for Conclusion of Law 9.

"9. By dealing directly with employees about terms and conditions of employment, the Respondent refused to bargain in good faith with the Union in violation of Section 8(a)(5) of the Act."

3. Substitute the following for Conclusions of Law 11 and 12.

"11. By unilaterally changing employment conditions such as established grievance procedures, paid time for representative matters, seniority recall rights, plant access for employee representatives, and number of shop stewards, and refusing to recognize three of the six shop stewards as union representatives without notifying, consulting, or bargaining with the Union as the exclusive representative of its employees in the appropriate bargaining unit, the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(5) of the Act.

"12. Notwithstanding unconditional request for reinstatements made by the Union on behalf of its striking employees on February 18, 1984, the Respondent has refused to reinstate them to their former or substantially equivalent positions, thereby engaging in unfair labor practices in violation of Section 8(a)(3) and (1) of the Act."

ORDER

The National Labor Relations Board adopts the recommended Order of the administrative law judge as modified below and orders that the Respondent, Facet Enterprises, Inc., Detroit, Michigan, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall take the action set forth in the Order as modified.

1. Substitute the following for paragraphs 1(b), (c), and (d).

"(b) Refusing to bargain in good faith with the Union by dealing directly with employees about terms and conditions of employment. The bargaining unit is:

> All production and maintenance employees employed by Respondent at its Detroit, Michigan plant (Fuel Devices Division), its Madison Heights, Michigan plant (Filter Products Division) and its Elmira, New York plant (Motor Components Division); but excluding office clerical employees, professional employees, guards and supervisors as defined in the Act.

"(c) Refusing to bargain in good faith with the Union by unilaterally changing employment conditions such as established grievance procedures, paid time for representative matters, seniority recall rights, plant access for employee representatives, and number of shop stewards, and refusing to recognize three of the six shop stewards as union representatives without notifying, consulting, or bargaining with the Union as the exclusive representative of its employees in the appropriate bargaining unit.

"(d) Refusing on request to reinstate employees engaged in an unfair labor practice strike."

2. Substitute the following for paragraphs 2(a) and (b) and reletter subsequent paragraphs.

"(a) Offer the unfair labor practice strikers immediate and full reinstatement to their former positions or, if those positions no longer exist, to substantially equivalent positions, without prejudice to their seniority or other rights and privileges, and make them whole for any loss of earnings and other benefits suffered as a result of the discrimination against them, in the manner set forth in the remedy section of the judge's decision as modified by the Board's decision regarding the dates the Madison Heights, Detroit, and Elmira strikes became unfair labor practice strikes."

3. Substitute the attached notice for that of the administrative law judge.

APPENDIX

NOTICE TO EMPLOYEES
POSTED BY ORDER OF THE
NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS BOARD
An Agency of the United States Government

The National Labor Relations Board has found that we violated the National Labor Relations Act and has ordered us to post and abide by this notice.

Section 7 of the Act gives employees these rights.

> To organize
> To form, join, or assist any union
> To bargain collectively through representatives of their own choice
> To act together for other mutual aid or protection
> To choose not to engage in any of these protected concerted activities.

WE WILL NOT do anything to interfere with these rights.

WE WILL NOT refuse to bargain in good faith with International Union, United Automobile, Aerospace and Agricultural Implement Workers of America (UAW) by insisting to impasse and thereby preventing an agreement from being reached concerning your terms of employment on our proposal to exclude the electron beam welder position from the bargaining unit.

WE WILL NOT refuse to bargain in good faith with the Union by refusing to furnish the Union with information relevant and necessary to its duty to represent you, such as information on our financial status, on movement of plants and machinery, and picket line misconduct.

WE WILL NOT refuse to bargain in good faith with the Union by dealing directly with employees about terms and conditions of employment.

WE WILL NOT unilaterally alter the employment conditions of employees concerning the established grievance procedures, paid time for representative matters, seniority recall rights, plant access to our premises by your union representatives, and number of shop stewards, and refusing to recognize three of the six shop stewards as union representatives.

WE WILL NOT, in certain circumstances explained in the Board's decision, refuse reinstatement to former Madison Heights, Detroit, and Elmira unfair labor practice strikers.

WE WILL NOT in any like or related manner interfere with, restrain, or coerce you in the exercise of the rights guaranteed you by Section 7 of the Act.

WE WILL, on request, bargain in good faith with the aforenamed Union as the exclusive representative of our employees in the following appropriate unit:

> All production and maintenance employees employed by us at our Detroit, Michigan plant (Fuel Devices Division), our Madison Heights, Michigan plant (Filter Products Division) and our Elmira, New York plant (Motor Components Division); but excluding office clerical employees, professional employees, guards and supervisors as defined in the Act, and if an understanding is reached, embody any such understanding in a signed agreement.

WE WILL restore and place in effect retroactive to February 18, 1984, all conditions of employment which we were found herein to have unlawfully changed, including the established grievance procedures, paid time for representative matters, seniority recall rights, and plant access; and WE WILL make whole employees for any losses they may have incurred as a result of our unlawful action in changing such employment conditions. These conditions will remain unchanged until such time as the parties execute a new agreement, or bargain to good-faith impasse.

WE WILL offer the unfair labor practice strikers, except those discharged for cause by us, immediate and full reinstatement to their former positions or, if those positions no longer exist, to substantially equivalent positions, without prejudice to their seniority or other rights and privileges, and WE WILL make each of them whole for any loss of wages suffered by reason of our unlawful conduct against them as provided in the Board's decision.

WE WILL furnish the Union with information relevant and necessary to its collective-bargaining responsibilities.

DECISION

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

HAROLD BERNARD JR., Administrative Law Judge. Pursuant to second amended consolidated complaint issued on 31 October 1984, I heard this matter on numerous days in 1985 in Detroit, Michigan. The case involves alleged violations of Section 8(a)(1), (3), and (5) of the Act occurring in the context of negotiations for a new collective-bargaining agreement, and including issues over refusals to provide information, unlawful impasse bargaining about a nonmandatory subject, efforts to split an established multiplant bargaining unit, whether a strike was economic or an unfair labor practice strike, picket line misconduct, refusals to reinstate former strikers, and asserted unilateral action by Respondent.

On the entire record, including credibility determinations based on witnesses' deportment on the witness stand, and briefs filed by the parties, I make the following

FINDINGS OF FACT

I. JURISDICTION

Respondent, as alleged in the complaint and admitted in its answer, is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of the Act. The Union (UAW) and its Locals 104, 771, and 604 are labor organizations as defined in the Act.

II. APPROPRIATE UNIT

The complaint alleges that the appropriate unit is:

> All production and maintenance employees employed by Respondent at its Detroit, Michigan plant (Fuel Devices Division), its Madison Heights, Michigan plant (Filter Products Division) and its Elmira, New York plant (Motor Components Division); but excluding office clerical employees, professional employees, guards and supervisors as defined in the Act.

The record shows that the Union has represented Facet's employees at the three named plants under contracts in force from April 1976 to 30 April 1977, 1977 through 1980, and 1980 through early November 1983. As the long-established and recognized collective-bargaining representative for these employees, the Union has negotiated major terms and conditions of employment covering all the unit employees at the three plants in master agreements over the years. Under the long-established practice negotiated master agreements are submitted to all the employees in the three plants for ratification, the outcome being determined by pooling the votes. Although the parties left some subjects to be resolved in local supplementary agreements tailored to each plant's circumstances, as early as 1976 it was specifically provided in the parties' agreement that such agreements would have to be referred to the National Facet Department of the Union for approval before becoming effective. (G.C. Exh. 42, par. XXIII.)

In all the years the parties lived with multiplant bargaining, Respondent never denied the appropriateness of the master agreement unit, in fact, even during the failed negotiations for a new contract to replace the 1980–1983 agreement, Respondent had occasion in various communications to refer to the "recognized three-plant bargaining unit," declaring that, "At no time did Facet every [sic] try to split up the three-plant bargaining unit." (G.C. Exh. 38 at 1,2.) In addition, by a "Notice" to all employees dated 1 February 1984 Respondent stated that "Facet disavows and repudiates any intention at any time to split the Detroit plant from the historic multiplant bargaining unit (which includes the Detroit, Madison Heights and Elmira [New York] plants)." This communication refers to the "historic multiplant unit" throughout its contents. (G.C. Exh. 25.)

Nevertheless, the Respondent, for the first time, sought to question the appropriateness of the established unit in its answer and on brief in these proceedings, pointing to dissimilar characteristics at the three plants, such as geographical separation and lack of interchange, among other factors, to support its unprecedented contention. Respondent's tardy contention after 7 years of bargaining successive contracts in such unit is not entitled to much weight. Williams Enterprises, 212 NLRB 880, 884 (1974); Harding Glass Industries, 216 NLRB 331 (1975); Maphis Chapman Corp., 151 NLRB 73, 86 at fn. 34 (1965); and NLRB v. Midvalley Steel Fabricators, 621 F.2d 49, 53 at fn. 3 (2d Cir. 1980). In any event, Respondent also referred to the fact that original Board certifications, from 1935 to 1940, fail to support the view that the Board ever certified a multiplant unit as opposed to separate plant units, suggesting the unit was never really an appropriate one from its inception so that the complaint should be dismissed. In effect, Respondent on brief proposes for unit determination purposes, "the Board enter a time capsule and return to when employees were first assigned" at the three plants and reappraise the unit as it would have deemed it appropriate had the matter been before the Board in an initial unit determination many years ago, a superficial proposal indifferent to the parties' admitted collective-bargaining history since then and their current state of affairs, and therefore wholly unwarranted. Gibbs & Cox, Inc., 280 NLRB 953 (1986). The factors extant at the three plants here addressed by Respondent to support its view, as the Board noted in Gibbs & Cox, Inc. are > of lesser cogency where a history of meaningful bargaining has developed. See, e.g., Standard Brands, 75 NLRB 394 (1947); West Virginia Pulp & Paper Co., 53 NLRB 814 (1943). In such circumstances, greater latitude should be accorded the collective rights of employees to pursue and preserve the pattern of representation of their choosing. Thus, to characterize the unit from the vantage of any period of time but the one presently under consideration is to disturb the reasonable balance the Board seeks to achieve between the aims of assuring freedom of employees' choice and fostering established bargaining relationships. [280 NLRB at 954–955.]

Viewing the unit presently, it is clear that the parties' multiplant unit is appropriate. Thus, it is well established "that parties to a collective-bargaining relationship may by contract, bargaining history, and course of conduct . . . form a multiplant bargaining unit." Anheuser-Busch, Inc., 246 NLRB 29, 31 (1979); Miles & Sons Trucking, 269 NLRB 7, 14 (1984); and White-Westinghouse Corp., 229 NLRB 667 (1977), see also General Electric Co., 180 NLRB 1094, 1095 (1970); Canterbury Gardens, 238 NLRB 864 (1978); and General Motors Corp., 120 NLRB 1215, 1218 (1958). That they have done so here is readily apparent from the contracts between the parties from 1976 through 1983, the bargaining for major terms and conditions of employment covering employees at the three plants at master agreement negotiations preceding those contracts and the multiplant contract ratification procedures requiring a majority of yes votes among all three-plant bargaining unit members combined. I find that, based on all the foregoing, that the above-described unit of employees for which the Union and its locals have been, and remain, the exclusive bargaining representative, is a unit appropriate for collective bargaining as defined in the Act.

III. AGENCY STATUS OF FACET OFFICIALS

On the basis of admissions in the pleadings and the entire record, I find that James Malone, Paul Dick, Robert Schaeffer, Thomas Robertazzi, Bob White, T. J. Westfall, Frank Vaughn, William Popadynec, Ron Goral, E. J. Mullane, Donald Houser, John Evans, and Robert Childress occupied the positions as described in paragraphs 7(a) and (b) in the complaint and at all times material were supervisors and/or representatives and agents of Respondent within the meaning of the Act.

IV. THE UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

A. The 10(b) Issue

Respondent moved at hearing and on brief to dismiss complaint paragraph 13 which alleges an unlawful refusal by Respondent to furnish the Union with financial information, contending that this matter was covered by a dismissed charge in Case 7–CA–22929 from which no appeal was ever taken thereby rendering the subject matter time-barred from these proceedings, citing both Ducane Heating Corp. and ITT Lighting Fixtures.[1] Respondent makes further reference to the view that a separate later charge in Case 7–CA–23154 cannot support the issuance of complaint paragraph 13 either because nowhere on the face of that later charge or in the appeal from a partial dismissal does the matter contained in paragraph 13 appear.

At the outset, it is clear that the cited precedent, dealing with reinstatement or revivals of abandoned charges time-barred by Section 10(b) in the Act, is inapplicable to the instant case, where complaint was authorized on the basis of a then active, timely charge in the later Case 7–CA–23154, rather than the earlier dismissed case, Case 7–CA–23159 (R. Exh. 7). This being true, paragraph 13 is not a reinstated or revived abandoned charge whose subject matter is barred by the cited cases. In this connection, it should be noted further that the dismissed charge, Case 7–CA–22929, was a sharply limited allegation of bad-faith bargaining by, inter alia, Respondent's refusal of the Union's request for financial information early in the parties' handling of this matter without further reference to any factual circumstances, while complaint paragraph 13 based on the later charge identifies numerous dates and places when the allegedly unlawful refusals to provide the requested financial information had continued to occur and the problem had matured. On the face of things, therefore, the dismissed charge and paragraph 13 are clearly not one and the same and there is no evidence to support such view, or the Respondent's "revival" theory based thereon.

Finally, while it is true that the allegations in the timely charge do not specifically address a refusal to provide financial information, this fact is not controlling. The parties continued negotiations after the dismissal in Case 7–CA–22929 and, more significantly, the matter of financial information requests as well as other information requests arose in the dynamics of those ongoing negotiations during which numerous allegations of unlawful conduct by Respondent arose. In fact, specific allegations of unlawful refusals to provide other information concerning striker misconduct and equipment removal had been found meritorious during the continuing investigation.

It should be further noted that this kind of alleged misconduct by Respondent was addressed to the General Counsel's attention in an appeal from the Regional Director's partial dismissal in Case 7–CA–23154 (R. Exh. 7). All the above being true it was well within the reasonable exercise of sound discretion by the General Counsel to evaluate the parties' entire situation at the current stage in their collective-bargaining relationship, rather than being foreclosed from viewing a total picture by a contention based merely on an earlier dismissal of an undeveloped issue or the facial allegations in Case 7–CA–23154 just so long as the General Counsel did not get, "so completely outside of the situation which gave rise to the charge that it may be said to be initiating the proceeding on [her] motion [for] then the complaint [would] fall as not supported by the charge." NLRB v. Kohler Co., 220 F.2d 3, 7 (7th Cir. 1955). For these reasons, including the fact that the allegations in complaint paragraph 13 concerning refusal of requests for financial information, I find, are clearly associated with other alleged unlawful refusals of information requests set forth in the complaint, I conclude that the timely 8(a)(5) charge in Case 7–CA–23154 is sufficient to support the additional incidents of financial information request denials covered by the complaint. Based on the foregoing, Respondent's motion is denied. Flex Products, 278 NLRB 417, 418 (1986); NLRB v. Fant Milling Co., 360 U.S. 201 (1959); NLRB v. Complas Industries, 714 F.2d 733 (7th Cir. 1983); and Flex Plastics, 262 NLRB 651, 652 (1982).

B. Respondent's Proposal on the Electron Beam Welder Classification

The complaint alleges that Respondent insisted to impasse on its contract proposal regarding the electron beam welder (EBW), a job classification included in the unit at Respondent's Madison Heights plant, thereby violating Section 8(a)(5) in the Act because the proposal concerned a permissive subject of bargaining, a reduction in the composition and scope of the bargaining unit, as to which, unlike a mandatory subject of bargaining, neither party could condition their agreement for a new contract.

[1] 273 NLRB 1389 (1985), and 267 NLRB 709 (1983).

1. Background

The position has been included in the collective-bargaining unit at the Madison Heights plant since that plant's inception, and has been covered by the collective-bargaining agreements mentioned above. At negotiations beginning on 20 September 1983 for a new agreement at Madison Heights, Respondent proposed to "transfer electron beam welder classification to salaried status" this term being considered by the Union and Respondent to denote outside the bargaining unit. Respondent, at contract negotiations in prior years, had made similar proposals to no avail, meeting consistent union resistance, and little discussion occurred on 20 September. At the next session on 22 September Respondent's minutes show that it sought to place the job classification among those excluded from the bargaining unit as described in the parties' local collective-bargaining agreement, again without success. After the two efforts plainly designed to exclude the job classification en haec verba from the unit failed, Respondent next proposed in later September and October meetings to exclude the incumbent unit employee in that position, Don Doctor, by transferring him to a salaried status—out of the bargaining unit where he could perform other duties, as well as training an upgrader to do the EBW work as a unit employee, and be available for EBW work himself. Respondent's minutes reflect the Union's refusal to "put the EBW on salary"—which is to say exclude the classification from the unit.

The continued negotiations on this subject, as well as Respondent's representative's comments concerning the proposal, evidence the importance attached to it in these negotiations. Thus, in explaining the value to the company in being able to continue EBW operations during a strike because they were profitable, Industrial Relations Director Donald Houser during 13 October negotiations stated the proposal to have EBW incumbent Doctor on salary and out of the unit was a very important strikeable issue for the Company. The Union's opposition to such proposal was equally adamant.

2. Respondent's final offer

On 2 and 3 November the parties continued negotiations but deadlocked on Respondent's "final" offer to the Union, which Industrial Relations Director Houser told the Union contained five "hang tough" issues. Among these five issues covered by Respondent's package, "indivisible" offer was the following proposal concerning EBW:

> Article IX
> Add new paragraph as follows:
> > the regular work formerly performed by the Electron Beam Welder Operator Set Up and Operate Leader Classification shall, at the discretion of the Company, be performed outside the bargaining unit. The person formerly holding that classification shall be transferred out of the unit.

Larry Smith, an International representative for the Union assigned to service the Madison plant bargaining unit and a member of the negotiating committee, testified without contradiction that he informed Houser the Union could not agree with the EBW proposal—or the other four proposals—and since Houser had informed the Union the five-item proposal was a final (and) package one, the committee could not recommend it to the union membership and, "We were prepared to strike at midnight." Thomas Butler, president of the Madison plant local union, testified that Smith told Houser, "there was no way we could accept the beam welder job going to salary."

Respondent's written final proposal excluded all the EBW work from the unit, at Respondent's discretion, and the only incumbent unit employee holding that position, Don Doctor, thus effectively eliminating the EBW job classification, curtailing the established bargaining unit composition, and depriving the affected employees of union representation. One can say the proposal, if implemented, was tantamount to Respondent's withdrawing recognition of the EBW job classification from the Union, subject to Respondent's sole unilateral right or discretion, for there would be nothing of substance or value left to the job classification stripped of an EBW employee or EBW work to be performed. Cf. San Antonio Portland Cement Co., 277 NLRB 309, 313–315 (1985). This being the case, I find that Respondent's offer concerned a permissive subject of bargaining, the elimination from the bargaining unit of the EBW job classification, and consequent reduction in the composition and scope of the established collective-bargaining unit. Newspaper Production Co., 503 F.2d 821, 828 (5th Cir. 1974).

The notion posed by Respondent on brief that an earlier agreed-on "upgrader EBW" position to be in the unit is contrary to any Respondent intention to remove the EBW job classification from the unit via the Respondent's 2 and 3 November EBW proposal is without merit. Respondent's own director of industrial relations, Donald Houser, testified that he posted an upgrader letter—not previously agreed on by the Union as to content—for employee bids "so we'd be ready if Doctor (the sole incumbent of the EBW job classification) was promoted and allowed to perform the work," the latter reference to the need for agreement by the Union to the two-part earlier proposal by Respondent involving Doctor's transfer out of the unit and an upgrader classification being created, described above. Because the Union never agreed to such proposal, viz, removing Doctor from the unit, and the posting, as admitted by Houser, was conditional on such agreement by the Union to the entire proposal, there simply never was an established upgrader classification position. Further confirming this view is the testimony by Union Representative Butler, the Madison plant local union president. He testified that he recalled as of the date of Respondent's final EBW proposal, set forth above on 2 and 3 November, that the Company had dropped the "upgrader aspect" and was just going to make Doctor salaried, that this was the hang-tough issue—the salaried status (outside the unit) of the EBW classification—and further that the Union had never agreed to the posting of an upgrader letter. In this context, references to an alleged assignment—never completed or carried out at any time relevant—of a future upgrader position and an employee grievance over such selected future candidate has no persuasive force for the simple reason that Respondent's final offer regarding its EBW proposal made no reference whatsoever to the upgrader classification, a matter reasonably viewed as both integral to the EBW classification problem and one which would reasonably have been discussed or offered for formalization in the article 9 proposed addition had Respondent intended to make it a part of the proposal. In fact, as noted, the plain language in the proffered new addition to article 9 puts the performance of all regular EBW work outside the unit at the Company's discretion, as well as the unit employee holding the EBW position. The proposal simply renders the upgrader matter a nonissue.

On brief Respondent further urges that case law involving proposals to allow the assignment to work outside the unit by former unit personnel promoted to supervisory positions holds that such proposals are mandatory subjects of bargaining concerning the assignment of work rather than changes in the scope of the unit. The cases cited by Respondent, one involving a subcontracting issue, Fry Foods, Inc., 241 NLRB 76 (1976), and the others involving the employer's right to appoint supervisory personnel are readily distinguishable from the instant case, where the issue from the start in negotiations was the elimination of the EBW job classification from the unit to a "salaried" or excluded status just to protect the Respondent from loss of profits from the EBW operation during a strike. Unlike other cases cited by Respondent, Tesoro Petroleum, 192 NLRB 354 (1971), being representative, the Respondent proposal here did not involve an employer's right to make nondiscriminatory supervisory promotions of personnel who continued to perform bargaining unit work. There was, here, no probative evidence to support Respondent's alleged "intent" to promote Doctor to supervisor or any evidence he ever became a supervisor at times relevant to appraising the nature of Respondent's final EBW proposal on 2 and 3 November which nowhere makes reference to such promotion, stating only in this respect that "the person formerly holding that classification shall be transferred out of the unit." Moreover, Respondent's proposal specifically called for all the EBW classification work being performed outside the bargaining unit, so that the result would not be analogous to a situation where the classification continued to exist but some of the work was being performed by supervisors excluded from the unit. Here, both the work and its performance would be outside the unit, so Respondent's proposal, rather than relating to the amount of EBW work which the bargaining unit would perform, sought to remove it entirely from the unit and thereby constituted bargaining over a type of work which historically had defined the bargaining unit with the forseeable result: altering the composition of the bargaining unit.

Analysis

As recently observed with Board affirmance (citing Newport News Shipbuilding v. NLRB, 602 F.2d 73, 77–78 (4th Cir. 1979)):

> The Board agrees that, unless transfers are specifically prohibited by the relevant collective bargaining agreement, an employer may transfer work out of the bargaining unit, as long as the employer first bargains in good faith and is not motivated by anti-union animus. [End of Respondent's quote.] See University of Chicago v. NLRB, 514 F.2d 942, 949 (7th Cir. 1975); accord, Boeing Co. v. NLRB, 581 F.2d 793, 797 (9th Cir. 1978). It does not follow, however, that an employer, under the guise of the transfer of unit work, may alter the composition of the bargaining unit. To do so would not only modify the job functions of the various unit members but also affect their right to representation. Thus, implicit in the requirement that the employer bargain in good faith before changing unit work is the assumption that the affected member of the unit be represented. [Emphasis added.]

Idaho Statesman, 281 NLRB 272, 275–277 (1986). For these further reasons, I conclude Respondent's proposal concerned a nonmandatory subject of bargaining. Idaho Statesman, ibid.; Newspaper Printing Corp., 232 NLRB 291, 292 (1977); Kobler Co., 273 NLRB 1508 (1985); and Farlas Meat Co. I, 239 NLRB 1396 (1979).

It also is clear, and I conclude, that Respondent insisted on the EBW proposal as part of an indivisible "must item" in a package containing five hang-tough items under circumstances reasonably leading to the perception that its agreement to a contract was conditioned on the Union's acceptance, and thus that Respondent had insisted in the face of continued, detailed union opposition on such proposals to the point of impasse over, inter alia, the nonmandatory EBW proposal. Indeed, by letter dated 9 November 1983 to the chairman of the Union's bargaining committee Industrial Relations Director Houser, long experienced in the field of labor relations, referred to the parties' "current impasse," and there was no doubt that, as clearly described by Houser, the Respondent's EBW proposal was a strikeable issue for the Company, a characterization unwithdrawn—indeed further confirmed—on the very eve of the strike. Accordingly, it is concluded that Respondent insisted to impasse on a nonmandatory subject as a condition or prerequisite to an agreement on mandatory subjects—the EBW proposal being "indivisible" from them thereby violating its collective-bargaining obligations under Section 8(a)(5) of the Act.

The conclusion that these parties were at impasse on 3 November takes into account more than just the gut-wrenching slowness and lack of any progress on Respondent's final offer that evening and in the early morning hours. Also considered is the Respondent's recognized right to engage in hard bargaining—oftentimes accompanied by the use of so-called final proposals. However, in this instance, Respondent's own description of its proposals as "final," consisting of "must" proposals which the Company viewed as "strikeable" are more than window dressing dramatics given the bone-chilling prelude to negotiations in September when Respondent announced it had to have economic recoveries, at which time the parties' effort at bargaining bogged down in what developed into a long-lasting, vexatious dispute, discussed further below, over Respondent's alleged refusal to provide information concerning the need for such recoveries. Also preceding the 2 and 3 November final negotiations before the violence-characterized strike, the Respondent removed equipment and machinery from the Madison Heights plant it proposed to relocate. This job-destroying action infused still greater tension and obstinacy in the parties' attitudes against an agreement, except on terms deemed more favorable by each. Indeed, it was just such action which propelled Madison plant employees to strike authorization procedures preceding the 2 and 3 November negotiations, followed by still further strike authorization efforts in the course of those negotiations including, as noted, the EBW dispute. It is not, in the sense of present analysis, relevant whether Respondent had the right to do these things, but it is instructive as to the likely effect—a bad one I believe—such circumstances had on the parties' efforts to negotiate an agreement and the question, whether there were any reasonable prospects for such to occur. This is because it has long been established that "the contemporaneous understanding of the parties as to the state of the negotiations [are all] relevant to be considered in deciding whether an impasse in bargaining existed." Taft Broadcasting Co., 163 NLRB 475, 478 (1967), petition for review denied 395 F.2d 622 (D.C. Cir. 1968). Further supporting this pessimistic view is the fact that the parties were confronting still again their age-old dispute over putting the EBW out of the unit and the view of the Union's representative on the striker's eve that the Union was being asked to make all the movement in the negotiations without concessions being advanced by the Company—again the truth behind such a statement not being wholly controlling but nevertheless revealing the cause and fact of hardened positions of the parties on that date. In addition the Union must have been further hardened against expecting any agreement by Respondent's efforts to reduce paid union representation time for unit employees, as by the Union's described perception that the Respondent raised subjects on 2 and 3 November which the Union believed had already been agreed on by the parties in earlier negotiations. Frankly, those very bleak and discouraging circumstances leave no room to conclude that there was even a glimmer of hope the parties could reach an agreement, and as characterized by the Respondent's own Industrial Relations Director Houser later, amply support the conclusion they were at impasse. Newport News Shipbuilding Co., 236 NLRB 1637, 1643 (1978); Taft Broadcasting Co., 274 NLRB 260, 261 (1985); Idaho Statesman, supra; Newspaper Printing Corp. supra; and Bozzuto's Inc., 277 NLRB 977 (1985).

The importance of the EBW issue to the parties in this case has already been highlighted. It was a bone of contention in every contract negotiation since the Madison plant started operations. So important was it to the Madison plant unit members that, according to incumbent EBW operator Donald Doctor, when the upgrader letter was posted seeking candidates for a "future transfer" (conditioned on the Union agreeing to transfer Doctor out of the unit as a "working supervisor" who would on occasion perform the work—which the Union never agreed to) "about half the plant bid on it" because it was a good job involving a lot of overtime work. Union Representative Larry Smith, as corroborated by the testimony of Madison plant Local President Butler, told Respondent's representatives on the eve of the strike there was no way the Union would agree to the loss of the EBW position from the unit and, while Industrial Relations Director Houser denied this intention at the hearing, where he described the Union's representatives as being "confused" over the Company's position—which he described as merely seeking Doctor's placement outside the unit where he could perform EBW work as "necessary," the cold reality in Respondent's written final, must, hang-tough, strikeable indivisible proposal stated otherwise, according sole discretion to Respondent on the subject and effectively removing the EBW from the unit.

C. Contributing Cause of the Madison Plant Strike

Smith kept higher union levels aware of the Respondent's position on EBW on the evening of 2 November as part of impending strike authorization developments; in addition, it is clear that the EBW proposal—along with the other four items in the Respondent's final offer, which Houser informed Smith "could not be picked apart"—constituted a linchpin to an agreement being reached for. When the Union informed Houser it could not agree to any one of the proposals, let alone all five of them, in a kind of mutual understanding it was understood that negotiations could go no further in the face of the Respondent's final offer, with the parties being in a strike mode, with Smith hoping it would be a clean strike, and with Houser asking if there would be any problem with salaried employees crossing the line. At that moment there can be no reasonable dispute that the strike was caused, in significant part, by the Respondent's unlawful conduct in insisting to impasse on its EBW proposal. The union bargaining team consisted of Madison plant employee representatives, the full plant shop committee, as well as International Representative Smith, reacting on the very heels of the impasse involving, inter alia, the EBW matter with the announcement of a strike, which took place the morning of 3 November at the Madison plant. Consistent with the bargaining committee's actions, the Madison plant employees voted 87 to 3 in confirming rejection of Respondent's contract proposals on 6 November at a local union meeting where they were informed beforehand in writing and by speakers concerning the EBW issue, including a specific communication by Local Union President Butler that the Company's proposal insisted on EBW going salaried [out of the unit]. (G.C. Exh. 207.) Butler also testified in this connection to, "the EBW, the classifications, were the thorns in the side," and recalls one employee exclaiming "there'd be no way they'd accept a salary job on the beam welder." It is true that an earlier strike authorization at the Madison plant on 11 October 1983 made no mention of the EBW issue—but this would not militate against the causal connection finding because it was not until 2 November that Respondent proposed and unlawfully insisted on, the EBW proposal discussed above about which the parties had a long and continuing dispute, described as "strikeable." Furthermore, while it is also true that other issues were present and in a block prevented the parties from reaching agreement thereby triggering a strike, it is readily apparent that the EBW issue contributed significantly to the employees' decision and action to strike on 3 November 1983, and I so find. Accordingly, it is concluded that the strike at the Madison plant was an unfair labor practice strike from its inception. Newport News Shipbuilding, 236 NLRB 1637 (1978), enfd. 602 F.2d 73 (4th Cir. 1979); Tarlas Meat Co., supra; C & E Stores, 221 NLRB 1321 (1976), enfd. 611 F.2d 654 (6th Cir. 1979).

Respondent urges further on brief that, even assuming its proposal was a permissive subject of bargaining, it was privileged to insist on the Union's concurrence as a condition of Respondent's agreement to a contract because the Union had not refused to negotiate over the proposal and had even discussed it with Respondent, citing the Board's adoption of the administrative law judge's decision in Inner City Broadcasting Corp., 270 NLRB 1230 (1984). This contention is without merit. The record shows that the Union rejected out of hand Respondent's written proposal to eliminate the EBW classification from the bargaining unit as found during discussion of Respondent's final offer package on 2 and 3 November. There was never any "bargaining" over that proposal in its final form by the Union. Even putting aside the factual mischaracterization, Respondent's cited authority also fails to support its assertion. In the Inner City Broadcasting Corp., case, supra, the respondent there, unlike here, did not demand that its proposal be adopted by the union once the latter refused unequivocally to discuss the subject, hence no insistence to impasse was found to have occurred. Here, the record is clear that the Union rejected any proposal to put EBW outside the unit, to have EBW "go salaried" from the first time such proposal was advanced, and yet Respondent persisted in seeking such change in three proposals, including its final one. (G.C. Exh. 44-B; G.C. Exh. 47; G. Exh. 55, art. 9.) Thus factually the cited case is inapposite to the present case. Finally, there is grave doubt the Respondent's asserted legal principle has any life to it given the Board's rejection of such theory in both American Stores Packing Co., 277 NLRB 1656, 1658 fn. 7 (1986); and its later affirmance of the decision of the administrative law judge in Idaho Statesmen, supra at 275. In American Stores Packing Co., supra at fn. 7, the Board notes:

> Although we find it unnecessary to pass on whether an employer has any duty to furnish information about a permissive subject once it has voluntarily bargained about it, the Supreme Court has held that a permissive subject does not become a mandatory subject merely because the parties have bargained about it. Chemical Workers v. Pittsburgh Glass Co., 404 U.S. 157, 187 (1971). Further, the Supreme Court has stated that "each party is free to bargain or not to bargain and to agree or not to agree" about permissive subjects of bargaining. NLRB v. Borg-Warner Corp., 356 U.S. 342, 349 (1958).

Given the foregoing, Respondent's contention is rejected.

D. Respondent's Refusal to Provide Financial Information

At the outset in negotiations during a meeting on 23 August 1983 called by Respondent and attended by the parties' representatives for collective bargaining, Respondent told the Union that it was suffering at the three plants from a competitive disadvantage based on wages and benefits paid by its competitors, and that it was suffering at the Madison Heights and Elmira plants from a greater competitive disadvantage in terms of wages and benefits than was the case at the Detroit plant. Union Representative Jim Ellis, assistant to UAW's vice president, testified without contradiction that the purpose of the meeting was for the Company to review and update its status and to tell the Union that they were in "bad shape." Ellis testified that Robert Childress, then vice president of industrial relations, informed the union representatives the three operations needed some relief, specifically wage reliefs to become competitive. Childress did not deny Ellis' testimony and stated the Company was "extremely concerned" about insurance costs and its need for competitive wage rates, notifying the Union on 15 September 1983 that the local (the Union) was to discuss recoveries and the wage rates needed by the Company including ending the 8-cent bonus at Elmira and the recovery (reduction) of other wages.

Just how serious that concern was is shown by negotiations on 28 September, 31 October, and 2 November, during which the Company linked continuation of operations at the Madison Heights plant to obtaining competitive costs via economic concessions from the Union. (G.C. Exhs. 32, 47, and 54.) In fact, the Company announced the contemplated closing of the Madison Heights plant in a letter to employees dated 13 December 1983 where the Company advised employees that despite a record net income of $4.2 million the past years, inter alia:

> For the past few years the Elmira plant has lost money or been only marginally profitable. The Madison Heights plant has been marginally profitable for the past two years. Your plant, (Detroit) made a contribution to our record net income this past year.
> We are planning to close the Madison Heights plant in the near future. [G.C. Exh. 9.]

1. The Union's request for information

On 14 December UAW International Representative John Mando wrote to Facet's president and chief operating officer, James R. Malone, recounting the Company's repeated contention in negotiations that it needed takeaways (reductions in current wages and benefits) because of an alleged need to become competitive, and requesting information concerning the three plants in the bargaining unit to verify and assess the truth of the Company's claim so that the Union, in turn could "evaluate [its] current position and to be able to respond to the Company's proposals." The letter requested access to books, records, accounts, and supporting schedules, as well as income statements for the last 3 full years (Respondent's letter dated 13 December 1983, it should be recalled, told employees the Elmira plant had lost money and had been only marginally profitable the past 4 years), Federal income tax returns for the same period, interim income statements and supporting schedules, cost and price information for any intercompany transfers of products, and consolidate income statements where applicable. (G.C. Exh. 10.)

Respondent sent the Union a reply on 19 December promising to consider the request and outline its position in future correspondence. (G.C. Exh. 11.) On 22 December Facet Attorney Fishman, deeply involved in hands-on bargaining responsibilities on Respondent's behalf, wrote the Union two letters, one announcing another contemplated plant closing this time, the Detroit plant, and the other replying to the Union's request for financial information, discussed more fully below. (The plant-closing letter is referred to in Union Counsel Page's letter to Fishman (G.C. Exh. 13), also dated 22 December and not disputed in this proceeding. The second letter, again dated 22 December, is in the record as G.C. Exh. 12.) In the Respondent's reply letter (G.C. Exh. 12) regarding the financial information request, Respondent does not deny the stated reasons which prompted the Union's request, namely, Respondent's stated need to become competitive by achieving economic concessions from the Union lowering employees' wages and benefits in any new contract.

2. Respondent's obligation to provide the information

Given the foregoing, including the Company's oft-repeated need to become competitive in its business, but also its reference to "losing money," "marginal profitability," its self-described "suffering" from competitive disadvantages, and the "need" for wage reliefs and other economic recoveries, and its being again, as self-described, "extremely concerned" about those needs, to the point where plant survivals were linked to economic recoveries (reductions in employees' wages and other benefits) followed by actual announcements of contemplated closing, I find that the Respondent was expressing an inability to afford to pay its employees the existing wages and benefits in support of its proposals seeking economic recoveries, thereby under law, assuming the obligation to disclose on the Union's request supporting information, rather than merely expressing an "unwillingness" to continue current wage and benefit levels which would not impose any such duty. Nielson Lithographing Co., 279 NLRB 877, 880 (1986), citing Advertisers Mfg. Co., 275 NLRB 100 (1985); Harvstone Mfg. Corp., 272 NLRB 939 (1984), and cases cited therein; and Atlanta Hilton & Tower, 271 NLRB 1600 (1984). As stated by the judge in Harvstone, supra at 944:

> Against the background instruction of the Supreme Court, presumably enunciated to be heeded, that "if . . . an argument is important enough to present in the give and take of bargaining, it is important enough to require some sort of proof of its accuracy" (NLRB v. Truitt Mfg. Co., 351 U.S. 149, 152–153 (1956)), the Board has held that it is unnecessary to use the talismanic word "poverty" in order to trigger the requirement of fair substantiation of a plea of economic necessity during collective bargaining. Thus, in Cincinnati Cordage Co., 141 NLRB 72 (1963), the Board held that an employer's resistance to a wage increase demand on the stated ground that it could not remain "competitive" with other employers in the industry, constituted a "poverty" plea since in effect the employer was contending that granting of the demands would "lead to impoverishment" (id. at 77), requiring the furnishing of supporting data. To the same effect, see Teleprompter Corp. v. NLRB, 570 F.2d 4 (1st Cir. 1977); Stockton District Kidney Bean Growers, 165 NLRB 223 (1967); Wheeling Pacific Co., 151 NLRB 1192, 1224–1225 (1965); *NLRB v. >
> Respondents were thus under obligation to open their financial records to the Union to support their economic contentions and their failure to do so was inconsistent with their statutory duty to bargain in good faith.

3. Respondent's reply to the Union's request

Fishman wrote the Union on 22 December in reply, offering to make available only a current financial statement or one showing profit and loss, with the opportunity for verification by independent audit. Fishman described at length five conditions under which the "opportunity" for such an audit to verify the current financial statement would be governed: (1) restricting the examination to the Company's office or its accountant's office; (2) the examination to be conducted by a CPA selected by the Union's accountant but approved by Respondent's accountant; (3) costs to be paid by the Union; (4) the accountant so designated to work directly with the Company's accountant the latter making available the "necessary" company records and other information pertinent to such records and permitting the designated accountant to examine such records "to the extent necessary"; and finally (5) providing what the parties herein refer to as a "gag order."

4. The gag order in Respondent's proposal

The gag order in Respondent's proposal stated that:

> 5. The designated accountant is to be subject to a gag order forbidding the disclosure of details and permitting him only to advise the Union as to the accuracy of the facts, to explain only factors that would make the Employer's reports misleading and to explain or substantiate his conclusions. [Emphasis added. G.C. Exh. 12.]

In the ensuing communications between the parties, a 22 December letter to Fishman from Union Counsel Page explained that more than a single current financial statement was needed and pointed out that the Union had requested access to financial information for the past 3 years, a request left unaddressed by Fishman's reply on 22 December to its 14 December request amounting to the reasonable inference on this record that he denied the request. Further, Page explained that the 3-year span in information was necessary in order to discover any unusual financial occurrences arbitrarily allocated to one fiscal year, but stated a willingness to go forward with a review of current financial statements rather than delaying the audit of past years' statements. Page accepted conditions one, two, and four and with a reservation on interpretation, paragraph 3, concerning division of expenses. He told Fishman that the Union was unable to agree to the gag order as it constituted in effect a prior restraint on its access to relevant information unknown to it until after a fully disclosed audit and further prevented the Union from ensuring that a thorough examination would be made. (G.C. Exh. 13.) Page assured Fishman that no information given to the Union by the designated accountant would become public or be made available to any Facet competitor. Fishman, without referring to Page's asserted reasons in opposition refused an audit without the gag order. (G.C. Exh. 15.)

The Union pressed its request for access to the requested information without the gag order restriction in a letter from Page to Fishman on 4 January 1984, pointing to the still greater urgency behind its request because of an impending decision under which it understood Respondent intended to close the Detroit plant by mid-January and urging Respondent to consider using union accountant Bruce DeCastro to make the audit. Page informed Fishman that DeCastro had made an earlier audit in 1980 of the three plants in connection with a company effort to reduce pension costs. Thus not only could he "update" the records he had examined, but also, due to his familiarity with the recordkeeping system, do the task with dispatch. In addition, Respondent would have the assurance of past confidentially honored by the Union on the occasion of that audit, as well as the Union's present assurances in that regard. The Union so proposed, while agreeing to consider an independent accountant if Respondent explained the need for one under the circumstances described. Page further supported the Union's view of the unworkability of the gag order by stating, as another example, that the Union needed to know how pension plan costs, in the time since the agreement was reached, had been allocated among the three plants before it could evaluate the accuracy of the Respondent's assertions and claims that the Madison Heights and Elmira operations were marginally profitable. (G.C. Exh. 160.) On 5 January Fishman wrote Page confirming a telephone conversation—the latter described as occurring 4 January—during which Page assertedly declined the proposed audit (G.C. Exh. 18); no reply to Page's letter of 4 January, its concerns, or its offer, was submitted into the record, and, on 24 January 1984 Engel wrote Fishman noting that Fishman had ignored the UAW's position on the Respondent's limited, conditional offer of an audit on 22 December. In her letter (G.C. Exh. 20), Engel stated she would expand further on why the limited disclosure procedure was defective and prevented the disclosure of information sufficient to allow meaningful bargaining. She included the fact that a "current statement" does not indicate whether it would be for a month or the most recently completed fiscal year; that a report over the last contract period was in order, especially since in that period, the effects of a settlement permitting the termination of the hourly person plan would have surfaced giving the Union information on the impact and sayings on the plants' performance; she pointed to the uncertainty over the gag order limitations placed on the designated accountant, who was unable, it appeared, to disclose any details on the operations to the Union's negotiators, and specified that a report from the accountant was necessary in order for the Union to bargain effectively—the report spelling out the performance of the three plants over the last 3 years analyzing the causes of any "red ink" and what part, if any, bargaining unit labor costs played in any losses. Further underscoring the need for such specifics Engel listed other numerous factors bearing on the need for details connected to how the Respondent assigned (economic) "burden factors" among plants, and contrasting grim/rosy economic predictions by company representatives concerning the future financial strength of the Company. (G.C. Exh. 20.)

Fishman called Engel's letter both specious in content and tone, "as well as ridiculous" and offered a "compromise" in a letter on 3 February under which if, after the audit the designated accountant is desirous (note it is he or she who must harbor the desire) of further explaining his conclusions then the company accountant, the designated accountant, and DeCastro (the Union's accountant) will seek a mutually agreed-on resolution or, failing that, the parties will discuss it further. (G.C. Exh. 23.) The "compromise" was rejected by Engel on 13 February as not remedying the Union's concerns with the gag order as identified to Respondent on prior occasions over the provision of information necessary for intelligent and meaningful bargaining. (G.C. Exh. 29.)

According to the undenied testimony of UAW Official Jim Ellis, the record shows that on numerous occasions in January 1984, in addition to those outlined above, the Union requested clarification or modification of the terms used in the gag order, only to be told by Fishman that the Union had his letter of 22 December (the letter setting forth Respondent's proposal on a limited audit procedure). Aside from a caustic and obviously sarcastic 24 January 1984 letter (G.C. Exh. 19) defining the literal definition of the terms—dictionary-like—in Fishman's gag order proposal, no elucidating helpful reply was ever given to the Union, nor did the compromise offer anything productive in the situation confronting the parties. (G.C. Exh. 23.)

5. Analysis of Respondent's offer

Not unexpectedly in my view—given the tortoise-like movement in the parties' fact-starved negotiations and the Respondent's attention-grabbing announcements of impending fatalities of plant operations at Detroit and Madison Heights which resulted on the hardening of attitudes and positions—events simply overtook the parties in this case and the information requests receded from the forefront of bargaining as the strike wound down, ending in mid-February 1984.

Whether or not Respondent's providing the requested information would have made any difference to the outcome here, where eventually both plant forces of employees lost their employment when the plants reportedly closed by August 1984, will never be known, because the offer of very limited information in a restricted procedure burdened by Respondent with layers of expectedly partisan interfacing—and thus time-consuming—delays led to rejection of the offer. For that rejection, I find Respondent fully responsible.

An employer, under an obligation to provide information, of course need not provide such information in the precise format or on the exact terms requested by the union, so long as it furnishes the sought-after data in a manner not so burdensome or time-consuming as to impede the process of bargaining. United Aircraft Corp., 192 NLRB 382, 389 (1971), citing Lasko Metal Product, Inc., 148 NLRB 976, 979 (1964). Moreover, an employer is free to limit its production, depending on access-governing relevancy to the issues before the negotiating parties, in order to withhold or restrict disclosure to third parties of, for example, information as to the identification of its buyers and sellers, and officer's salaries. Yakima Frozen Food, 130 NLRB 1269 (1961); and Manitowoc Co., 186 NLRB 994 (1970). As stated in American Stores Packing Co., supra, 277 NLRB at 1675, citing Teleprompter Corp. v. NLRB, 570 F.2d 4 (1st Cir. 1977):

> Moreover the court in Teleprompter stated that an employer's plea of a poverty or financial inability did not "trigger carte blanche discovering rights," but rather the union is entitled to what is "reasonably necessary to permit a union to make a meaningful evaluation, from its members' perspective, of the claim of financial inability."

Relying on Yakima, supra, and a claim of "confidentiality," however, Respondent asserts its proffered conditions on access and insistence thereon met its good-faith bargaining duties. The latter defense, "confidentially" for which Respondent offered no support is rejected on its face as specious, a conclusion even further warranted by the uncontroverted fact that Respondent in 1980 gave the Union free access to the same books and records the Union was willing to accept and examine—on an updated basis for its purposes in 1983 and 1984, the present negotiations without reference from any source in this record that the early confidences were betrayed—or that written assurances of confidentiality by the union attorneys regarding their use of the information would be unkept. Absent any "valid overriding reason for non-disclosure of this information" the defense is found meritless. Boise Cascade Corp., 279 NLRB 422, 431 fn. 26 (1986).

The Respondent set numerous preconditions on the Union's access to any information which had to be met by Respondent's satisfaction before intelligent bargaining could proceed. Those conditions created by their very complexity a serious question whether such negotiations would ever ensue on the problems requiring enlightenment, let alone permit progress on the serious, rapidly developing plant closing and contract-type related issues requiring the parties' prompt attention. Respondent's requirement that the examination be conducted by a CPA selected by the Union but "approved" by Respondent is simply a thinly disguised play on words suggesting deference to the Union's rights in such matter, but in actuality according Respondent a virtual power to veto such union selection until an accountant meeting the Respondent's approval, for unspecified reasons it should be noted, was nominated. The requirement by an employer that it retain the authority to select the designated accountant—which I find Respondent as a practical matter insisted on here—is inconsistent with good-faith bargaining under Board law, St. Joseph's Hospital, 269 NLRB 862 (1984), the theory being that someone other than the employees' selected collective-bargaining representative is being forced to represent the employees' interest without the latter's consent. It is axiomatic, and far from speculative given their demonstrated distrust on this record, that the ratification procedure also posed an obvious time-consuming snare to the parties' efforts to negotiate.

The second defect, more serious, is Respondent's insistence on supplying the Union only with a "current" financial statement when it was Respondent who put into issue the contention in its 13 December 1983 letter to employees while negotiating with the Union that it had been losing money for the past 4 years at Elmira or had been only marginally profitable there, and Madison Heights had been only marginally profitable the past 2 years. Respondent's limitations in access to only a "current" statement therefore fell short of being an adequate disclosure of information reasonably necessary to the Union for intelligent bargaining regarding an issue Respondent itself raised in support of its proposal to reduce employee wages. It follows from this, that the never-defined "opportunity" which Respondent's proposal allowed the Union for verification by an independent audit, being also restricted to the also not-defined "current statement"—whether a monthly, quarterly, or annual statement not being indicated by Respondent and thereby posing another time-consuming ambiguity—is likewise inadequate to bargaining needs. These deficiencies regarding definitions noted above and further below, were real concerns raising questions as to how the audit would proceed, rather than speculative deficiencies as Union Counsel Page reminded Fishman, that more than a current statement on finances was needed and UAW Counsel Engel questioned Respondent counsel regarding such concerns only to be referred to the letter originally proposing the audit, without clarification. Fishman never responded to the Union's contentions that a statement limited to a 1-year period did not suffice.

The Respondent's proposal contained an internal restriction as well, permitting only a review by the designated accountant as noted into a severely limited area, regarding accuracy of the fact, factors that would make the reports misleading, and to substantiate his conclusions. This limited inquiry, as noted by Respondent's own witness accountant, Peter H. Burgher, would not show inventory adjustments, or allocation charges, or as UAW accountant Larry Mishel testified, the statement might show—and the audit verify—the fact of losses, but not the why and how the Union might respond with proposals based on the operative facts. For example, there could be nonrecurring losses on the current statements not fairly calling for Respondent's economic recoveries, the allocation of debt interest charges among all of Respondent's plants would be germane to the question of whether the "loss" at a single plant warranted employee concessions, the allocation of bargaining unit type costs would also be germane to proposed bargaining unit benefit reductions, and the tax returns requested by the Union would be necessary to determine depreciation allocation, whether unusual tax losses had occurred, and the consistency in recordkeeping systems.

It is readily apparent that the gag on the designated accountant, while under the Respondent's proposal allowing an explanation or substantiation of his conclusions regarding the accuracy of the figures shown, or plainly "misleading" in nature, would not permit the Union to discuss the details behind his conclusions and analyze for itself the economic inability of the plants to determine whether a concession on wages would be worthwhile as helpful to shoring up the Respondent's financial condition or futile if the facts showed otherwise, or indeed whether any concession at all was warranted. Labor costs, for example, have been held germane and therefore discloseable. NLRB v. Western Wirebound Box Co., 356 F.2d 88 (9th Cir. 1966). In short much other relevant information tied to the issues raised by Respondent lay outside the scope of inquiry allowed by Respondent's proposal, which did not permit, under the gag as further example, the Union to bargain intelligently about the relative survivability and economic condition or competitiveness of the three plants. In her letter of 24 January 1984 to Fishman (G.C. Exh. 20) Union Counsel Engel explained why the inhibited accountant would be of no use to the Union, which needed a report on his findings spelling out the performance of the facility over the last 3 years and analyzing the cause of any red ink reported by the plants, including what part if any labor costs played in any losses. In short, there was a tightly limited restriction on what the accountant could discuss with the Union which was, as noted, limited to a narrow scope of inquiry to begin with.

Respondent also rejected the Union's substantially reduced request for information limited only to a look at the same books Respondent allowed the Union to examine in 1980, updated to 1983, without advancing any reason for such refusal, then or at this hearing, which in my view left the Union to feel its way in the dark as best it could to represent employees in contract negotiations, and placed a blind man's bluff-like burden on the Union without the light from the requested information. I find its entire course of conduct regarding the Union's request for financial information, which Respondent continued to withhold, sharply inconsistent with its good-faith bargaining obligations under the Act and therefore a violation of Section 8(a)(5) of the Act. Metlox Mfg. Co. v. NLRB, 378 F.2d 728 (9th Cir. 1967), cert. denied 389 U.S. 1037 (1968); Washington Star Co., 273 NLRB 391 (1984); Mashkin Freight Line, 272 NLRB 427 (1984). Respondent's reliance on the Board's decision in Yakima Frozen Foods, supra, is without persuasive force as there the respondent employer offered to submit its books and records to a full audit by a CPA chosen by the union, the only restrictions being (1) that the CPA not be in the Union's regular employ; (2) information on the identity of seller and purchaser not be taken from the office; and (3) that any questions be directed to the employer's accountant. There were no limits imposed on the scope of the union's audit in that case, nor, the major distinguishing characteristic, was there any burdensome restriction on what the designated accountant could communicate to the union, unlike in the present case where not only was such a burden imposed but also a host of real barriers preventing the Union from access to the res gestae-like facts behind Respondent's inability to pay contention, unfairly preventing the Union from bargaining intelligently.

6. The Union's request for information concerning the transfer of jobs and machinery from the Detroit plant

An overview is helpful here. The parties began negotiations in late August and early September 1983 for a new master contract covering the three plants at Madison Heights, Detroit, and Elmira, New York. The strike ensued in early November and ended in February 1985 at which time striking employees offered to return to work. There is some brief reference in testimony, but no finding that by August 1984, the Detroit plant was closed and, by 30 September 1984, the Madison Heights plant, shut down in July, had also ceased operations.

7. Respondent's announcement on 13 December 1983

During the parties' negotiations over a host of unresolved matters in the above period, including the issue of strikers discharged for picket line misconduct, where I find Respondent unlawfully failed and refused to provide the Union with requested information, the Employer informed its employees on 13 December 1983 in a written memorandum that, inter alia, it must begin considering alternatives regarding the Detroit plant, and that due to a customer's request the "flame arrestor manufacturing line" had been moved out of the Detroit plant. Respondent also stated it might be forced to move out other lines of Detroit plant machinery as well. (G.C. Exh. 9.) By letter dated 22 December Respondent's counsel also informed the Union of the contemplated closing and relocation of the fuel devices of the Detroit plant operation. According to the undenied testimony of witness Sally Dorman, whose account in this respect is credited, E. J. Mullane, Detroit plant director of industrial relations informed Dorman, Vernette Ward, and Jerome McKenny on 24 November 1983, while the three were picketing, that the Detroit plant was moving out. Respondent does not deny either the communications or the fact that Detroit plant machinery was being shipped out in this period, and subsequent communications further confirm the fact.

8. Union's request for information

By letter dated 22 December 1983, Union Counsel Page wrote Respondent Counsel Fishman requesting information as follows: "What work has been moved out of the Detroit plant within the last year and where has it moved to?" (G.C. Exh. 13, par. 10.) During master contract negotiations in early January 1984 UAW Assistant Vice President Jim Ellis testified that during the discussions of the Detroit plant that the Union again requested information on what work had been moved out from the Detroit plant, Fishman once replying that the matter would be discussed in Detroit.

Fishman wrote Union Counsel Engel on 25 January 1984 referring to a request by Engel during 19 January negotiations for information regarding the type of work permanently or temporarily removed and the identification of the location to which the work was recovered, from the Detroit plant. The response was without nourishing facts, stating only that "no work has been permanently removed," "Facet has temporarily removed work," and that Fishman saw no right in the UAW to information regarding the temporarily removed work. (G.C. Exh. 21.) It is instructive to note that in this very period as will be discussed further, Respondent was making separate Detroit plant contract proposals and that the Detroit plant operations were highly significant in the parties' ongoing negotiations toward a master agreement. In fact the parties here stipulated that one of the actual bargaining proposals on the table, placed there by the Union, was that, inter alia, the Detroit plant work not be relocated during the term of any new agreement (Tr. 735). In a 28 January 1984 letter to Fishman, Union Counsel Page referred to still another Detroit plant information request in an earlier letter on 13 January and (in the 28 January letter) reminded Fishman about some of the Union's "outstanding requests for information which you have not yet answered," the number one item being:

> (1) As to the machinery and equipment that have been removed from the Detroit plant—where is it now and is it being used for production purposes and where is it going to be eventually relocated? [G.C. Exh. 22.]

The information request arose again at master agreement level negotiations on 6 and 7 February 1984 according to Ellis when Engel asked Fishman for a response to the union request, Fishman replying he did not know. Engel asked that the work be identified, and for information regarding where it had been sent, Fishman also replying repeatedly that the Company had a right to move some work out from Detroit and had done so, but providing no details.

As late as 27 February 1984 Respondent was still on notice that the Union was pursuing its request for the information via service of a charge filed by the Union with the Board's Reqional Office that date alleging that since on or about 1 March 1983 Respondent had violated the Act by, inter alia, failing and refusing to furnish information regarding, "(a) temporary removal or subcontracting of work from the Detroit plant." (G.C. Exh. 1(i).)

The record evidence shows that the Respondent refused to provide the requested information at any time, although in effect admitting to its possession as shown above.

The law is clear and well established that an employer has the duty to provide the union with information relevant and reasonably necessary to the union's representational or bargaining responsibilities, including contract negotiations, on request. Probable or even potential relevancy is all that is required. NLRB v. Truitt Mfg. Co., 351 U.S. 149 (1956); Acme Industrial Co., 385 U.S. 432 (1967); Curtiss-Wright Corp., 145 NLRB 152 (1963), enfd. 347 F.2d 61 (3d Cir. 1965); J. I. Case Co. v. NLRB, 253 F.2d 149 (7th Cir. 1958); and Western Massachusetts Electric Co., 228 NLRB 607 (1977). The Board has also held that where the requested information is about terms and conditions of employment of bargaining unit personnel, and is therefore presumptively relevant to the union's representational obligations, the union need not demonstrate its exact relevance where the company has not rebutted that presumption. Chicago Metallic Corp., 275 NLRB 871 (1985); Pfizer, Inc., 268 NLRB 916, 918 (1984); and Postal Service, 276 NLRB 1282, 1285 (1985). Although matters not lying directly within the core of bargaining unit employees' working conditions require a demonstration that there is the required relevance, the standard is the same liberal discovery-type standard in all cases. United Graphics, 281 NLRB 463, 465 (1986), citing Loral Electronic Systems, 253 NLRB 851, 853 (1980); and Curtiss-Wright Corp., supra.

The information requested here by the Union, as explained to Respondent numerous times, was to enable the Union to carry out its representational duty to "bargaining intelligently" on behalf of the bargaining unit employees during the course of bargaining on a wide range of topics including the status of the Detroit plant, where bargaining unit employees' work—employee-assigned plant machinery and jobs were leaving the plant under uncertain circumstances and conflicting reports from Respondent, whose representatives first informed employees the plant was closing and some machinery had already been sent out in December 1983, then later informed the Union no work had been sent out permanently, only "temporarily," in January 1984 followed subsequently by a complete cessation in Detroit plant operations in August after employees had returned to work in February, much of such communication and uncertainty arising in the course of contract negotiations as noted above and bringing the question even more to the forefront in negotiations.

Even without the perplexing confusion handicapping intelligent bargaining sought by the Union on this subject at negotiations, a needless impediment to any fair chance for bargaining which would be removed by the information's submission clarifying the matter, the further clear relevancy of the information regarding machinery, and thus work, removal from Detroit to the Union's performance of its statutory duties is readily apparent.

Section 9(a) of the Act provides in pertinent part, "Representatives designated or selected for the purposes of collective bargaining by the majority of the employees in a unit appropriate for such purposes, shall be the exclusive representatives of all the employees in such unit for the purposes of collective bargaining in respect to rates of pay, wages, hours of employment, or other conditions of employment." (Emphasis added.) Bargaining unit work is at the heart of the employee representative employer collective-bargaining relationship, and without machinery, and the connected jobs there is no "condition of employment" for employees whatsoever. It is self-evident that the matters about which the Union sought information fell well within the above statutory definitions. The need to take intelligent steps to preserve the work of unit employees, an area of union representational obligations about which the requested information clearly relates, has deeply imbedded roots in the labor relations history of collective bargaining in this Nation. As has been noted:

> In seeking this information, the Union was complying with its statutory obligation to represent its employees, so as to preserve the work that they regarded as their own. This concept of preserving work that employees regard as their own, has been exhibited in our industrial society since the origin of the industrial revolution, when cottage workers broke up factory machines in protest of losing work, down to the complex contractual and jurisdictional disputes of today. Board cases involving a union's effort to preserve work for its represented employees are legion. [International Harvester Co., 241 NLRB 600, 604 (1979), where the Respondent was ordered to produce the requested information.]

The Board has in many cases held that where, as here, the employees' bargaining agent has received information that the employer is removing unit work, or transferring it elsewhere, by subcontracting or otherwise, that the Union is entitled on request to information bearing on that issue, "so that the Union may properly represent the unit employees." Washington Star Co., 273 NLRB at 396 citing Westwood Import Co., 251 NLRB 1213 (1980), and Air Express International Corp., 245 NLRB 478 (1979). Respondent's view that it lawfully transferred or subcontracted out the work temporarily during the strike, and thus under Board law had no duty to disclose information concerning such action is a defense not factually established in the record and assumes not only that such information would be relevant to bargaining on that subject alone but also assumes facts to which it alone was privy, argues from the point of a self-made conclusion, and unilaterally precludes the Union from performing its duty to assess the facts and their effects on unit employees so as to engage in intelligent bargaining regarding the Detroit plant employees' then current and future conditions of employment. Furthermore, such a view puts the burden on the Union to establish that Respondent's actions were unlawful before it can be entitled to the information, a requirement at odds with the law. For, as stated by the Board, it is not necessary to find here that "the information sought is certainly relevant or clearly dispositive of the basic . . . issues between the parties [t]he fact that the information is of probable or potential relevance is sufficient." Westinghouse Electric Corp., 239 NLRB 106, 107 (1978). Respondent's view is therefore rejected. See Dane County Dairy, 273 NLRB 1711, 1712 (1985) (facts in defense not established); Sonat Marine, 279 NLRB 100, 106 (1986) (respondent reasoning in its defense from its own conclusion, and "Nowhere does the Act require that the Union must accept without any verification an employer claim [emphasis added] that bargaining unit employees are now out of the bargaining unit," citing Cherokee Culvert Co., 262 NLRB 917 (1982); Ground Breakers, 280 NLRB 146, 148 (1985), that the employer's view on the merits of an underlying dispute, even if probably correct would not be material on the question of whether the requested information should be furnished so "the Union can perform its function of representing employees" and Indiana Cabinet Co., 275 NLRB 1209, 1213 (1985), in which employer merely responded to Union's request that "there have been no intervening changes."

It is clear from the foregoing that the requested information is presumptively relevant to the performance of the Union's representational duties and I so find. Even assuming for the sake of argument that the subject matter lies further removed from the core in employment conditions under a stricter review of the meaning and definition of actual wages, hours, and other conditions of employment as adopted so that a demonstration of potential relevancy is required, such is established here. Thus the information is relevant to contract negotiations regarding the Detroit plant highlighted above, the question of work loss incurred by unit employees while on strike and on return to work at the strike's conclusion, the effects of the loss of work on the Detroit employees, whether the Union would seek to retain article 19 in the parties' collective-bargaining agreement for many years, covering movement of department or plants and according transfer rights to employees affected by movement of a department "or portion thereof,"[2] related grievance

[2] Art. XIX provides in pertinent part as follows:

Article XIX. Movement of Department or Plants: (108) In the event the Company elects to move a department, or major portion thereof, or plant covered by this Agreement to another plant of the Company also covered by this Agreement, employees who worked in such departments or plant who are out of work as a result of the transfer, may it so desire, within thirty (30) days elect to be transferred to the new plant and carry their ranking seniority to the new plant.

(109) Employees who so elect to be transferred to the new plant will receive the corresponding wage rate of the job classification to which they are assigned at the new plant for fifteen (15) days after which they will receive the top rate of such classification. If such filing, overall negotiating goals given the interconnected bargaining over the three-plant unit, and filing proceedings with the Board, a decision requiring knowledge whether the machinery was, in fact, permanently moved out as part of what then was a partial closing in the three-plant unit or rather was merely temporarily removed. For all these reasons, the information sought by the Union "was important in the performance of its representation duties" for it would be in a position, with the facts, to negotiate or take other action on behalf of unit employees it was charged to represent. Sonat Marine, supra at 106. Far from being of speculative value, or based on surmise, there is shown a real, urgent necessity in the Union's need for the information concerning the actual admitted movement of machinery and loss of work from the Detroit plant impacting on unit employees there if the Union was to be able to intelligently assess the situation and bargain with Respondent during the concurrent ongoing negotiations. Compare Southern Nevada Builders Assn., 274 NLRB 350 (1985). Accordingly, on the basis of the foregoing analysis and authorities cited, I conclude that Respondent unlawfully failed and refused to furnish the requested information thereby violating Section 8(a)(5) of the Act.

During negotiations on 9 or 10 January 1984 in Horseheads, New York, Respondent expressed to union representatives its intentions to discipline employees for violence on the picket line during the strike begun in early November 1983. Union counsel requested information on the number of employees involved, their identification and plant location, but was told by Respondent's vice president of industrial relations, Robert Childress—clearly an agent for Respondent—that it could not provide such information because the Company had no idea of the number or names. Respondent counsel, also present and active at negotiations on Facet's behalf, informed the Union that the matter was "still under investigation." By letter dated 28 January 1984, union counsel again requested the information but was told in a reply letter of 3 February by Attorney Fishman merely that the Company would not tolerate misconduct. (G.C. Exh. 24.) There is further undenied testimony by administrative assistant to Union Vice President Odessa Komar, Jim Ellis, that during negotiations on 8 February 1984 in New York, Union Counsel Betsy Engel specifically requested information from Respondent about how many employees were involved in the misconduct, what the charges were, and possible penalties under consideration. Fishman responded "he had no way of knowing." Arriving later in the evening Union Counsel Leonard Page also requested similar information from Respondent's negotiators but was merely told "they were still studying the tapes and investigating."

Union Staff Representative Walter Waller testified to a Detroit plant meeting attended by Waller, the industrial relations director at the Detroit plant E. J. Mullane—clearly an agent for Respondent—William Popadynec production manager—also on this record clearly a Respondent representative and agent—and Local Union President Tony Rahill in February, about the time striking employees were returning to work. Waller recalled asking the company representatives, in the course of several discussions over how the unconditional return of former strikers would be handled and who the employees were he had heard were accused of picket line misconduct. He says Mullane responded that the Company did have some employees under investigation but that when Waller asked how many Mullane said, "I'm not going to tell you how many, that's our business." When Waller asked whether Mullane could give him their names, Mullane told him he would not give him the names until after the Company notified them. Although a dispute arose at this hearing over the question whether Waller had made another request for the same information in February, Employer Representative Popadynec was not called on to deny Waller's testimony regarding the above, and Mullane was not brought forth to testify at all. Waller's account is credited.

Larry Smith, then an International union representative, testified that during a meeting with company representatives on 1 March 1984 he asked Facet's chief spokeman at local negotiations for the Madison Heights plant, Donald Houser, for the names of employees involved in the Company's picket line misconduct investigation but was told by Houser only that it was under investigation. Company co-counsel Frank Mamat told Smith the names of three employees under "serious investigation," indicating there were others as well: Harry Miller, Joe Scianimanico, and Harold Hall. When Smith asked about the circumstances, he testified he was told "they" did not want to talk about it any further, and when Smith asked when they would have the information he was told, "as soon as they could." On 15 or 19 March 1984 at another such meeting, Smith pressed the Union's request for information, asking if there was anything else he could learn. Houser merely told him the names of two employees already sent telegrams of recall, and three sent telegrams of discharge "for misconduct on the picket line and elsewhere." Smith again asked for "some particulars on it" and was told by Houser he hoped to have information within the next week or so. The General Counsel also established by Smith's undenied testimony concerning this meeting that Houser, referring to the strikers, some of whom were still under investigation who would be discharged (and had been discharged), said that he would waive time limits (in the parties' contract-established grievance procedures) on the Union's filing grievances over the firings, thereby establishing such grievances were fairly contemplated by the parties and further employees receive the top rate for the same job classification to which they are assigned at the new plant without a breaking-in period, they shall receive the top rate of pay for such classification at the new location.

(110) An employee whose seniority is transferred between plants pursuant to Paragraph (108) of this Agreement will be paid a Moving Allowance provided that:

a. The plant to which the employee is to be relocated is at least fifty (50) miles from the plant for which his seniority was transferred, and

b. As a result of such relocation, he changes his permanent residence, and

c. He makes application within six (6) months after assuming his new permanent residence in the area of this plant to which he was relocated in accordance with the procedures established by the Company.

that the relevancy of the requested information was self-evident under Board law since related to possible grievance and arbitration proceedings. E. W. Buschman Co., 277 NLRB 189, 191 (1985).

Finally, on 2 April 1984 when Local Union President Butler asked Houser if there was any further information on employees discharged for picket line misconduct beyond telegrams discharging them without prior knowledge of the Union, Houser replied, "we would see what we wanted at the NLRB hearing."

Counsel for the General Counsel having established the Union's repeated requests, beginning in early January 1984 and continuing into April 1984 for Respondent's information on picket line misconduct, Respondent indicated it intended to act by disciplining employees, information clearly necessary and relevant to the Union's representational duties on behalf of employees, including filing grievances over these discharges under established grievance procedures noted above the burden fell on Respondent to justify its failure and refusal to provide the information as established above. NLRB v. Acme Industrial Co., 385 U.S. 432 (1967); Pfizer, Inc., 268 NLRB 916 (1984); Boeing Co., 182 NLRB 421 (1970).

Yet Respondent called none of its own representatives or officials to explain under oath its position in this matter, relying instead on purported "admissions" by union witnesses that in some of the numerous instances of refusals to provide the information, company officials had "explained" that the matter was still "under investigation," or "being reviewed," or that "no final decision" had been made, none of which reasons, on their face, justify the withholding of information Respondent may have had at the time the Union made its numerous requests. In this connection, the suggestion comes through Respondent's contention on brief that it provided the Union with "the information" once Respondent had "it," that Respondent simply did not possess the information at the times it was requested by the Union. Also implicit in this argument on brief is that Respondent did produce the requested information once it was available. The record fails to support either assertion.

Several witnesses, including Plant Manager Sheehan, Director of Manufacturing Popadynec, Supervisor Durlock, Customer Service Manager Phillippi, and Director of Quality Control John L. Smith, Respondent's officials, testified that they reported eyewitness accounts of picket line misconduct in writing and orally to Respondent's Director of Industrial Relations E. J. Mullane as early as mid-January 1984. Indeed, there is additional testimony that even as early as 5 December 1983, the assault on guard Buchanan's supervisor, and other picket line incidents on 3, 5, 12, 15, and 16 January had been observed, recorded, and reported. In addition, there are reports concerning picket line occurrences recorded by guard Oblinger dated 5 and 6 December 1983, and employee Zelda Greer testified she reported a 14 January 1984 incident to Mullane. Yet as late as 2 April, Respondent was informing union representatives it would still not furnish the particulars, on any details concerning this matter, advising the Union it would get what it wanted at an NLRB hearing where, as it turned out and is noted above, only the facts concerning two misconduct cases were described in the course of witness examination in the fall of 1985, over 10 months since the Union's first request of numerous inquiries seeking the information. Such limited disclosure as did occur was pursuant to this litigation, rather than the Union's fruitless requests. I find that Respondent failed and refused to provide the Union with the requested information concerning the picket line misconduct at all times material including from 9 January 1984 through April and May and onward thereby violating Section 8(a)(5) of the Act. NLRB v. Acme Industrial Co., supra; Pfizer, supra; Boeing Co., supra. Moreover, whatever little it did get was untimely communicated. Postal Service, 276 NLRB at 1288 (1985).

Respondent on brief points to the testimony of union witnesses Tony Rahill and Tom Butler, presidents respectively of the Detroit and Madison Heights locals, purportedly supporting the defense that Respondent did provide the requested information, yet their testimony reveals only, in Butler's testimony, that Company Representative Houser gave Butler notification concerning the discharge of three employees on 2 April and that Butler had already seen the telegrams discharging them as of 17 March. Further Butler testified he had no prior knowledge concerning those employees being discharged, and that when he asked for further details underlying the action such as "films, written documentation, etc." Houser refused to make any available, telling him to await the NLRB hearings. Yet it was undenied that as early as 8 February 1984 Respondent had informed Union Counsel Page it was still studying the tapes (films) taken of the picket line conduct, which Respondent, under Board law was required to produce on request. Square D Electric Co., 266 NLRB 795, 797 (1983). Under cross-examination by Respondent later, Butler testified further that they (Respondent) advised him they would be responding to his inquiry independently of an NLRB hearing but testified without contradiction that Respondent never did so. Regarding Rahill, his testimony under cross-examination revealed that once the Union had learned of the letters identifying those persons who were receiving discipline for strike misconduct, Local 104 did not ask for further information. It was not the Union's duty to repeat the often repeated specific request for the names, locations, and underlying circumstances including the tapes reasonably necessary to evaluate the options open to it to represent employees in these matters still again simply because some small part of the request, after months of delay, was provided in the form of telegrams and later letters concerning Respondent's discharging the employees on 2 April. Rather, it was for Respondent to prove in this hearing that the numerous specific requests for information made by union counsel and union representatives in writing and orally, identifying there requested information specifically—which I find the Respondent had in its possession—was in fact provided to the Union by Respondent, and this cited limited testimony barren or elucidating details is insufficient to establish that fact. Nor did any Respondent witness take the stand to deny that the Respondent had refused to furnish the information as alleged in the complaint. In the same vein I note further that Union Representative

Waller testified he received at some date unspecified in the record information concerning the identity of about 10 employees the Respondent had decided to discipline, and while Respondent was in a position to elucidate the record as to the date and details, it did not do so. Waller also recalled that he made a second request on 29 February 1984 for Respondent to tell him the names and number of employees accused of picket line misconduct but was told by Mullane—who did not testify—he would be told after the employees were notified. In short, the references on brief by Respondent simply do not establish through union witness cross-examination that Respondent supplied the requested information at times relevant or substantially to the extent requested or required by law calling for timely production of all the requested information deemed relevant. Washington Hospital Center, 270 NLRB 396 (1984). Nor is the baldly stated assertion on brief by Respondent's counsel that Respondent provided the Union "and the GC" misconduct information sufficient enough to pare down the alleged discriminatees from 15 to only the 2 "tried before this Court" anywhere supported by the record evidence. Nor would such response, even if proven, by way of resolving alleged violations of Section 8(a)(3) of the Act being litigated in the formal NLRB hearing, control the determination of whether Respondent had violated its collective-bargaining duty to comply with Union's requests for information earlier under Section 8(a)(5) of the Act, the present issue being addressed.

By way of further justifying its conduct refusing the Union's request for, inter alia, the identification of those under investigation or to be charged with picket line misconduct, the number of them involved, their plant location, the penalities being contemplated, the tapes of picket line conduct, and nature of the charges, Respondent on brief cites Board cases holding that the production of employee witness statements in the context of imminent arbitration proceedings is not required due to possible intimidation of witnesses in such proceedings, and further that the production of whatever "undisclosed" relevant evidence in the hands of the possessor is too broad a discovery standard hence request for such are not within the scope of information production responsibilities under the Act as such requests are insufficient to oppose a respondent of the information sought. See Anheuser Busch, Inc., 237 NLRB 982 (1978); and Machinists Lodge 78, 224 NLRB 111 (1976). Neither principle has any application here where the Union requested specifically identified information relevant to its function and responsibility to represent employees in a situation fraught with grave consequences for their employment free of any request or reference going to employee witness statements and seeking only germane information which the record discloses as described above, was in the Respondent's possession and for the most part was derived from its own representatives, supervisors, and agents (rather than employees) in December 1983 and January 1984. NLRB v. Acme Industrial Co., supra, and Square D Electric Co., supra at 797.

E. Complaint Paragraph 12

The General Counsel here contends that Respondent refused to bargain in good faith with the Union because Respondent engaged in a course of conduct during the parties' negotiations aimed at splitting apart the established appropriate bargaining unit by unlawfully inducing Detroit employees and the Union to negotiate and accept a separate contract for Detroit plant employees only, excluding unit employees at Madison Heights and Elmira, New York plants, without the Union's consent.

Background

The background evidence shows that the parties negotiate numerous employment matters, such as wages, pensions, insurance, vacations, SUB, paid absences, COLA, and grievance procedure details for all three plants in unitwide bargaining called "master-agreement" negotiations, the settled understanding being that the three plants are, in general, treated as one unit, though no general wage schedule is published and there can be minor variances, such as an incentive bonus at one plant alone. The parties also engage in "local" plant or supplementary bargaining over such subjects as starting and quitting times, work rules, job classification structures, wages for a particular position, job bidding, and the like. The overriding characteristic in all the bargaining that goes on, it is clear, is the unified three plant structured bargaining unit on which the parties contract negotiations have long been based over several years, a structure fortified by the requirement that votes of all plants be pooled to ratify a new contract.

F. Respondent's 1983 Contract Proposals

In their entire history of bargaining over successive master contracts the record shows no suggestion that the multiplant unit approach had ever been disturbed. However, on 15 November 1983 in an unprecedented action, Respondent for the first time presented a separately drafted contract proposal covering numerous master level contract subjects for the Detroit plant alone. (G.C. Exh. 6.) The proposal covered wages, COLA, insurance, SUB, pensions, holidays, paid absences, vacations, tuition assistance, contract duration, production rates, and letters of agreement. Respondent also presented a wide-ranging set of separate proposals for Madison Heights and Elmira combined, excluding any mention of Detroit in another draft. (G.C. Exh. 7.) This Elmira-Madison proposal, unlike Detroit's, called for different general wage increases, elimination of COLA, new insurance benefits unlike the Detroit proposal, differences in holiday benefits, scheduled the discontinuance of paid absences while Detroit's was merely reduced, and called for elimination of SUB entirely.

1. Union rejection

After consideration of the separate documents the Union accused the company negotiators of trying to split apart the bargaining unit and rejected such approach, insisting that a single agreement covering the three plants be negotiated. Respondent witness Robert Childress testified the Union never "complained" of any "splitting" effort yet later in the same day general counsel witness Ellis, UAW vice president, testified he informed Childress and Company Director of Human Resources Paul Dick that the Union would not split up the master contract (unit), and accused the Company of putting the Union in a "trick bag" by giving the Union two separate proposals all the while knowing the Union would not split off the "national agreement." Ellis testified further that Childress said he realized that would be the Union's position and so informed Respondent President Malone prior to negotiations—and that Dick confirmed the foregoing. Neither Childress nor Dick denied the foregoing and Malone did not testify. I further credit Ellis over Childress that the Union objected to the splitting effect inherent in Respondent's offer—both as to its separately documented format and its substantially contrasting terms vis-a-vis master level bargaining subjects between the Detroit offer and the offer at the other at the other plants—at the bargaining table, for I believe it would be unnecessary for the Union to take the position it was for a master agreement without the Company's level of demanded recoveries and then the parties could look at some local recoveries "instead"—as described by Childress himself—unless it was responding with an objection to the separate master level proposals put on the table by Respondent. Furthermore, as shall be noted, the Union repeated its objections on later occasions described below.

2. Respondent's direct contact with Detroit employees

Unheeding the Union's objections to divided-unit bargaining, Respondent tried to induce employees directly to accept a separate Detroit contract on 24 November 1983, when Detroit Plant Director of Industrial Relations Eugene J. Mullane approached picketing employees outside the plant inquiring why they had not returned to work in view of the good contract which had been offered Detroit employees. Employee Sally Dorman, whose testimony in this respect was not contradicted, stated that she told Mullane the employees could not accept the separate contract as it had not been offered to "our sister companies" (plants) and "before we had a master contract and there was three plants that always had that master contract and the company, Facet, only offered the contract to the Detroit plant." Mullane told the employees the Madison plant was moving out and that Elmira made different products than the Detroit plant and that the employees should return to work; whereon fellow picket Jerome Mckenny told Mullane he should be negotiating with the Union and, "that he know [sic] that we would not accept the contract that did not include the other two [plants]." Mullane then left Dorman, Mckenny, and a third picket Vernette Ward, whom he had been addressing as a group, and headed toward another two pickets. Mullane did not testify.

On 2 December 1983, Respondent mailed letters containing copies of the Detroit plant only contract proposal to about 140 employees, of that plant alone, not communicating with the other two plant forces in the unit comprising better than 500 employees overall. Without telling employees why the Union would not submit the offer to the Detroit force, viz that the offer was unaddressed to Madison and Elmira plant employees, Respondent urged employees to give the union-rejected proposal serious consideration, adverted to general job losses for all, the need to continue product and services [a hint striking Detroit employees would be replaced?] and "invited" employees only at the Detroit plant to return to work "now under the terms of the 15 November offer." (Emphasis added.) Respondent's urgently worded and toned entreatment plainly envisaged and contemplated a dismemberment of the Detroit plant from the multiplant unit because the Respondent's appeal, if accepted by Detroit plant employees returning to work "now" under the separate Detroit plant contract, would break the appropriate bargaining unit apart, leaving Madison and Elmira employees to fend for themselves in a fragmented unit reduced by one-third its size for all practical purposes, substantialiy weakened or diluted in bargaining strength. There was simply no provision in Respondent's 2 December letter regarding the status of other unit employees at Madison and Elmira and the impact on them were Respondent's limited invitation to Detroit employees accepted. (G.C. Exh. 8.)

3. Respondent's further contacts with picketing employees

Mullane again urged Detroit employees to accept Respondent's Detroit-only offer on 4 December, advising Mary Lewis with another striking employee present, Dolores Carter, that she should come back to work since "you have a good contract," Lewis testifying she understood Mullane was referring to the Detroit only proposal dated 15 November.

Not as yet successful in the efforts to isolate Detroit employees from the unit, Respondent adopted new techniques and displayed a sharper strategy on 5 December when high company official Facet President and Chief Executive Officer James R. Malone, together with Detroit Plant Manager T. J. Westfall, spoke further with striking Detroit employees asembly line worker Ilah Drake, job setter Jack Muhaw, and machine shop job setter Loyd Bastuba present at the picket line outside the Detroit plant, urging them to accept Respondent's Detroit plant contract offer and return to work.

4. Facet President Malone's appeal

Employee Ilah Drake testified that Malone drew employees' attention to Respondent's earlier letter and contract offer, advising employees not to get too upset or concerned over the excluded Elmira plant employees offer because, "they (Elmira employees) were not going to be thinking of us [the Detroit employees]." Drake stated Malone said he wanted "us" to come back to work—that Elmira employees could start drawing compensation after so many weeks asking pointedly whether Detroit employees thought the Elmira employees were going to offer to share any of their compensation with Detroit employees. Malone then advised employees, "So think about yourselves . . . not about the Union," concluding remarks at this point with the assertion, "the Union wasn't going to be too worried about [it] because the union officials were going to be getting paid regardless of whether Detroit employees got any money or not."

Loyd Bastuba testified that Malone urged the Detroit employees to return to work, picturing the 15 November Detroit plant contract as a fair one. Bastuba told him it was not fair, "as it didn't give the other plants the same opportunity and we were all together." Malone responded that that should not matter as the Madison plant was moving—would be there no longer—and he was in the process of replacing workers in Elmira and, in the long run, Detroit employees would be alone anyway so "we might as well accept [the contract] now and return to work." Explaining under cross-examination by Respondent counsel that he remembered the conversation because it was important when he talked to someone that high up in the Company, Bastuba recalled that Company President Malone told employees if they "didn't return to work they'd be replaced and if that didn't work he'd move the plant or close." Employee Jack Muhaw testified that Malone told employees they should "get to members and our local to get us to go back to work, he said we were getting . . . it was going to be separate contracts; but he wasn't breaking up the master" adding that Madison would be gone in 6 months and Elmira's future was uncertain.

In further remarks to the employees later the same day, Malone told him to persuade union representatives at the Detroit local union to agree on having a vote to return to work. Drake further recalls that Plant Manager Westfall joined Malone in urging employees to get together and talk Detroit employees into returning to work, at one point asking employees if they had seen a movie about a plant closing, telling them the same thing could happen to them. Neither Malone nor Westfall testified and the employee accounts are credited.

5. Respondent's further requests on 6 and 12 December for a separate ratification at Detroit

A composite of testimony after careful evaluation based on minor variances, internal consistency, credibility, and the import or flow in other evidence reveals that during 6 December negotiations Respondent continued to press for separation of the Detroit plant from the unit, this time, according to Union Assistant Vice President Ellis, corroborated by Union Representative John Mando, openly pressing the Union to allow a separate Detroit employee vote, in effect a separate contract ratification. Ellis rejected the request as tantamount to the Union agreeing to split the unit. Union Representative Mando, mistaken by 1 day about the date of the 6 December meeting, testified that the union representative informed company officials Malone, Dick, and Childress that the Union was willing to discuss "2-tier" level of benefits but such had to be under a master agreement. Company spokesman Childress denied asking for a "ratification" vote, but did not deny asking the Union to afford Detroit an opportunity to vote on the proposal. Further, I credit Ellis over Childress on this point because I found Childress walked a very thin line of distinction—too careful to commend his testimony on this point as reliable, fully accurate, or unaffected by self-interest. Thus Childress denied the Union ever made accusations that the Company was trying to split the master agreement but testified indeed that Ellis had raised that very subject by asking Childress at an earlier meeting point blank, "Are you trying to break the master?" And, of course, Mando's testimony reflects pointed union concern over preserving the master agreement communicated to Respondent at this meeting.

As Respondent, concurrent with above efforts, sought differing benefits at the three plants, the Union responded fulsomely in such respect, agreeing to different levels at the three plants in a phone call between Ellis and company official Dick on 7 December, so long as the benefits and employees at the three plants remained under the master agreement. In fact, the Union was willing to "sell" Respondent's 15 November economic offer to Detroit if Union Representative Ellis could "work out" the Elmira plant issues, as indicated in a report by Ellis to Union Vice President Odesso Komar (G.C. Exh. 39), and by Ellis' testimony regarding a statement he was questioned about on examination so long as the master agreement unit remained intact.

Nonetheless, in a conference call on 12 December, Company President Malone again urged on the Union that a separate Detroit plant vote be taken on Respondent's contract offer, Union Representative Mando rejecting the idea again. Mando replied, "I said we'd not agree to break up the master concept, that that was what he was proposing and we couldn't permit separate votes." Mando suggested the parties get back to the bargaining table, that they were not that far apart and could work out a settlement—Malone responding he would think about it and call back. Malone did not testify and Mando's testimony is credible.

6. Respondent's 13 December letter to Detroit employees

Instead of returning to the bargaining table and devoting itself to the economic issues, Respondent, the very day following the Malone conference call, mailed another letter to some 140 or so Detroit employees only (G.C. Exh. 9), accusing the Union of unfairly punishing the Detroit employees "for the sake of other operations," claiming its offer to the Detroit employees was a fair one and urging Detroit employees to return to work. The letter contains the information that Respondent may have to move other manufacturing lines out of the plant in addition to one already transferred, in order to service customers. There can be no reasonable question but that in the context fairly established to this point this letter was yet another reinforcement in Respondent's efforts to break apart the Detroit plant from the three-plant unit discussed further below, by inducing the Detroit employees to return to work thereby creating a de facto acceptance of the separate Detroit contract.

Still hammering away at Detroit employees in efforts that would divide the unit, Respondent's Detroit Plant Director of Industrial Relations E. J. Mullane talked with picketing Detroit plant employee Susan Hagedorn on 15 December on the picket line at 8 a.m. asking her why she did not bring her people back to work, warning her that the Company had hired 50 people to work at the Elmira plant and "we didn't want to see that happen here," and advising Hagedorn that employees had gotten the Company's best contract offer in the mail (the 15 November offer). She then protested that the employees could not return to work without a contract. Moreover, as late as the 9 and 10 January 1984 negotiations, Respondent, according to undenied testimony by Union Representatives Mando and Ellis that Respondent presented separate draft agreements, was still giving the appearance of seeking separate plant contracts though the negotiations were on the master level. In fact, in a telephone call Ellis recalled as occurring either 17 or 18 January 1984, which Facet President Malone had placed to Ellis, Malone again sought the Union to allow Detroit employees a separate vote, even alleging to Ellis that the International had once allowed such a procedure elsewhere, Ellis responding that the Union would not allow a Detroit vote on an agreement covering them only as "we'd [then] not be able to put together a master contract."

Analysis

There is no question on this record that the Respondent sought a fundamental alteration in the parties' long-established and appropriate bargaining unit consisting of the Detroit, Madison, and Elmira plants by seeking through coercive methods a separate contract resolution covering the Detroit plant employees alone.

It is well-established that the subject matter of redefining the composition of a bargaining unit established by either Board certification or the parties' longstanding practice and agreement touches a bedrock-like source for stability in the parties' collective-bargaining relationship and is therefore held to be a merely permissive subject of bargaining about which neither side can insist to the point of impasse—in short neither side can force the other to consent to such alteration, though a mutual agreement is permitted. Newpaper Printing Corp., 232 NLRB 291, 292 (1977); Tarlas Meat Co. I, 239 NLRB 1396, 1397 (1979); Newport News Shipbuilding, 236 NLRB 1637 (1978); Electrical Workers (White-Westinghouse) v. NLRB, 604 F.2d 689 (D.C. Cir. 1979); Canterbury Gardens, 238 NLRB 864 (1978); and General Motors Corp., 120 NLRB 1215 (1958). It follows that if a mutual agreement on the matter is lawful, a party can raise the subject at negotiations in an exploratory manner or even with a specific proposal—even take a strong position in the matter so long as such efforts fall short of causing an impasse to further negotiations between the parties.

But it is also true as a necessary, logical corollary that if neither side can attempt to force the other to agree to a change in the bargaining unit structure by insisting to impasse in the negotiations on such change, neither can either party attempt to force the other's consent by any other means and still fulfill the duty to bargain in good faith. If, in addition, such party were to select "other" means that were unlawful, such additional transgression would serve to compound the violation of law by seriously disrupting the collective-bargaining process still further.

Respondent's entreaties to the Detroit employees on the picket line, and its direct mailings to about 140 in the Detroit plant sought a separate contract resolution for them and were strongly laced with thinly veiled threats of further reductions in operations and even plant closing. Respondent's communications directly attacked the integrity of the Union by questioning the good faith of union representatives, insinuating they did not care about Detroit employees' interests since the representatives would still get their own pay even if Detroit employees did not. Respondent's communications further disparaged the Union by accusing it of punishing employees unfairly for the sake of other operations—a nonambiguous reference in this context I find—to the Union's allegiance to the three-plant unit and its objection to splitting Detroit employees away from that unit. President Malone's injunction-like advice to employees to "so think about yourselves . . . not about the Union" could only be an effort to drive a wedge between employees and their bargaining representative still further, the wedge already having been sharpened by the earlier allusions to reductions and plant closing.

This coercive action aimed at creating "division between the employees and their bargaining representative" in a similar context has been held violative of the 8(a)(5) mandated good-faith bargaining obligations. General Athletic Products Co., 227 NLRB 1565 (1977), and Safeway Trails, 233 NLRB 1078, 1081 (1977). Moreover, Respondent's references both specifically and reasonably interpreted claims that Respondent is the true source for protecting the employees' interests rather than the employees' representative with such claims as the Company's offer being a fair one while the Union is presented as unfairly punishing employees. This provides a basis to conclude the Respondent unlawfully sought to undermine the Union's status as the employees' representative in order, plainly, to further its divided unit goal instead of sticking to collective-bargaining matters to the detriment of the latter and in derogation of its duty to bargain in good faith. Adolph Coors Co., 235 NLRB 271, 277 (1978), citing Texas Electric Coop, 197 NLRB 10, 12, 14 (1972), and, in pertinent part, NLRB v. General Electric Co., 418 F.2d 736 (2d Cir. 1969), as to an employer unlawfully dealing with the union through employees rather than dealing with the union as the employees' representative. See also the dissenting opinion by Member Johansen in Putnam Buick, 280 NLRB 868, 870 (1986), that an employer effort supposedly to merely "communicate" with employees "was an explicit attempt to convince employees that the Respondent was more interested than the Union in their welfare" and this was an indicator of bad-faith bargaining since it "undermined the Union's status as the collective-bargaining representative."

It is likewise true that in its campaign-like efforts to divide the unit, Respondent sowed the seeds of dissension among the Detroit employees and employees at Elmira, pitting the Detroit employees against their fellow union members by asserting the Elmira striking employees would soon be receiving unemployment compensation that they would not likely share with Detroit employees Respondent was then unlawfully importuning to return to work as a separate unit. This effort was in common with Respondent's other efforts to divide the unit by dividing the unity among employees.

All these efforts are the exact opposite of good-faith bargaining for "if there is one thing that frustrates collective bargaining with the majority representative, and causes nothing but continuing and extended conflict, it is disruption of the unified action by separating one segment of the whole from others." Tarlas Meat Co. II, 239 NLRB 1400, 1404–1405 (1979).

It is well-established that a party is held responsible as intending the foreseeable consequences of his acts which were either desired by the person or which, reasonably viewing matters, were almost virtually certain to occur as a result of the conduct engaged in. By the nature of things, Respondent's pressures and exhortations to employees and the Union could only lead to a fragmentation of the long-established master agreement unit. This is no mere speculation because once voting to ratify a separate contract and returning to work pursuant to the terms applicable to them only, as intended by Respondent, there would be no viable collective-bargaining associated reasons for the Detroit plant employees to be any longer a part of the bargaining unit from which they would be withdrawn by the force of the described events severely weakening the employees' bargaining representative. At the same time the Respondent would be in a better, stronger posture to prevail in negotiations concerning the remaining employees in the weakened unit looking in from the outside at Detroit plant employees back at work. Given the Respondent's ample motive and continuing effort to secure this goal as described above, its alleged denials of any such intention, and that it was only making proposals "within a master agreement contract" have a hollow ring and are not worthy of belief. In this instance, I find a preponderance of evidence supports the view that Respondent intentionally sought to force a division in the appropriate bargaining unit by clearly unlawfully coercive means, thereby violating the duty to bargain in good faith most seriously and, by the exercise of such coercion, losing the protection otherwise accorded employer communication to employees under the Act in these matters described above. United Technologies Corp., 274 NLRB 609 (1985), and Proctor & Gamble Mfg. Co., 160 NLRB 334 (1966).

G. The Trident Defense[3]

Respondent's defense, inter alia, that it cured such violation, if any, in a notice to employees repudiating such conduct mailed to them no later than 4 February 1984 is found meritless as such repudiation was clearly not a timely one, coming over 2-1/2 months after it had embarked on the unlawful conduct on 15 November 1983, and for the further reason that not long after the notice, as described above, Respondent engaged in further unlawful conduct described below. Such repudiation was therefore clearly ineffective. Kroger Co., 275 NLRB 1478, 1480 (1985), citing Passavant Memorial Area Hospital, 237 NLRB 138 (1978).

Respondent's further assertion that the Union preconditioned settlement of the strike and a contract resolution on amnesty and dismissal of strike replacements—permissive topics of bargaining—on and after 9 January 1984, thereby engagir3 in unlawful conduct serving as a defense to Respondent's unfair labor practice described above is patently without merit. In the first place, the bulk of Respondent's unlawful conduct toward splitting the unit occurred between 15 November 1983 and 9 January 1984 as described above so that any alleged conduct by the Union on and after 9 January would not serve to justify Respondent's unlawful action beforehand described above, either with regard to the amnesty matter or the replacement of strike replacements. In the second place, regarding the amnesty question, it is clear that Respondent from 9 January 1984 through April and May 1984 and beyond, unlawfully refused to furnish information regarding picket line misconduct as detailed above which was at the heart of the amnesty problem, and left the Union without the facts required to intelligently negotiate a resolution, so that the Respondent can not be heard to "defend" here on the basis of matters fairly arising from alleged union misconduct due to its own unfair labor practices and responsibility and well after its unlawful conduct in attempting to split the unit earlier. Grede Plastics, 235 NLRB 363, 364 (1978). Third, the strikers involved in this matter were unfair labor practice strikers on whose behalf, therefore, the Union was entitled to seek immediate replacement by, inter alia, demanding the dismissal of all strike replacements. Kansas Van & Storage Co., 273 NLRB 855 (1984); Coca-Cola Co. of Memphis, 269 NLRB 1101 (1984); and Charles D. Bonanno Linen Service, 268 NLRB 552, 553 (1984). Finally, Respondent's reliance on SCA Services of Georgia, 275 NLRB 830 (1985), and other cases on brief, upholding the general right of an employer to seek the return of striking employees to work—including addressing only some segments of employees in the unit to do so, is misplaced as in those cases the employer's conduct in making such efforts was not coercive or intended to divide the established bargaining unit, as was the case here, which renders Respondent's citations inapposite.

H. Respondent's Refusal to Reinstate Lemuel Harrison and Sally Dorman

During the course of picketing at Respondent's Elmira, New York, and Detroit and Madison Heights, Michigan facilities employing 550 employees several incidents involving violence, threats, and property damage occurred, and were attributed to the striking employees by eyewitness accounts and security guard written reports identifying those responsible. Acting on this information, Respondent, at the conclusion of the strike, refused reinstatement to numerous employees resulting in the Union filing charges alleging discriminatory discharge under Section 8(a)(3) of the Act regarding 15 employees. This number fell to only two, Harrison and Dorman, at the hearing, the allegations covering the others having been dropped. Harrison, a Madison

[3] Trident Seafoods Corp., 244 NLRB 566 (1979), affd. 642 F.2d 1148 (9th Cir. 1981).

Heights plant employee, was admittedly present on the picket line at both his plant and Respondent's Detroit facility frequently during the strike and is placed at the scene of many disruptive confrontations between striking employees and company personnel, guard forces, and local police.

Thus, guard Alton Buchanan, employed by an outside security force company testified to several encounters he had with Harrison, who was according to Buchanan, identified to him by Industrial Relations Director Don Houser as a suspected source of danger to employees and property at the onset of the strike. Buchanan, in response to my questioning, testified that Houser pointed to Harrison, then several feet away, and identified him by name as a company employee on the occasion noted. Buchanan testified that during the strike, on 5 December 1983 at the Madison Heights plant, he saw Harrison push a vice president in the security force company, Roger Schmedlin, from behind, the force propelling Schmedlin to the ground in front of oncoming traffic, injuring his hand and knee, and tearing his pants. On 3 January 1984, he testified, also at Madison Heights, Harrison waved a knife 2 or 3 feet away from Buchanan and other security force members as they approached the picket line, threatening to cut them and at one point further exclaiming to a firm official, "I'll cut your white ass." Again at the Madison plant, on 5 January, Buchanan testified that during a large massing of pickets, he saw police struggling to restrain Harrison, who was also seen by Buchanan kicking the sides of cars and hitting automobiles with his picket sign. Buchanan further observed Harrison throwing firewood and sticks, nearly hitting Schmedlin but for Buchanan's pushing the latter aside, on 12 or 15 January, at the Detroit plant when, he also testified, Harrison threw bottles, rocks, and stones at Buchanan and fellow security quards. On 15 or 16 January, back at the Madison plant, Buchanan again identified Harrison as threatening, in their general direction, about 1 foot away, to cut them, describing Harrison's approximate age, height, and weight for the record.

Milton J. Sheehan, then a Detroit plant employee, testified that during the Company's effort to remove machinery on 16 January 1984, while trucks were attempting to enter the plant's premises, he saw Harrison (mistakenly named by him as "Harris") jump on the cab of one of the trucks, beating on the truck with a 4-foot-long wooden picket sign, and screaming at the driver. Sheehan reported the incident to Gene Mullane, director of industrial relations at the Detroit plant. He testified that Harrison (and Sally Dorman) were the most "visible," the most "violent," and that he knew Harrison, who had been identified to him as an employee from the Madison plant by another person during prior occasions involving picket line occurrences when Sheehan had asked about Harrison.

I found no basis in the testimony offered by Buchanan and Sheehan to doubt their credibility while, on the other hand, I found Harrison's explanations concerning the knife and assault incidents unconvincing. It is clear on this record that the Respondent acted pursuant to the reports concerning Harrison's conduct on the picket line when it refused to reinstate him, as there is not a scintilla of evidence tending to show such reports were mistaken or fabricated, or that Respondent based its action on any other reasons. In sum, I find that Respondent had a reasonable, honest basis for its belief that Harrison had engaged in improper activities while on the picket line rendering his conduct as a striking employee unprotected by the Act. Accordingly, the burden fell on counsel for the General Counsel to prove by a preponderance of the evidence that Harrison had not been engaged in any unprotected activities forming the basis for his not being reinstated. Harvey Engineering Corp., 270 NLRB 1290, 1301 (1984). This he was unable to do.

In this connection, I have considered the contention that Buchanan's testimony that Houser identified Harrison to Buchanan was hearsay on the issue of whether the person pointed out to Buchanan by Houser was in fact Harrison and agree that such would be hearsay regarding that issue, as well as Sheehan's testimony that someone had identified a picket as Harrison to him. However, the central or overriding issue is whether Respondent had a reasonable basis to believe Harrison had engaged in the cited conduct. On that issue, of course, the identification of Harrison plays an important part, but the record is devoid of any reason why Respondent could not reasonably rely on the reports of Buchanan and Sheehan as described. Harvey Engineering Corp., ibid; citing General Telephone Co. of Michigan, 251 NLRB 737 (1980), affd. 672 F.2d 894 (D.C. Cir. 1981). It was Respondent's own Director of Industrial Relations Don Houser, who had reportedly made the identification for Buchanan, and there was no reason for Respondent to question or reject the account given by Sheehan, whose wife worked at the Madison plant, like Harrison, who was placed at the scene of violence by Sheehan on several occasions so that it would be natural or reasonable for Respondent to accept his identification as reliable. Thus, it is clear that the testimony by both witnesses concerning their being told the striker was Harrison is not unreliable hearsay on the limited question of what they were told; consequently, this finding of fact, to that limited extent, is based on uncontradicted, probative evidence on which both Respondent and the above conclusion is entitled to rely. Nor is counsel for the General Counsel prejudiced by such finding for he had the opportunity, and exercised it, to cross-examine both witnesses as to what they were told and, further, to recall Houser and test the accuracy and reliability of his reported identification of Harrison to Buchanan under cross-examination, but chose not to do so.

Sally Dorman, a striking Detroit plant employee, was likewise denied reinstatement by Respondent at the conclusion of the strike. At this hearing six witnesses credibly testified that they saw Dorman, during the picketing at the Detroit plant in January and February, engage in screaming, threatening conduct against company personnel, attacks on company and employee vehicles by beating on cars and trucks with picket signs, her fists and feet, and brandishing a 6-foot-long wooden picket sign menacingly toward employees, calling them scabs while waving it in such fashion that one witness testified he felt she was about to attack the employees. Each of the witnesses, including Sheehan for whom Dorman once worked, was able to identify Dorman based on their personal knowledge of who she was, either because of being a long-term coemployee or supervisor or personnel administrator who had prior direct contact with her. Dorman herself, though down-playing or denying some of the reports, admitted the police had to twice order her to stop "touching" vehicles entering the plant, but refused to testify under oath. Director of Manufacturing William Popadynec, himself a witness to Dorman's beating on car windshields with her picket sign of 14 January, and hitting the side window of an incoming plant truck three or four times on 16 January with her picket sign, testified Dorman was discharged for her conduct that he and others had reported as summarized above. Based on the foregoing, I find that Respondent lawfully denied reinstatement to strikers Dorman and Harrison because they engaged in picket line misconduct clearly exceeding the bounds of peaceful and reasoned conduct required by law so as to coerce or intimidate employees in the exercise of rights protected under the Act as well as other persons who do not enjoy the protection of Section 7 of the Act. Clear Pine Mouldings, 268 NLRB 1044 (1984); Southwest Forest Industries, 273 NLRB 765 (1984); New Galex Mirror Corp., 273 NLRB 1232 (1984); and Harvey Engineering Corp., supra. Counsel for the General Counsel's reliance on case authority to the contrary is unavailing because in the authorities cited by him there was a preponderance in evidence showing either that the employers' belief regarding the employees' misconduct was mistaken, or that there was no basis at all to conclude the employees had engaged in the misconduct, the opposite of this situation.

I. Respondent's Unilateral Changes

The complaint alleges that Respondent made numerous changes in preexisting employment conditions at the strike's end on 17 February 1984 without bargaining with the Union: by dispensing with the parties' contract-established grievance procedure; reducing the number of recognized shop stewards at the Detroit plant from six to three; denying the Elmira local union president, a shop committeeman, access to the plant and his right to recall before other employees thereby denying him superseniority under the parties' agreement; and further, by reducing the amount of company-paid time accorded employee union committeemen and officers engaged in representational matters in the Detroit plant.

The sworn testimony of witnesses McElligott, Waller, Bastuba, and Rahill establishes without contradiction that while the parties' agreement covering the three plants was in effect, including concurrent supplementary agreements, the parties were bound by contract provisions and practices establishing a step-by-step grievance procedure which could be initiated by written complaints on prepared forms. Six shop stewards were recognized by the Company at the Detroit plant, plant access for union officers to represent employees, superseniority in recall for local union officers and shop committee members, paid time for conducting union-management-employee related matters viz: to the local's president, vice president, and financial secretary 3-1/2 hours a day, grievance committee chairman 10 hours a week, and union stewards and chief stewards were granted a reasonable amount of time to handle grievances. The parties are not in dispute over the particulars established and in force by contract prior to the strike's conclusion, and Respondent made no effort at the hearing or on brief to deny same. I find these employment conditions to have been in existence at all relevant times herein. See (G.C. Exh. 3), Local 104 Supplemental Agreement article I, paragraph 4; id. at 6; and Local 604 Supplemental Agreement at 6 and 12, paragraph 28.

On the strike's conclusion Respondent instituted wide-ranging changes in the employment conditions of its employees. Detroit Grievance Committee Chairman Loyd Bastuba testified without contradiction that Detroit Personnel Director Mullane told him after Bastuba had returned to work and had occasion to ask Mullane for a grievance form that, "there was no longer any contract between us and the company and there was no longer a grievance procedure," so Mullane refused to give him any grievance forms. Bastuba further testified that the "whole format of filing a grievance was gone—all you could do was talk with Mullane—[though] normally there were steps with foreman involved." On cross-examination Bastuba said, "We had no procedure—had to accept what Mullane decided after we returned to work."

Detroit Local Union President Tony Rahill also testified that after his return to work he had a discussion with Mullane on 27 or 28 February, the latter informing Rahill of reductions in the amount of paid time for union plant representatives to 2 hours a week, only for the three top officials, elimination of three area stewards and that the three remaining chief stewards would have no time in the plant. When Rahill asked for the reason behind Respondent's action, Mullane told him, "you're back on unconditional offer. No contract, no representation and no grievance procedure." Rahill further testified that there was no grievance procedure after employees returned to work.

In a phone call from Mullane to Union Staff Representative Walter Waller on 29 February in response to a question Waller had raised earlier regarding representation in the plant, Waller testified Mullane said, "they did not have to recognize anyone as far as representation purpose but because of the relationship we had we'd recognize three stewards in the plant but they'd not have any privileges as far as writing grievances is concerned." When Waller asked, "What was the sense in recognizing these people if they can't use the grievance procedure," Mullane replied, "Well, you came back unconditionally and as far as the grievance procedure is concerned, we don't have to do it and that's our decision . . . and we don't have to bargain on it." Waller testified that there was no formal grievance procedure in place after the strike concluded.

In the same timeframe Fred McElligott, who served variously as president, vice president, and a member on the shop committee at the Elmira plant at all relevant times, testified he arrived at the plant on 24 February at 1 p.m. and asked for access to the plant bcause he was a union official and there were union members in the plant, but was informed by the secretary to John Evans, director of industrial relations at the Elmira plant, that "there'd be no union officials let into the plant." McElligott, who testified without contradiction that about 40 employees had been recalled to work since the unconditional offer on 17 February while he had still not been recalled on the 24 February occasion described despite his right to preferential recall before the others under the parties agreement, asked the secretary—a long-time acquaintance at the plant—to have Evans call him. Evans called McElligott later at the union hall, confirming that there would be no union officials allowed in the plant. On cross-examination, McElligott stated that the secretary was referring to union stewards being barred as well, and that when he asked Evans during the phone call whether there would be representation for the union people in the plant, Evans said there would be no union representation allowed in the plant, and refused McElligott's request for a written statement explaining the reason. Evans did not testify.

As was recently noted with Board approval in PRC Recording Co., 280 NLRB 615, 634–635 (1986):

> It is the Board's obligation to protect the process by which employers and unions may reach agreements with respect to terms and conditions of employment. Sea Bay Manor Home, 253 NLRB 739, 740 (1980); NLRB v. C & C Plywood Corp., 385 U.S. 421, 428 (1967). Old Man's Home of Philadelphia, 265 NLRB [1632 (1982)], the Board, quoting from the basic authority in this area, NLRB v. Benne Katz, 369 U.S. 736, 743 (1962), notes that the Supreme Court held:
> > A refusal to negotiate in fact as to any subject which is within § 8(d) and about which the union seeks to negotiate, violates § 8(a)(5) though the employer has every desire to reach agreement with the union on an over-all collective agreement and earnestly and in all good faith bargains to that end. We hold that an employer's unilateral change in conditions of employment under negotiations is similarly a violation of § 8(a)(5) for it is a circumvention of the duty to negotiate which frustrates the objective of § 8(a)(5) much as does a flat refusal [emphasis added].
> An employer has a statutory obligation to continue to follow the terms and conditions of employment governing the employer-employee, as opposed to the employer-union, relationship in an expired contract until it has bargained to impasse with the collective-bargaining representative of its employees unless the union fails to timely request bargaining following the employer's notice of an intention to modify NLRB v. Haberman Construction Co., 618 F.2d 288, 302–303 (5th Cir. 1980); NLRB v. Antonino's Restaurant, 648 F.2d 1206, 1214 (9th Cir. 1981); Bay Area Sealers, 251 NLRB 89 (1980), enf. denied 665 F.2d 970 (9th Cir. 1982); Henhouse Market, 175 NLRB 596 (1969), enfd. 428 F.2d 133 (8th Cir. 1970). Even if an impasse is reached, a unilateral change cannot be made unless it is reasonably encompassed within the employer's preimpasse proposal Taft Broadcasting Co., 163 NLRB 475, 478 (1967), enfd. sub nom. Television Artists v. NLRB, 395 F.2d 622 (D.C. Cir. 1968).

See also PRC Recording Co., 280 NLRB 615 (1986). The question of whether the unilateral change is encompassed or within the ambit of the proposals already made and rejected is not so much governed by timing or specific aspects of a change but such change cannot, it is clear, exceed the positions and offer previously extended to the union, cf. Stone Boatyard, 264 NLRB 981 (1982); and NLRB v. Crompton Highland Mills, 337 U.S. 217 (1949).

Turning to the Respondent's conduct I first note that it impacted on deeply imbedded terms and conditions of employment governing the "employer-employee, as opposed to the employer-union relationship" the latter being illustrated by, for example union security, arbitration, and check-off provisions. PRC Recording Co., supra at 667, quoting Freedman Electric, 256 NLRB 432, 443 (1981).

Thus, Respondent's undeniable rejection of the parties' entire, carefully crafted, and long-established formal procedure for the imitation and step-by-step handling and resolution of employee grievance struck at the heart of the employer-employee relationship dispensing with written grievances and procedural steps designed to resolve problems in an orderly, understood-in-advance process in which the rights of employees and the employer were understood and agreed on. Such a rejection is calculated to leave the parties' earlier system for resolving employee-employer related grievances in a shambles. There were no prior negotations, union consent, waiver, or offers by Respondent concerning the elimination of the parties' formal grievance procedures, and I therefore conclude Respondent's announced repudiation and unilateral cancellation thereof as found above to violate Section 8(a)(5) of the Act on the cited authorities above. See also Granite City Steel Co., 167 NLRB 310, 316 (1967).

Concerning as it did the availability of their union stewards to receive and adjust grievances from employees against their employer, I further find the subject of paid representational time for plant union representatives and the number of union stewards which Respondent reduced at the Detroit plant to also be within the above-described relationship of employment conditions that survived the expiration of the parties' contract. The record establishes that Respondent's last offer to reduce such paid time was limited to a reduction of only one-half hour a week from 17-1/2, no time outside the plant for the grievance committee chairman, no reasonable time in the plant, but the area stewards and chief stewards would have reasonable time for grievances. In action reducing those benefits in sharp contrast to both their former level under the parties' agreement as well as its last offer, Respondent eliminated paid time for all union representatives except the three top union officials at Detroit and, regarding them, wiped out all but only 2 hours from the former 17-1/2 hours, eliminated three area stewards, and disclosed there would be no paid time for the remaining chief stewards in the plant. Even under Respondent's theory of defense on brief of impasse but for the elimination of the positions of three area stewards, which is in accord with the Respondent's prior offer on this subject, Respondent's action was substantially beyond the ambit of earlier proposals and also as to which, further, I find there was no union consent or waiver. Moreover even though the reduction in the number of stewards to three was in accord with the Respondent's prior offer, Respondent failed to establish any justifying prior impasse in local Detroit plant negotiations in this area, union consent, or waiver, hence the reduction, like the elimination in paid representation time, was violative of the Act. See cases cited in Bay Area Sealers, 251 NLRB 89, 90 (1980).

As further noted in PRC Recording Co., supra at 636, "As noted in Caravelle Boat Co., 227 NLRB at 1357, it is 'axiomatic that unilaterally changing the method of recalling employees is violative of the Act' (unilateral change in recalling employees according to seniority)." Respondent's failure to recall McElligott until 28 February 1984, having recalled about 40 employees before him despite his admitted contract superseniority in recall worked a unilateral change in the existing methods of recalling employees thereby violating the Act. Respondent, herein found to have unlawfully refused to reinstate the unfair labor practice strikers including McElligott on their tender of unconditional offers to return to work in violation of Section 8(a)(3) of the Act, and to have, in McElligott's case, additionally refused to reinstate him according to his seniority in violation of Section 8(a)(5) cannot now defend its action denying McElligott access to the plant for the purpose of representing employees as union president and shop committeeman on the basis that he was not an "active employee" under the parties' former agreement for such result would reward Respondent on the basis of its own violations of employee rights and continuing status as employees under the Act.

Rebuffed at the plant office and in the phone call from Evans from entering the plant, McElligott and other Elmira plant employees serving as stewards were unlawfully deprived of their rights under the Act. R. C. Cobb, Inc., 231 NLRB 99, 104 (1977). For the right of access denied here was a long-established practice contractually required in the past, and survived the expiration of the contract. Such denial removed a "real and substantial benefit," Granite City Steel Co., 167 NLRB 310, 315 (1967); J & H Rainwear, 273 NLRB 497 (1984); Houston Coca-Cola Bottling Co., 265 NLRB 766, 778 (1982); and Kinard Trucking Co., 152 NLRB 449, 450 (1965). In Granite City, supra, it was noted:

> This is not to say that the statute freezes Respondent to the existing practices on plant access. It is to say that prior to effecting changes therein it is under a duty to give its employees' statutory representative an opportunity to bargain concerning proposed changes. The bargaining representative is entitled to "an opportunity to present arguments to the employer to dissuade him from effecting the change, and also an opportunity to propose alternatives or compromises which might moderate the change so as to accommodate the interests of the employees as well as of the employer. [Kinard Trucking Co., 152 NLRB 449, 450 (1965).]

Respondent never afforded the Union an opportunity to bargain about this action depriving union access at the Elmira plant, and offered no valid reasons for imposing the change, which was material, substantial, and significant, hence a further refusal to bargain in violation of Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act, as were the earlier related unilateral changes in employment conditions described above.

J. The Prolongation and Conversion of the Strike

Respondent's unlawful insistence to impasse on the EBW proposal, as discussed and established above, substantially contributed to causing from its outset the unfair labor practice strike at the Madison Heights plant beginning on 3 November 1983. The record is clear that beginning on 2 December 1983 Respondent's unlawful efforts to divide the three-plant unit service to prolong the strike, begun earlier at all the plants and as a result, from that date forward to its conclusion on 17 February 1984, the strike for such additional reasons was an unfair labor practice unitwide strike.

Thus, the Union filed unfair labor practices concerning, inter alia, Respondent's unlawful conduct seeking to divide the bargaining unit on 15 December 1983 (G.C. Exh. 1). The charges were read and explained to striking employees at local union meetings, along with, at Madison, transmittal letters to Company President Malone from Union Vice President Komar and Union Attorney Page to the NLRB Regional Office, employees being advised the strike was an unfair labor practice strike. Smith advised unit members Barbra Terrace and Randy Berner to print new picket signs stating the picketing was over unfair labor practices. Smith and Madison plant former operator Guisippi Scianimanico testified to such signs being carried thereafter, the latter supplying a photograph of same. (G.C. Exh. 209.)

Similarly, at the meeting for Detroit plant striking employees on 24 December 1983, Detroit employee Local 104 President Tony Rahill testified that assistant to UAW Vice President Jim Ellis was present to give employees an update on negotiatons and said (Ellis) that the Union was filing unfair labor practices against the company—"that people on the [picket] line were being approached by management asking them to come back to work with no contract and no union." Rahill further testified on cross-examination that Ellis explained "about the [letters] the company had written and the Union had written to the company," the Company using unfair labor practices "as far as talking to people on the picket line, trying to get them to come back to work without a contract." Rahill described a request by Ellis that if anyone other than those who had given statements was approached on the line they should make themselves known. Further direct evidence that Respondent's unlawful efforts to break apart the Detroit plant employees from the unit fueled Detroit employees' resolve to continue the strike is found in employee accounts described above when Respondent officials approached picketing Detroit employees seeking their separate return to work on 24 November and 5 December 1983. Such appeals were rejected, employees voicing quickly and strongly the views that Respondent's proposals were aimed at separation of the unit consisting of "sister locals" were all together (employees Sally Dorman, Jerom McKenny, and Loyd Bastuba).

Witness Fred McElligott served as an employee for 21 years at the Elmira plant and held the position of vice president and acting Local 604 president, as such being a member on the shop bargaining committee throughout 1983 and 1984 negotiations for a new contract. He testified credibly that he knew the Union had filed the unfair labor practice charge noted above on 15 December 1983, as Union District Representative Jack Manione and UAW Counsel Leonard Page so informed him.

He testified that during a local union meeting attended by some 175 local union members during the third week in December 1983 Manione described company letters sent to one plant seeking a return to work by them without the other two plants, and a meeting between the Company and the Union where company negotiator Childress sought only the return of the Detroit plant to work. He then read the unfair labor practice charges involving Respondent's unlawful efforts to split the unit to the assembled striking employees and that numerous members expressed the view that "that they all went out on strike together and they will stick together. There is no way one plant will go back to work without the other two units." McElligott, an employee at Elmira himself for 21 years and personally involved in the negotiations was asked, based on his discussions, inter alia, with fellow striking employees and members under his leadership in the local union what effect the Respondent's separate (unit) proposals had on the strike, if any. He replied, "It made the membership more stronger than what they were. They were all more determined to stick together," and "to continue to strike and to continue to hold together the three units. . . ."[4]

Thereafter, until the conclusion in the strike, picketing employees carried newly painted signs, made by McElligott, stating that Facet was charged with unfair labor practices from around 21 or 22 December until 17 February. There were some 360 employees at the Elmira plant and only 300 combined at Madison and Detroit so that an agreement opposed by Elmira unanimously would not pass, and McElligott testified that Respondent's "separation" proposals were opposed at Elmira.

Respondent's conduct was calculated by unlawful threats and coercion to strike at the core of the employers' bargaining representative's source of bargaining power, the combination in a single bargaining unit of employees at all three plants, and such conduct foreseeably therefore would strengthen strikers' resolve to continue protecting the survival of such unit—since such survival was linked to the Union's chances of securing a better contract and thus the employees' own best interests in terms of improved employment conditions; and the way to protect that interest was to continue the strike, such reasons for doing so being repeatedly communicated to Respondent by employees and their representatives. As has been stated before, "More concrete evidence of causal connection between a violation and the reason for a continuation of a strike can hardly be imagined." General Athletic Products Co., 227 NLRB at 1576.

The employees were aware of this conduct from 2 December 1983 through the end of the strike, as detailed here and as it has been noted with Board approval, and as the complaint here alleges such conduct "prolonged the strike" because it frustrated collective bargaining with the majority representative and caused nothing but continued and extended conflict disrupting unified action "by separating one segment of the whole from others." Tarlas Meat Co., supra at 1405. Further, a careful assessment of the parties' bargaining efforts reveals that at every turn when a glimmer for possible negotiations headway arose, the specter of Respondent's unlawful efforts to seek a separate contract resolution for the Detroit plant dashed the prospects for agreement and I view the record in the connection, as a whole, further supports the finding of a causal connection between such and a prolongation in the strike. Blue Fountain Manor, 270 NLRB 199, 206 and case cited at fn. 14 (1984), in which it is stated, "the Board has held in numerous cases that such a connection may be inferred from the record as a whole." Moreover, the fact that union-granted news media interviews omit mention of all the causes for a strike is immaterial, since not shown to have been intended as a complete explanation for such activity being undertaken. Berbiglia, Inc., 233 NLRB 1476, 1497 (1977).

I find that the strike at all three plants 2 December 1983 until its conclusion became an unfair labor practice strike—the strike at Madison being an unfair labor practice strike from its inception on 3 November 1983 and in the alternative like the situation unitwide, becoming an unfair labor practice strike on 2 December 1983. Tarlas Meat Co., supra; Buffalo Concrete, 276 NLRB 839 (1985); Charles D. Bonanno Linen Service, 268 NLRB 552 (1984); and Blu-Fountain Manor, supra.

Accordingly, by refusing immediate reinstatement to the striking employees on and after their unconditional offer to return to work on 17 February 1984 as the record clearly established, Respondent also violated Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act. Kansas Van & Storage Co., 273 NLRB 855 (1984); Coca-Cola Co. of Memphis, 269 NLRB 1101 (1984); and Charles D. Bonanno Linen Service, supra at 552–553.

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. Facet Enterprises, Inc. is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act.

2. The Union and its Locals 104, 771, and 604 are labor organizations within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

3. Respondent officials as identified hereinabove in the paragraph on Agency Status are supervisors and/or agents and representatives of Respondent within the meaning of the Act.

[4] During his testimony, McElligott at first mistakenly placed the occasion when Respondent's efforts to divide the bargaining unit were discussed with employees as mid-October, but corrected himself shortly afterward by placing it in December; his correction being rendered in a spontaneous and candid manner.

4. The employees described above under the heading related to this finding constitute a unit appropriate for the purposes of collective bargaining within the meaning of Section 9(b) of the Act.

5. At all times material the Union and its locals have been the designated exclusive representatives of the employees in the appropriate unit for the purpose of collective bargaining within the meaning of Section 9(a) of the Act.

6. By insisting to impasse on the adoption of its proposal concerning the exclusion from the unit of the electron beam welder classification, a permissive subject of collective bargaining, during negotiations with the Union, Respondent violated Section 8(a)(5) of the Act.

7. Respondent's conduct described above in paragraph 6 was a contributing cause in the strike commencing on 3 November 1983 at the Madison Heights plant, which thereby was an unfair labor practices strike from its inception.

8. By refusing to furnish the Union with information concerning (a) the Company's financial status, (b) movement of jobs and machinery from the Detroit plant, and (c) picket line misconduct, all the foregoing being relevant and necessary to the Union's collective-bargaining responsibilities, Respondent violated Section 8(a)(5) of the Act.

9. By engaging in conduct, commencing on 2 December 1983, particularly described above as being calculated to split off the Detroit plant from the established appropriate bargaining unit Respondent refused to bargain in good faith with the Union thereby violating Section 8(a)(5) of the Act.

10. Due to Respondent's conduct described above in paragraph 9, the economic strike at the Detroit and Elmira plants underway since 7 November, was prolonged and thereby converted to an unfair labor practice strike while the strike at Madison described in paragraph 7 above, for such additional reason, in the alternative was an unfair labor practices strike due to such conduct commencing on 2 December 1983.

11. By unilaterally changing the employment conditions of its employees as to the established grievance procedures, number of shop stewards, paid time for representational matters, seniority recall rights, and plant access, as described in detail above, Respondent further violated Section 8(a)(5) of the Act.

12. By refusing, commencing on 18 February 1984, the day following their unconditional offer to return to work, to immediately reinstate unfair labor practice strikers to their old jobs, discharging, if necessary any replacements with respect to Madison Heights hired from the strike's inception, and regarding Detroit and Elmira, hired after the strikes there were converted to unfair labor practice strikes (discussed further below in the remedy section of this decision) Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act.

13. The aforesaid unfair labor practices affect commerce within the meaning of the Act.

14. There is no preponderance in the evidence to establish that Respondent unlawfully discharged Lemuel Harrison and Sally Dorman or has otherwise violated the Act.

The Remedy

The record contains passing references to relocations of the Detroit plant to Detroit environs several months after the strike concluded and the Madison Heights plant outside Michigan, but these matters were not directly involved in the issues litigated before me, and the full circumstances were not disclosed. Accordingly, the normal remedies for Respondent's unfair labor practices are warranted leaving any matter of mitigating circumstances remedy-wise, to supplementary compliance proceedings if such is demonstrated to be warranted. It will therefore be recommended that Respondent cease and desist from engaging in the aforementioned unfair labor practices, and to take certain affirmative action including, on request to bargain in good faith with the Union designed to effectuate the polices of the Act.

Respondent having set in motion unlawful new terms and conditions of employment, it is necessary under Board law to order restoration of the contractual status quo ante in the respects noted hereinabove in which Respondent acted unlawfully, to the extent feasible, and without imposing an unwarranted burden on Respondent. T.M.L. Supply, 258 NLRB 604 (1981); S. Freedman Electric, 256 NLRB at 432; and Hood Industries, 248 NLRB 597 fn. 3. Included in such remedy it will be recommended that Respondent make whole its employees for any loss of pay or other employment benefits that they may have suffered commencing on 18 February 1984 by reason of Respondent's unilateral changes of its employees' terms and conditions of employment, as prescribed in Ogle Protection Service, 183 NLRB 682 (1970), enfd. 444 F.2d 502 (6th Cir. 1971), with interest as computed in Florida Steel Corp., 231 NLRB 651 (1977). E.G. & G Florida, Inc., 279 NLRB 444 (1986).

Respondent having violated Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act, when on 18 February 1984, and thereafter, it unlawfully refused to reinstate unfair labor practice strikers on their unconditional offer to return to work, offering only to reemploy them when positions became available by normal attrition among poststrike permanent replacements and even then only pursuant to terms and conditions of employment unlawfully imposed, I shall recommend Respondent be ordered to offer immediate reinstatement to all Madison Heights plant strikers to their former or equivalent positions, discharging any replacements hired on or after 3 November 1983 under terms and conditions of employment of the expired contracts, and to make them whole for wages and other benefits measured under status quo ante conditions, lost by virtue of Respondent's unlawful conduct. Backpay to the Madison Heights unfair labor practice strikers refused lawful reinstatement shall be computed from 17 February 1984, the day of their unconditional offer to return to work, Exchange Bank, 264 NLRB 823 (1982), with ultimate net loss of earnings being computed as prescribed in F. W. Woolworth Co., 90 NLRB 289 (1950), plus interest as set forth in Isis Plumbing Co., 138 NLRB 716 (1962), and Florida Steel Corp., supra. Backpay shall cease on offering such employees reinstatement to their former or substantially equivalent jobs. PRC Recording Co., 280 NLRB at 99.

Regarding the Detroit and Elmira plant strikers—and on the alternative additional theory should such be found on appeal that they did not become unfair labor practice strikers until the strike was converted to an unfair labor practice strike beginning on 2 December 1983 as a result of Respondent's unlawful efforts to split the bargaining unit as described above, the Madison Heights plant employees—the following remedy shall be recommended.

On 17 February 1984, the Union requested unconditional reinstatement on behalf of all employees who participated in the strike begun on 3 November 1983 at Madison Heights, and 7 November elsewhere. The strike was converted to an unfair labor practice strike by the Respondent's violation of Section 8(a)(5) beginning on 2 December 1983. Accordingly, I recommend the Board require the Respondent to reinstate to their former or substantially equivalent positions all strikers who were not permanently replaced before 2 December 1983 without impairment of their seniority and other rights and privileges. In order to make room for them, the Respondent shall dismiss, if necessary, all persons hired after 2 December 1983. If, after such dismissal, there are insufficient positions available for the remaining former strikers, those positions which are available shall be distributed among them without discrimination because of their union membership or activities or participation in the strike, in accordance with seniority or other nondiscriminatory practice utilized by the Respondent. Backpay for such strikers will be computed from 17 February 1984 until the date of their reinstatement according to the Isis, Woolworth, and Florida Steel formulas designated above. Those former strikers who were permanently replaced prior to conversion and for whom no employment is immediately available shall be placed on a preferential hiring list in accordance with their seniority or other nondiscriminatory practice utilized by the Respondent, and they shall be reinstated before any other persons are hired or on the departure of their preconversion replacements. See Gulf Envelope Co., 256 NLRB 320 (1981), and Windham Community Memorial Hospital, 230 NLRB 1070 (1977). Ashe Brick Co., 280 NLRB 1383 (1986). No striking employee, found discharged for cause, need be reinstated provided that backpay and other benefits shall be paid to any such employee discharged after 17 February 1984, from that day until date of lawful discharge. O. R. Cooper & Son, 220 NLRB 287 fn. 1 (1975).

On these findings of fact and conclusions of law and on the entire record, I issue the following recommended[5]

ORDER

The Respondent, Facet Enterprises, Inc., Detroit, Michigan, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall

1. Cease and desist from

(a) Refusing to bargain in good faith with the Union by insisting to impasse in negotiations on the adoption of its proposal to exclude the electron beam welder job classification from the bargaining unit; refusing to provide the Union with information relevant and necessary to the Union's collective-bargaining responsibilities such as finanical data described herein, information concerning employees disciplined for picket line misconduct, and information concerning the movement of jobs and machinery from the Detroit plant.

(b) Refusing to bargain in good faith with the Union by engaging in conduct designed to split off the Detroit plant employees from the established bargaining unit, which is:

> All production and maintenance employees employed by Respondent at its Detroit, Michigan plant (Fuel Devices Division), its Madison Heights, Michigan plant (Filter Products Division) and its Elmira, New York plant (Motor Components Division); but excluding office clerical employees, professional employees, guards and supervisors as defined in the Act.

(c) Refusing to bargain in good faith with the Union by unilaterally changing employment conditions such as established grievance procedures, the number of shop stewards, paid time for representative matters, seniority recall rights, and plant access for employee representatives without notifying, consulting, or bargaining with the Union as the exclusive representative of its employees in the appropriate bargaining unit.

(d) Refusing to immediately reinstate Madison Heights unfair labor practice strikers to their former or substantially equivalent positions of employment discharging, if necessary, any replacements, and in the circumstances pertaining to them separately and noted hereinabove Detroit and Elmira unfair labor practice strikers to their former or substantially equivalent positions of employment.

(e) In any like or related manner interfering with, restraining, or coercing employees in the exercise of their rights under Section 7 of the Act.

2. Take the following affirmative action necessary to effectuate the policies of the Act.

(a) Offer immediate and full reinstatement to the Madison Heights unfair labor practice strikers to their former jobs or, if those jobs no longer exist, to substantially equivalent positions, without prejudice to their seniority and other rights and privileges, dismissing if necessary persons hired on or after 3 November 1983, and make them whole for any loss of earnings they may have suffered as a result of Respondent's unlawful refusal to reinstate them, in the manner described in the remedy section of the decision.

[5] If no exceptions are filed as provided by Sec. 102.46 of the Board's Rules and Regulations, the findings, conclusions, and recommended Order shall, as provided in Sec. 102.48 of the Rules, be adopted by the Board and all objections to them shall be deemed waived for all purposes.

(b) Reinstate and similarly make whole the Detroit and Elmira unfair labor strikers in the manner described above in the remedy section of this decision.

(c) On request rescind the above unilateral changes until such time as the Respondent negotiates in good faith with the Union to agreement or impasse.

(d) On request, restore the employment benefits herein found to have been unilaterally changed and make whole the employees in the above unit for all losses they may have suffered as a result of Respondent's changes, with interest thereon, to be computed as described in the remedy section of this decision.

(e) On request, recognize and bargain in good faith with the Union as the exclusive representative of all employees in the aforesaid appropriate unit and, if an understanding is reached, embody such understanding in a written, signed agreement.

(f) Furnish the Union with information relevant and necessary to its collective-bargaining responsibilities as described above.

(g) Preserve and, on request, make available to the Board or its agents, for examination and copying, all payroll records, timecards, personnel records and reports, and all other records relevant or necessary to analyze the amounts due under the terms of this Order.

(h) Post at its Detroit, Madison Heights, and Elmira plants copies of the attached notice marked "Appendix."[6] Copies of the notice, on forms provided by the Regional Director for Region 7, after being signed by Respondent's authorized representative, shall be posted immediately on receipt and maintained for 60 consecutive days in conspicuous places, including all places where notices to employees are customarily posted. Reasonable steps shall be taken by Respondent to ensure that the notices are not altered, defaced, or covered by any other material.

(i) In the event that it cannot reasonably be anticipated that posting alone will suffice to effectuate the purposes of this Order due to dispersal of employees involved arising from plant closing, relocations, or other circumstances arising from the passage of time, then Respondent is further ordered to promptly mail copies of the signed attached notices to the employees involved herein to their home addresses.

(j) Notify the Regional Director in writing within 20 days from the date of this Order what steps Respondent has taken to comply.

IT IS FURTHER ORDERED that the complaint be dismissed insofar as it alleges violations of the Act other than those found here.

[6] If this Order is enforced by a judgment of a United States court of appeals, the words in the notice reading "Posted by Order of the National Labor Relations Board" shall read "Posted Pursuant to a Judgment of the United States Court of Appeals Enforcing an Order of the National Labor Relations Board."

International Brotherhood of Teamsters, Chauffeurs, Warehousemen and Helpers of America, AFL–CIO[1] and Korean Air Lines, Co., Ltd. and AMR Services Corporation. Cases 29–CC–932 and 29–CC–933

DECISION AND ORDER

BY MEMBERS JOHANSEN, BABSON, AND CRACRAFT

On August 7, 1987, Administrative Law Judge Raymond P. Green issued the attached decision. The General Counsel and the Charging Parties filed exceptions and briefs; the Respondent filed cross-exceptions and supporting and answering briefs;[2] and Charging Party Korean Air Lines filed an answering brief opposing the Respondent's cross-exceptions.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the decision and the record in light of the exceptions and briefs[3] and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings, and conclusions[4] and to adopt the recommended Order.

ORDER

The recommended Order of the administrative law judge is adopted and the complaint is dismissed.

[1] On November 1, 1987, the Teamsters International Union was readmitted to the AFL–CIO. Accordingly, the caption has been amended to reflect that change.

[2] On December 15, 1987, the Board denied Charging Party Korean Air Lines' motion to strike the Respondent's cross-exceptions and briefs.

[3] Charging Party Korean Air Lines has requested oral argument. The request is denied as the record, exceptions, and briefs adequately present the issues and the positions of the parties.

[4] The General Counsel and Charging Party Korean Air Lines have excepted to some of the judge's credibility findings. The Board's established policy is not to overrule an administrative law judge's credibility resolutions unless the clear preponderance of all the relevant evidence convinces us that they are incorrect. Standard Dry Wall Products, 91 NLRB 544 (1950), enfd. 188 F.2d 362 (3d Cir. 1951). We have carefully examined the record and find no basis for reversing the findings.

In adopting the judge's conclusion that the Respondent did not violate Sec. 8(b)(4) by enmeshing neutral employers covered by the Act in its dispute, we emphasize that, as found by the judge, there is no evidence of conduct other than that incidental to the Respondent's lawful activity. See Electrical Workers IUE Local 761 v. NLRB, 366 U.S. 667 (1961), and International Rice Milling Co. v. NLRB, 341 U.S. 665 (1951). We further disavow any speculation that the telephone call to Emery Air Freight could, in fact, have been placed by Korean Air Lines or AMR Services Corporation.

Alison Fairbanks, Esq., for the General Counsel.
Wilma B. Liebman, Esq., for the Respondent.
Reginald E. Jones, Esq. (Sofforth, Shaw, Fairweather & Geraldson), for AMR Services Corporation.

DECISION

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

RAYMOND P. GREEN, Administrative Law Judge. These consolidated cases were heard by me on various days in May 1987. The charge in Case 29–CC–932 was filed by Korean Air Lines Co. Ltd. (KAL) on 13 March 1987. The charge in Case 29–CC–933 was filed by AMR Services Corporation (AMR) on 13 March 1987. Thereafter, a consolidated complaint in these cases was issued by the Regional Director for Region 29 on 7 April 1987. At the hearing the complaint was amended in accordance with a notice of motion to amend issued on 4 May 1987.

The consolidated complaint as amended makes the following contentions:

1. That for a number of years KAL (a carrier within the meaning of the Railway Labor Act) subcontracted cargo-handling functions at JFK Airport to a company called Triangle Aviation Services Inc. (Triangle) whose employees were represented for collective-bargaining purposes by Local 851 of the International Brotherhood of Teamsters, Chauffeurs, Warehousemen and Helpers of America, AFL–CIO (Local 851 IBT). There is no dispute that Triangle is not a "carrier" within the meaning of the Railway Labor Act (RLA) and is therefore an employer within the meaning of the NLRA.[1]

2. That the contract between KAL and Triangle expired at midnight on 28 February 1987 whereupon AMR replaced Triangle to provide the cargo-handling functions for KAL at its JFK terminal.

3. That at all times material the Respondent, the International Brotherhood of Teamsters, Chauffeurs, Warehousemen, and helper of America, AFL–CIO has been engaged in primary dispute with AMR because that company's employees are represented for collective-bargaining purposes by another union, namely, the Transport Workers Union.

4. The General Counsel concedes that AMR is a "carrier" within the meaning of the Railway Labor Act.

5. That on 26 February 1987, Respondent demanded that KAL renew its contract with Triangle.

6. That on 26 February 1987 Respondent demanded that AMR employ the employees of Triangle who were about to lose their jobs at KAL's cargo terminal because of KAL's contract with AMR.

7. That on 27 February 1987 and thereafter the Respondent has engaged in picketing and handbilling at KAL's JFK cargo terminal with signs and publicity indicating that its dispute is with KAL rather than AMR.

[1] Respondent's position relative to Triangle is that because of the degree of control KAL exercised over Triangle's employees at KAL's JFK terminal, KAL and Triangle should be construed as joint employers. Respondent also contends that even if Triangle and KAL are found to be separate persons, such a conclusion would not be relevant to the ultimate outcome of this case.

8. That on 27 February 1987 employees of Triangle working at KAL's JFK cargo terminal engaged in a work stoppage.

9. That on 12 and 13 March 1987 Respondent picketed KAL's cargo building at Thomas Bradley International Airport in Los Angeles, California.

10. That on various occasions, Respondent by means of picket signs and otherwise, has induced individuals making deliveries to or pickups from KAL not to cross the picket line. Such persons would include, inter alia, Emery Air Freight, WTC Air Freight, Airborne Air Freight, East Asia Air Freight, and Kinetsu. There is no dispute about the General Counsel's assertion that these companies, which are freight forwarders or consolidators, are employers within the meaning of the NLRA.

The General Counsel's theory is that Respondent is engaged in a dispute with AMR who she alleges is the primary employer. She therefore asserts that because the New York picketing is specifically directed against KAL rather than AMR, such picketing is being directed against a person who is neutral to the primary dispute. She argues that although the picketing is taking place at a common situs (in New York) it is secondary conduct under standards enunciated in Sailors Union (Moore Dry Dock), 92 NLRB 447 (1950). (A fortiori, the picketing at KAL's cargo terminal in Los Angeles would, under this theory, clearly be secondary because AMR does not occupy that site.)

Although acknowledging that AMR, the alleged primary employer, is an RLA carrier and that the target of the picketing, KAL, is also an RLA carrier, the General Counsel asserts that the conduct is secondary boycott activity prohibited by the NLRA because the Respondent was acting on behalf of the employees of Triangle, an employer covered by the NLRA. She also asserts that the Respondent has enmeshed other neutrals who are covered by the NLRA by inducing its employees not to cross the picket line. In the case of Emery Air Freight, it is alleged that Respondent violated the Act by threatening to picket that company unless it honored the picket line at KAL's JFK facility.

The Respondent contends that because the "primary" (AMR) is an RLA carrier and because the target of the picketing, KAL, is also an RLA carrier, the picketing is not subject to the NLRA. It asserts that such activity is permissible under the RLA and, therefore, to the extent that drivers employed by freight forwarders and/or consolidaters chose to honor the picket line, this is merely incidental to lawful picketing activity.

Regarding the contention that it threatened to picket Emery Air Freight, this allegation is denied.

Based on the entire record in this case, including my observation of the demeanor of the witnesses, and after considering the briefs filed by counsel, I make the following

FINDINGS OF FACT

Before September 1983 KAL had its cargo-handling functions reformed by Trans-Mediterranean Airlines, which employed people represented by Local 851 IBT. In 1983 KAL obtained its own cargo facility at JFK (building 260) and entered into a contract with Triangle to provide certain cargo-handling services.[2] At the time of the transfer, KAL requested Triangle to hire about 20 employees of Trans-Mediterranean Airlines, and Triangle hired 12 of these people. Under the terms of the contract, which ran until 1985, KAL reimbursed Triangle on a per-pound basis.

In September 1985 KAL and Triangle renewed their contract with some modifications. Among the changes was that, during the period of this contract, Triangle was paid on a per-man-hour basis rather than a per-pound basis. This agreement was to remain in effect until midnight, 28 February 1987.[3]

In November 1986 KAL decided to solicit bids from various other companies to do its cargo-handling functions. On 28 January 1986 KAL awarded this work to AMR and on the same date notified Triangle that its contract would not be renewed. Triangle was therefore to cease operations at KAL's JFK terminal at midnight on 28 February, and AMR was to take over on 1 March.

About 20 or 21 February, William Genoese learned that Triangle was to be replaced by AMR. Genoese, in addition to being the secretary-treasurer and principal officer of Local 732 IBT, is also the director of the airline division of the International Brotherhood of Teamsters.[4] On or about 21 February, Genoese called KAL to get information regarding the change but was unsuccessful. On 24 February he sent a telegram to KAL reading:

> It has been brought to my attention that more than 60 members of the International Brotherhood of Teamsters employed by Triangle Maintenance will lose their jobs because Korean Airlines has changed contractors at JFK International Airport.
> Our members have a vested interest in these jobs. They were also members of our organization when your contractor was MTA.
> This is a request to meet with you as soon as possible to discuss job protection for our workers. Please contact my office immediately to set up a meeting before our members are irreparably hurt

[2] Triangle is a wholly independent corporation from KAL and provides a variety of services to a number of other airlines at JFK. Its employees are represented by Local 851 IBT in an airportwide bargaining unit. There is no evidence to suggest that KAL or any of Triangle's other customers participate in collective bargaining with Local 851 or are involved in grievance-handling functions under Triangle's contract with that union.

[3] In a nutshell, Triangle was responsible for putting cargo on KAL's planes for export out of the United States and for unloading KAL's planes for import to the United States. In conjunction with this, there obviously were a variety of other functions, including warehouse and document handling. Triangle generally had about 60 employees working at KAL's JFK cargo terminal, whereas KAL had about 20 employees directly employed by it.

[4] The airline division is a trade division of the IBT, which basically offers services to various local unions, which for the most part represent employees in the airline industry. It is not, however, a separate legal entity of the IBT, does not receive any dues or funding on its own, and does not file any separate forms (LM-2) with the Department of Labor.

Because it is conceded that the IBT is a labor organization within the meaning of the Act, I rejected Respondent's contention that the airline division of the IBT is not a labor organization within the meaning of Sec. 2(5) of the Act. See Electrical Workers IBEW (B. B. McCormick), 150 NLRB 363, 370–372 (1964), affd. 350 F.2d 791 (D.C. Cir. 1965).

> Under fair representation, this organization will take whatever economic action is needed to protect the rights & benefits of our members. We are duty-bound to represent these workers. This is very important and urgent. Please contact me so we can set up a meeting.

On or about 26 February, Genoese phoned Richard Janisse of AMR and asked if AMR intended to hire the employees of Triangle. Janisse told Genoese that his company had a contract with the Transport Workers Union and that he would have his attorney get back to him.

Also on or about 26 February, Genoese's attorney called Cordert Brothers, the law firm representing KAL, and was turned over to Benjamin Seligman who had been retained for labor advice. According to Seligman, Lippman asked for a meeting with KAL concerning the employees in question. He states that when he told Lippman that Triangle was the employer, Lippman replied that he wanted the workers to be covered by a Teamsters contract; that it was up to KAL to negotiate a new contract with Triangle; and that if there were no meeting, KAL would face problems. Lippman, although confirming a phone call he had with Seligman, denies that he said that KAL should renegotiate a contract with Triangle. He does, however, acknowledge that he said that he wanted the Teamsters to be protected. (In either event, I do not think the difference in their testimony is meaningful.)[5]

On 27 February, before AMR began work for KAL, Respondent commenced picketing at the entrance to KAL's building 260 at JFK. The picket sign used at this time stated:

> Korean Air Refuses > To Honor Teamsters Contract

Also a handbill was distributed that read:

> Korean Air has refused to honor Teamsters Contract covering the employees doing Teamsters work at this location.

At or about 10 a.m. on 27 February, Genoese called KAL's deputy general manager requesting that KAL meet to discuss KAL's termination of Triangle's contract. Shortly thereafter, the employees of Triangle who were employed at building 260 stopped working. When KAL compiained to Triangle's terminal manager about this work stoppage, the latter stated that he would take care of the problem. Within about 40 to 50 minutes the work stoppage ended and the Triangle employees resumed work. Regarding work stoppage, neither the General Counsel nor the Charging Parties have offered any evidence to establish that it was caused or induced by the Respondent. Indeed it seems more likely that in anticipation of the ending of their work the following day, these employees engaged in a brief wildcat strike.

On 28 February Respondent continued picketing at the entrance to building 260 in the manner described above. Also on that date Genoese sent a letter to AMR as follows:

> Dear Mr. Pasciuto:
> I'm sorry that we've been missing each other.
> What I would like to get from you is a little information about AMR Services Corp., a subsidiary of AMR Corp.
> I understand AMR Services Corp. may have entered into a labor agreement with a union representing its employees. If so, could you please give me the answers to these questions.
> 1. What is the name of the union:
> 2. Where are the workers covered by the contract located?
> 3. What are their job classifications?
> 4. When was the contract signed.
> 5. How long does it run?
> 6. How many workers were in the group when the contract was signed?
> 7. Was the contract certified by the U.S. Government?
> 8. How many workers are not covered by the contract?
> Most important of all, if there is a contract covering AMR Services Corp. employees, I would appreciate it very much if you would send me a copy right away. It is certainly public information and must be filed somewhere with the government.
> Finally, I would very much appreciate copies of any brochures you may have on the operations service of AMR Services Corp.
> Thanks for your cooperation.

Additionally, on 28 February Genoese wrote to KAL as follows:

> Dear Mr. Kim:
> The International Brotherhood of Teamsters has filed unfair labor practice charges against Korean Airlines at the National Labor Relations Board office at 16 Court Street in Brooklyn, New York.
> The charges, naming Korean Airlines as a co-employer, involve the fact that more than 60 of our members at Triangle Maintenance will lose their jobs because you have changed contractors at JFK Airport.
> I sent you a mailgram a week ago, asking that you contact me immediately so that we could set up a meeting to discuss job protection for our members. I later spoke to some Korean Airlines executives on the phone, but you have ducked the issue of a meeting.

---

[5] On 26 February the IBT, by William Genoese, filed an 8(a)(1) and (5) charge against Triangle and KAL. However, as it did not produce any supporting evidence, the charge was dismissed. The charge alleged:

> The employers have maintained a collective-bargaining relationship with the International Brotherhood of Teamsters as it concerns their joint employees employed at John F. Kennedy International Airport. The employers have failed to negotiate a subcontracting of the aforementioned work and have failed and refused to apply the terms and conditions of the existing collective bargaining agreement and to recognize the representative of the aforementioned employees at John F. Kennedy International Airport.

This is my second notice to you, in writing, that we must have a meeting before our members are irreparably hurt. Please contact me immediately at my office (212/686-8135).

Under fair representation, we are duty-bound to protect the rights of our members. We will do whatever is necessary to carry out this responsibility.

We need your cooperation.

At midnight 28 February, Triangle ceased working at building 260 and AMR took over. In this respect AMR clearly is a separate corporation from KAL, engaged by the latter to perform cargo-handling functions as a subcontractor. The Respondent has not taken the position that KAL and AMR are joint employers regarding AMR's employees at building 260, and I therefore shall conclude that they are separate entities in that regard. As noted previously, the General Counsel concedes that AMR, which is an affiliated company with American Airlines, is a "carrier" within the meaning of the Railway Labor Act. Also, as noted above, AMR has a collective-bargaining relationship with the Transport Workers Union covering, inter alia, the workers employed by it at building 260.

Since about 9 March, Respondent has continuously picketed the entrance of building 260 using a variety of picket signs. In addition to the sign already described, one of the signs read:

Teamsters Airline Division
Korean Air Unfair
Fired Union Workers
Wanted Jobs Back

Another sign read:

No Teamsters Should Cross This Line
Call Your Local Union

On March 2, Respondent distributed a handbill to people working at JFK and away from the site of the picketing. This read:

AMR Corp., the holding company which owns American Airlines and other subsidiaries, has gotten into bed with the Transport Workers Union and made a deal which threatens the jobs of workers throughout the airline industry.

The agreement enables AMR Services to make low-ball bids to airlines and airports that want to contract out their work. The enclosed article from Aviation Daily explains some of the operations of AMR Services.

AMR Services can provide cheap labor in such areas as ramp services, cargo and clerical operations and Skycap work.

AMR Services can do this because it starts its workers at $4 an hour with no hospitalization benefits, only five holidays and very limited vacations.

All this is permitted under the TWU's top-down contract. We are getting a copy of this contract, and we intended to expose this cozy arrangement.

The TWU is a bad organization, and Vice President John Kerrigan was part of the whole deal with AMR.

We believe AMR Services will be going after ramp service work throughout the country. This could mean that thousands of teamsters and members of other unions would find their jobs in jeopardy.

To protect the rights of all airline workers, we must start organizing AMR Services. Otherwise, AMR Services and the TWU can bring all airline workers down.

The agreement between the TWU and AMR Services runs from February 1984 through February 1988. It is a disgrace to the labor movement.

For 2 days, 12 and 13 March, the Respondent picketed KAL's cargo terminal at Thomas Bradley International Airport in Los Angeles, California. The picket sign read:

Teamsters Union
Korean Air Lines Unfair
Fired Workers Want To Go Back to Work

In relation to this picketing, a security guard at the terminal was told by one of the pickets that the picketing related to a dispute at JFK. It is noted that in Los Angeles, KAL uses a company called ARA Ground Services rather than AMR to perform the cargo-handling functions.[6]

On 30 March the Regional Director for Region 29, based on the instant charges, filed in the United States District Court, Eastern District of New York, a petition under Section 10(l) of the Act seeking to enjoin Respondent's picketing. On 30 March, Judge Eugene H. Nickerson denied the injunction holding, in substance, that the matter was within the jurisdiction of the Railway Labor Act and not the National Labor Relations Act. The Regional Director's request for reargument was denied on 28 April.[7]

The General Counsel presented a witness, James Hetherington, a manager of Emery Air Freight, who testified that someone who identified himself as William Genoese called him on 6 April. He states that this person said that he saw an Emery truck at building 260 and that if the truck was not removed, a picket line would be put up in front of Emery or that Emery's employees would be pulled off the job. In fact, no such picketing or strike ever occurred at Emery.

[6] It is not clear whether ARA Ground Services would be classified as a "carrier" within the meaning of the RLA in connection with its services for KAL at Los Angeles. I note that in a decision dated 17 April 1986, the National Mediation Board concluded that ARA fell within the jurisdiction of the RLA concerning services one of its wholly owned subsidiaries performed for an airline at Baltimore-Washington International Airport. ARA Ground Services (BWI), 13 NMB 175 (1986).

[7] Subsequent to the 10(l) proceeding, AMR sought an injunction claiming that Respondent's picketing was for recognition and therefore not subject to the injunction prohibitions of the Norris La Guardia Act. Judge Nickerson also heard that case and concluded that because the picketing did not have any "present recognitional" intent and because the picketing did not in any other manner violate the RLA, no injunction should issue. AMR Services Corp. v. Teamsters, 658 F.Supp. 259 (D.C.N.Y. 1987).

Genoese denies that he ever spoke to Hetherington and specifically denies making any threats to Emery. Further, the Respondent contends, correctly I think, that the evidence is insufficient to establish, pursuant to section 901 of the Federal Rules of Evidence, the identity of the caller. Thus, unlike evidence to establish the identity of a caller, through the testimony of a person who dials his or her correct number (i.e., an outgoing call) it is not sufficient to establish the identity of a caller merely by the caller's self-identification to the witness (i.e., an incoming call) U.S. v. Benjamin, 328 F.2d 854, 861 fn. 3 (2d Cir. 1964), cert. denied 377 U.S. 993 (1964). See Wigmore Evidence, subsec. 2155(c). Thus, in U.S. v. Register, 496 F.2d 1072, 1077 (5th Cir. 1974), the court stated, "[A] telephone call out of the blue from one who identifies himself as X may not be, in itself, sufficient authentication of the call as in fact coming from X."

In the present case Hetherington had no previous or subsequent contact with Genoese and, therefore, not being familiar with his voice, was unable to identify Genoese as the caller. Moreover, the scenario that the caller described (threatened picketing or strike of Emery if the truck was not removed from building 260) never came to pass.

Pursuant to rule 901 the identity of a telephone caller may be shown by circumstantial evidence in the absence of the witnesses' ability to identify the caller's voice. See Federal Rules on Evidence, Advisory Committee Note, and cases cited there. Nevertheless, I am persuaded that the degree of evidence necessary to establish Genoese as the caller in the present case is simply not sufficient. For example, in Van Riper v. U.S., 13 F.2d 961, 968 (2d Cir. 1926), Judge Learned Hand writing for the court stated:

> If, for example, a man were to write a letter, properly addressed to another, and were to receive a telephone call in answer, professing to come from the addressee, and showing acquaintance with the contents of the letter, it would in our judgement be good enough identification of the speaker to allow in the proof, though in the end, or course, the issue of identity would be for the jury. This is the reasoning on which a complete correspondence is admitted, once its origin is established, so long as it continues to be consecutive in substance.

The advisory committee's note to the Federal Rules of Evidence, at example 4, states that "a document or telephone conversation may be shown to have emanated from a person by virtue of its disclosing information of facts known peculiarly to him."[8] In the present case, however, it was not shown that the caller, in disclosing the presence of Emery's truck at KAL's terminal, was dislcosing facts known peculiarly to Genoese. The fact of the truck's presence at building 260 may welf have been known to the pickets, but it was not known to them exclusively. The fact was known to KAL, to KAL's guard service, and to AMR. Although I am not suggesting that any person employed by the latter entities made the phone call to Hetherington using Genoese's name, it remains that the fact disclosed was not one known exclusively by Genoese as the alleged caller.[9]

On 9 April 1987 Jackie Presser, president of the IBT, sent a mailgram to KAL as follows:

> On behalf of the nearly two million members of the International Brotherhood of Teamsters, I am writing to express our outrage and strong protest over the recent actions taken by your organization aimed at circumventing the fair and long-established collective bargainging system in the United States. Your actions are a bad reflection not only on the relations you have with your employees, but on your entire country.
> As your are well aware, Korean Airlines, in collusion with AMR Services in the United States, had AMR Services enter into a "top-down" contract with the Transport Workers Union. This agreement allowed your airline to eliminate those employees who are paid the prevailing wage and represented by the Teamsters Union, under contract with Triangle Maintenace. More importantly, it allowed your airline to subcontract with AMR Services, whose employees are represented under the "top-down" agreement, and paid substandard wages. This practice has serious implications for the U.S. labor movement and constitutes unfair labor practices of the first degree.
> This organization has made numerous unsuccessful attempts to meet with officials of your airline. We are willing to discuss this situation, and believe such a meeting would be the first step towards an equitable solution.
> I look forward to hearing from you.

On the same date Presser sent a somewhat similar mailgram to the Federation of Korean Trade Union as follows:

> With our unions sharing strong ties of friendship, I have taken the liberty of writing you to solicit your support on a situation which affects many Teamster members and could have a negative impact on the entire U.S. Labor movement.

[8] If a caller (X) asked the witness, for example, if he had received the letter the caller had sent regarding subject (Y) which letter was shown to have been sent by the caller, then the witness testimony clearly would be sufficient to identify the caller as Mr. X. See, for example Jarvis v. U.S., 90 F.2d 243, 245 (1st Cir. 1937); U.S. v. Fassoulis, 445 F.2d 13 (2d Cir. 1971).

[9] In a sense KAL and AMR would have been the beneficiaries of such a call. Thus, only 6 days before the call was made, Judge Nickerson denied the 10(l) petition seeking to enjoin the picketing on the grounds that the parties involved were all subject to the Railway Labor Act and not the National Labor Relations Act. It would therefore have been in the Charging Parties' interests to establish a threat of picketing directed to an employer who was within the NLRA's jurisdiction.

Korean Airlines Co., Ltd. had a contract for three years with Triangle Aviation Services, Inc. for Triangle to provide various jobs in New York and California. All these employees were Teamsters. In February, 1987, Korean Airlines, in collusion with AMR Services (a subsidiary of AMR Corporation, which is the parent company of American Airlines) entered into a "top-down" contract with the Transport Workers Union (AFL-CIO). A "top-down" deal, as it is referred to in the U.S. labor movement, is an agreement between a labor union and management that all employees of the company will be included in the collective bargaining agreement.

AMR Services had no real employees at the time this agreement was made with the Transport Workers Union. The contract, which provides for grossly inferior wages and benefits in comparison to the rest of the U.S. unionized airline workforce, was never voted on by a single member or ratified. It was designed solely as a vehicle for Korean Airlines to eliminate its higher-costing teamsters employed by Triangle and replace them with Transport Workers Union members on a substandard scale. As expected, Korean Airlines recently cancelled its contract with Triangle Maintenance and contracted with AMR Services to provide the same work that Triangle had previously provided. This caused the senseless loss of 60 Teamster jobs.

This shameful contract between Korean Airlines' subcontractor, AMR Services, and the Transport Workers Union allows TWU to steal other unions' members while it simultaneously benefits Korean Airlines, allowing it to undercut their operating costs by circumventing the collective bargaining system. Korean Airlines has refused to meet with Teamster officials, and also tried unsuccessfully to stop Teamster members from picketing at the job sites. United States Courts have ruled against the airline on this matter and the Teamsters are continuing to picket.

We have contacted Korea's ambassador to the United States, Kyung-Won Kim, and Korean Labor Minister Lee Hu Ki. As a mutual friend of our union and in the name of labor solidarity, I would certainly appreciate any assistance you could give on this matter.

Analysis

Section 8(b)(4)(i) and (ii)(B) of the National Labor Relations Act was designed to prohibit secondary boycotts.[10] This provision of the Act prohibits certain types of conduct by labor organizations having an object of enmeshing neutral persons in disputes not their own. NLRB v. Denver Building Council, 341 U.S. 675, 692 (1951).[11]

Setting aside for the moment the contentions whether this dispute falls within the parameters of the NLRA or the RLA, the General Counsel's theory is esssentially as follows. In numerous cases when a union has protested the substitution of a subcontractor whose employees were represented by it with a subcontractor whose employees are either unrepresented or represented by another union, the Board has concluded that the Union's primary dispute has been with the new subcontractor. See Teamsters Local 85 (William Volker), 253 NLRB 632 (1980); Service Employees Local 73 (Andy Frain), 239 NLRB 295 (1978); Teamsters Local 732 (Servair Maintenance), 229 NLRB 392 (1977). Thus, under this line of cases, the General Counsel is correct in identifying, under NLRA precedent, AMR as being a person with whom the Respondent has a primary dispute.[12] Moreover under the same line of precedent the General Counsel is probably correct in identifying KAL as being a secondary or neutral person.[13]

[10] Sec. 8(b)(4)(i) and (ii)(B) in pertinent part reads as follows:

> 8(b) It shall be an unfair labor practice for a labor organization or its agents—
> . . . .
> (4)(i) to engage in, or to induce or encourage any individual employed by any person engaged in commerce or in an industry affecting commerce to engage in, a strike or a refusal in the course of his employment to use, manufacture, process, transport, or otherwise handle or work on any goods, articles, materials, or commodities or to perform any services; or (ii) threaten, coerce, or restrain any person engaged in commerce or in an industry affecting commerce, where in either case an object thereof is—
> (B) forcing or requiring any person to cease using, selling, handling, transporting, or otherwise dealing in the products of any other producer, processor, or manufacture, or to cease doing business with any other person, or forcing or requiring any other employer to recognize or bargain with a labor organization as the representative of his employees unless such labor organization has been certified as the representative of such employees under the provisions of section 9: Provided, That nothing contained in this clause (B) shall be construed to make unlawful, where not otherwise unlawful, any primary strike or primary picketing . . . .

[11] In NLRB v. Denver Building Trades Council, supra, the Union contended that the district court's conclusion regarding jurisdiction in the 10(l) proceeding for a preliminary injunction was res judicata about the subsequent Board proceedings on the merits. The court rejected this contention in that case as I reject the Respondent's similar contention in this case.

[12] Because of the documentary evidence in this case, there is little room for dispute about the fact that the Respondent objects to AMR's alleged substandard contract with another union.

[13] KAL would only be considered as a "primary" if it is deemed to have been a joint employer with Triangle of the cargo-handling personnel doing work at building 260. If that were the case, the Respondent could argue that KAL is a person with whom it has a primary dispute because KAL discharged the employees who were represented by a local of the Respondent. Such a theory would, however, be difficult to sustain because a joint-employer relationship is not easily established. Thus, in Cabot Corp., 223 NLRB 1388 (1976), the Board held that the determining factors for showing a joint-employer relationship in an owner-contractor situation is whether the owner:

> . . . exercises, or has the right to exercise, sufficient control over the labor relations policies of the contractor or over the wages, hours, and working conditions of the contractor's employees from which it may be reasonably inferred that the owner is in fact an employer of the employees.

See also Clinton's Ditch Cooperative Co. v. NLRB, 778 F.2d 132 (2d Cir. 1985), cert. denied 107 S.Ct. 67 (1986); Squibb-Beechnut v. NLRB, 443 F.2d 1066 (6th Cir. 1971); Laerco Transportation, 269 NLRB 324 (1984); Teamsters Local 85, supra at 635; Service Employees Local 73, supra at 305. Teamsters Local 732, supra at 402–403.

When, as here, a primary and a secondary occupy a common site (at least at JFK airport), the Board has established certain standards for determining whether picketing such a site has an object that would be prohibited or permitted by the secondary boycott provisions of the NLRA. In Sailors Union (Moore Dry Dock), 92 NLRB 547, 549 (1950), the Board stated:

> When a secondary employer is harboring the situs of a dispute between the union and a primary employer, the right of neither the union to picket nor the secondary employer to be free from picketing can be absolute. The enmeshing of premises and situs qualifies both rights. In the kind of situation that exists in this case, we believe that picketing of the premises of secondary employer is primary if it meets the following conditions: (a) the picketing is strictly limited to times when the situs of dispute is located on the secondary employer's premises; (b) at the time of the picketing the primary employer is engaged in its normal business at the situs; (c) the picketing is limited to places reasonably close to the location of the situs; and (d) the picketing discloses clearly that the dispute is with the primary employer.[14]

Therefore, assuming NLRA jurisdiction in this case, it would be clear that the picketing at JFK would have a secondary object under the Moore Dry Dock standards because the picket signs identify KAL as the primary rather than AMR, which under the preceding analysis would be the proper primary. Also, assuming that AMR is the primary and that KAL is a secondary, the 2 days of picketing of KAL at Los Angeles would similarly be secondary activity because KAL is named on the picket signs and because AMR, the primary, is not at that location.

The problem faced by the General Counsel and the Charging Parties is that under their theory of this case, the primary (AMR) and the target of the Union's picketing (KAL)[15] are both "carriers" within the meaning of the Railway Labor Act. And under that Act, secondary boycotts are not illegal. In Burlington Northern RR Co. v. Brotherhood of Maintenance of Way Employees, 125 LRRM 2073, (1987) the union, which was engaged in a primary strike against Maine Central, expanded its picketing activity to include a variety of other railroads including Burlington Northern that interconnected with Maine Central. These "secondary" railroads sought injunctive relief arguing that the Norris La Guardia Act's prohibition on Federal courts from issuing injunctions in labor disputes did not apply because secondary boycotts were contrary to the intentions of the Railway Labor Act. Justice Brennan on behalf of the court stated (125 LRRM at 2080–2082):

> Indeed, this Court has already refused to find in the silence of the RLA an intent to prohibit secondary picketing. In Trainmen v. Jacksonville Terminal Co., supra, we held that state courts may not enjoin secondary picketing in a railway dispute after parties exhaust the RLA's procedures. We noted that Congress had not provided the courts with the standards needed to distinguish primary from secondary picketing, and that "parties who have unsuccessfully exhausted the Railway Labor Act's procedures for resolution of a major dispute . . . [may] employ the ful range of whatever peaceful economic power they can muster, so long as its use conflicts with no other obligation imposed by federal law." 394 U.S. at 392. We concluded that, in railway disputes, "until Congress acts, picketing—whether characterized as primary or secondary—must be deemed conduct protected against state proscription." Id., at 392–393.
> Petitioners next maintain that when, as here, the RLA does not provide a clear answer to a particular problem, this Court has looked to the National Labor Relations Act (NLRA) "for assistance in construing" the RLA. Trainmen v. Jacksonville Terminal Co., supra, at 383. Petitioners argue that the NLRA embodies Congress' view that secondary activity is an unfair labor practice, and that this view should govern our construction of the RLA.
> The RLA does not contain a "sweeping prohibition" of secondary activity; instead it "describes and condemns specific union conduct directed to specific objectives." Carpenters v. NLRB, 357 U.S. 93, 98, 42 LRRM 2243 (1958). Moreover, the NLRA does not permit employers to seek injunctions against the activity that it does prohibit. It grants to the National Labor Relations Board (NLRB) exclusive authority to seek injunctions against some forms of secondary activity. 29 U.S.C. § 158(b)(4), 160(j), 160(l). Thus, Congressional policy, as expressed in the NLRA, remains that employers are not permitted to obtain injunctions of secondary activity. Finally, it is significant that Congress excluded rail carriers and rail employees from the coverage of the NLRA: even the NLRB has no authority to seek injunctions in railway disputes. §§ 152(2), 152(3). We conclude that the NLRA could not make clearer Congress' intent to prohibit federal courts from issuing the injunctions sought in this case.
> . . . .
> Turning to this case, petitioners argue that a ban on secondary picketing may be inferred from the general language of Subsection 2 First. Section 2 First states that:
> It shall be the duty of all carriers, their officers, agents, and employees to exert every reasonable effort to make and maintain agreements

[14] It is recognized that these standards should not be mechanically or inflexibly applied. Electrical Workers Local 861 (Plaueke Electric), 135 NLRB 250 (1962).

[15] The General Counsel and the Charging Parties contend that there were a number of other neutral NLRA employers who were enmeshed in the dispute, these being freight forwarders and consolidaters who made deliveries to or pickups from KAL's cargo terminal. Yet except for some evidence that the drivers were merely asked to honor the picket line, there is no evidence of any conduct within the meaning of Sec. 8(b)(4)(i) or (ii) vis a vis these employers.

concerning rates of pay, rules, and working conditions, and to settle all disputes, whether arising out of the application of such agreements or otherwise, in order to avoid any interruption to commerce or to the operation of ay carrier growing out of any dispute between the carrier and the employees thereof. 45 U.S.C. § 152 First.

Petitioners place particular emphasis on the duty this section places on employees to attempt to settle disputes and thereby avoid any interruption to interstate commerce. This duty, petitioners correctly note, is consistent with the major purpose of Congress in passing the RLA: "to prevent, if possible, wasteful strikes and interruptions of interstate commerce" . . . Petitioners conclude that construing the RLA to allow unions to resort to secondary activity is manifestly inconsistent with the major purpose of the RLA.

Although we agree with petitioners that the primary goal of the RLA is to settle strikes and avoid interruptions to commerce, we see nothing in the RLA to indicate that Congress intended to permit federal courts to enjoin secondary activity as a means toward that end. An injunction does not settle a dispute—it simply disables one of the parties. Moreover, "in view of the interests of both parties in avoiding a strike," Virginian R. Co., 300 U.S., at 552, the availability of such self-help measures as secondary picketing may increase the effectiveness of the RLA in settling major disputes by creating an incentive for the parties to settle prior to exhaustion of the statutory procedures:

Furthermore, as this case illustrates, § 10 of the RLA provides a ready mechanism for the Executive Branch to intervene and interrupt any self-help measures by invoking an Emergency Board and thereby imposing at a minimum a 60-day cooling-off period. If the Board's recommendations are not initially accepted by the parties. Congress has the power to enforce the Board's recommendation by statute, as it has done here. Allowing secondary picketing in the self helped period is thus not inconsistent with the structure or purpose of the Act, and may in fact increase the likelihood of settlement prior to self-help. This therefore not a case in which the "the scheme of the Railway Labor Act could not begin to work without judicial involvement." Chicago & North Western, supra, at 595 (Brennan, J. dissenting).

While opinions regarding the RLA's success in meeting its goals have varied over time, it does appear that under the RLA labor and management have been able to resolve most conflicts without resort to secondary picketing. We decline, at this advanced stage of the RLA's development, to find in it an implied limit on a union's resort to secondary activity. Instead, "if Congress should now find that abuses in the nature of secondary activities have arisen in the railroad industry . . . it is for the Congress, and not the Courts, to strike the balance between the uncontrolled power of management and labor to further their respective interest.'" Trainmen v. Jacksonville Terminal Co., 394 U.S., at 392.

The NLRB can assert jurisdiction and find a violation of the secondary boycott provisions of the NLRA when the primary is an employer within the meaning of the NLRA, but when the secondary is either a railroad or an airline, (i.e., a carrier within the meaning of the RLA). Steelworkers v. NLRB, 376 U.S. 492 (1964).[18] Conversely, the General Counsel argues that when the primary is a carrier within the meaning of the RLA and the secondary is an NLRA employer, the secondary boycott provisions of the NLRA will also prevail. In this respect she relies on Marriott In-Flite Services v. Transport Workers Local 504, 557 F.2d 295 (2d Cir. 1977). In that case the union had a primary dispute with an airline (KLM) regarding KLM's discontinuance of meal preparations by its own employees who were represented by Local 504 TWU and KLM's subcontracting of such work to Marriott which was an NLRA employer. The union picketed Marriott. In the face of this activity, an action was brought, pursuant to Section 303 of the NLRA which permits an employer to sue a union for damages for activity which would be violative of Section 8(b)(4) of the Act. The court denied the Union's Motion for Summary Judgment, which was based on the union's contention that the RLA rather than the NLRA was applicable. The court in ordering the case remanded for trial stated:

> Appellees rely heavily on the opinion of the Supreme Court in Brotherhood of R.R. Trainmen v. Jacksonville Terminal Co., 394 U.S. 369, 89 S.Ct. 1109, 22 L. Ed. 2d 344 (1969). This reliance is misplaced. The dispute in Jacksonville Terminal was over the validity of a Florida law banning secondary picketing. The parties were two railroads and a railway union. The Court held that the Florida statute was invalid because federal labor law had preempted the field. The Court explicily did not decide whether the activity at stake was "primary" or "secondary," or whether it was protected by the RLA.
> . . . .
> The Jacksonville Terminal opinion, moreover, was careful to distinguish the case from one very like the present appeal:
> > Whatever might be said where railway organizations act as agents for, or as joint ventures with unions subject to the NLRA, see International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers v. NLRB, 122 U.S. App. D.C. 8, 350 F.2d 791 (1965); or where railway unions are engaged in a dispute on behalf of their nonrail employees; or where a rail carrier seeks a remedy against the conduct of nonrailway employees, see United Steelworkers v. NLRB, 376 U.S. 492, 501 (1964); Teamsters Union v. New York, N. H. & H. R. Co., 350 U.S. 155 [76 S. Ct.

[18] See also Service Employees Local 73, supra; Teamsters Local 732, supra.

> 100 L.Ed. 166] (1956), none of these is this case. This is a railway labor dispute, pure and simple.
> 394 U.S. at 377 (emphasis added). Thus, we conclude that the decision in Jacksonville Terminal does not support the result reached in the district court below.

Despite the above-cited case, neither the General Counsel nor the Charging Parties have cited any precedent holding that when the primary is an RLA employer and when the secondary activity is directed against an RLA employer, the provisions of the NLRA would come into effect. Indeed to reach such a conclusion would on the face of it be inconsistent with the Supreme Court's holding in Burlington Northern.

In making her argument, the General Counsel relies almost exclusively on dicta in Jacksonville Terminal where the court said that its conclusion that an injunction was precluded, might not apply to a situation "where railway unions are engaged in a dispute on behalf of their nonrailway employees." As such the General Counsel argues that because there is evidence showing that the Respondent was acting on behalf of Triangles employees and because those employees (unlike the employees of KAL or AMR) were at the time of their work at building 260, nonrailway employees, the holding of Jacksonville Terminal and Burlington Northern would not apply. I disagree.

For one thing Triangle, having been replaced by KAL on 28 February 1987, no longer is involved in this case and under the General Counsel's theory is not the primary employer. Thus the language in Jacksonville Terminal describing a union acting on behalf of its nonrailway employees implies to me that it is acting on behalf of such employees vis a vis a primary employer. Indeed none of the cases cited in the quoted paragraph of Jacksonville Terminal involved situations in which both the primary and the secondary employer/persons were carriers within the meaning of the RLA.

In the present case the primary is AMR and the only person against whom "secondary" activity has been directed is KAL. Yet because both of these companies are "carriers" within the meaning of the RLA the secondary conduct of picketing KAL at JFK or at Thomas Bradley Airport in Los Angeles is lawful under the holding of Burlington Northern. Thus, under the aforesaid case, the picketing of KAL is legal activity and would in a sense be legally equivalent to primary picketing. Therefore, if picketing of KAL by the Respondent is legal conduct, the fact that the pickets ask truckdrivers employed by persons making deliveries to or from KAL to honor the picket line must be construed as conduct incidental to the Respondent's lawful activity. Accordingly, being merely inducements to honor a legal picket line at KAL's premises I cannot see how such inducements would constitute unlawful secondary activity against other persons within the meaning of Section 8(b)(4)(i)(B) of the Act. NLRB v. International Rice Milling, 341 U.S. 665 (1951); Newspaper & Mail Deliverers (Interborough News), 90 NLRB 2135 (1950).

Finally, because I have already concluded that the evidence concerning the alleged threat to Emery Air Freight has not been shown to have originated from the Respondent, I shall recommend that this allegation also be dismissed.[17]

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. The Respondent, International Brotherhood of Teamsters, Chauffeurs, Warehousemen and Helpers of America, AFL–CIO, is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

2. The Charging Parties, Korean Airlines Co. Ltd. and AMR Services Corporation are "carriers" within the meaning of the Railway Labor Act.

3. The Respondent's picketing of Korean Airlines is lawful conduct under the decision in Burlington Northern RR Co. v. Brotherhood of Maintenance of Way Employees, 125 LRRM 2073 (1987).

4. Appeals to individuals engaged by persons making deliveries to or from Korean Airlines not to cross the aforesaid picket lines do not constitute unlawful secondary boycott activity.

5. The General Counsel has failed to establish by competent evidence that the Respondent has engaged in any conduct prohibited by Section 8(b)(4)(i) or (ii)(B) against Emery Air Freight or Triangle Aviation Services Inc.

On these findings of fact and conclusions of law and on the entire record, I issue the following recommended[18]

ORDER

On the entire record in this case, I recommend that this consolidated complaint be dismissed.

[17] As noted previously, although Triangle is an NLRA employer, and would, under the General Counsel's theory be secondary, there is no evidence that the Respondent induced or encouraged individuals employed by this company to engage in a strike or work stoppage within the meaning of Sec. 8(b)(4)(i) of the Act.

[18] If no exceptions are filed as provided by Sec. 102.46 of the Board's Rules and Regulations, the findings, conclusions, and recommended Order shall, as provided in Sec. 102.48 of the Rules, be adopted by the Board and all objections to them shall be deemed waived for all purposes.

DECISION AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN STEPHENS AND MEMBERS JOHANSEN AND BABSON

On December 30, 1986, Administrative Law Judge Russell M. King Jr. issued the attached decision. The General Counsel filed exceptions and a supporting brief, and the Respondent filed a response to the General Counsel's brief as well as cross-exceptions and a supporting brief.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the decision and record in light of the exceptions, cross-exceptions, and briefs and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings, and conclusions and to adopt the recommended Order as modified.

The judge found that the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act by its unilateral and untimely withdrawal from a multiemployer bargaining group, the Greater Cleveland Roofing Contractors' Association (the Association), and by its subsequent refusal to sign the collective-bargaining agreement reached by the Association and the Union on August 19, 1985.[2] The Respondent contends that its withdrawal, part of a general dissolution of the Association by all its members, was justified by "special circumstances," i.e., by the Union's attempts to fragment the Association and by the Union's course of bad-faith bargaining during negotiations. We agree with the judge, for the reasons set forth below, that the Union did not attempt to fragment the Association and that it did not engage in bad-faith bargaining during its negotiations with the Association.

1. As the judge noted, the parties' collective-bargaining agreement provided for termination in writing by either party on or before December 31, 1984. On December 26, 1984, Union Business Agent Michael Branca sent a notice of termination and request for negotiations for a new agreement to each employer member of the Association and to employers with which the Union had a collective-bargaining relationship but which were not members of the Association. Branca did not send a letter to the Association. The Respondent urges that by this letter the Union was seeking individual negotiations with members of the Association. The evidence, however, does not support this contention. Branca testified that the notices were sent to individual employers rather than to the Association itself because several timely withdrawals from the Association had already occurred during December 1984, that he expected more timely withdrawals to occur, that the Union was not certain which employers were in or out of the bargaining group, and that the Union wished to make certain that all employers received the notice of termination. Branca further testified without contradiction that no individual negotiations with any Association members took place before March 5, 1985, when the Association itself commenced negotiations with the Union. The Respondent presented no documentary evidence or testimony to refute Branca's testimony.

The Respondent makes a similar argument regarding the Union's March 25, 1985 letter requesting the signing of an interim agreement, sent both to Association members and to nonmember employers. The judge credited Branca's testimony that this letter and the accompanying interim agreement, which extended the terms of the old agreement until a new agreement could be reached, were sent to Association members in error, and the Respondent has presented no testimonial or documentary evidence to refute Branca's testimony. We also note, as did the judge, that no Association member signed the interim agreement and that negotiations between the Association and the Union continued after the letter was sent. In our view, based on the evidence uncontradicted in the record and credited by the judge, neither the December 26, 1984 letter nor the March 25 letter, or the two letters taken together, indicate that the Union sought either to establish individual negotiations with Association employers in derogation of the Association's authority or to undermine the authority of the Association.

2. As noted above, the Respondent excepts to the judge's failure to conclude that the Union engaged in bad-faith bargaining that justified its withdrawal from the Association. In so doing, the Respondent attacks virtually every aspect of the Union's conduct during bargaining and contends that the Union engaged in bad-faith bargaining designed to disrupt the negotiations. We, however, find no merit in the Respondent's exception and we adopt the judge's finding that the Union did not bargain in bad faith. During the course of the negotiations for a new contract, the Association and the Union met about nine times between March 5 and the June 19 dissolution of the Association. Briefly, as outlined as far as possible by the Respondent's own exhibits concerning the meetings, the negotiating sessions progressed as follows.

[1] As noted by the judge, the complaint was amended at the hearing to delete all Respondent Employers except Warren Roofing and Insulating Co. and Standard Roofing Co. On July 28, 1987, the Board granted the General Counsel's motion to sever from the complaint any allegations pertaining to Warren Roofing and Insulating Co. and to remand those complaint allegations to the Regional Director for settlement. Thus, the sole remaining Respondent is Standard Roofing Co. The case caption has been amended accordingly.

The parties met first on March 5. At this session the Union presented no proposals but agreed to meet with its membership and to present proposals to the Association after the membership meeting.[3] The Association proposed numerous changes to the old agreement or past practice, including the right to employ helpers, or "pre-apprentices," in place of journeymen roofers, without restriction. The union representatives told the Association that the union membership would meet March 11 and that its proposals would be forthcoming after the meeting.

The next session was on April 1. At this session the Union presented 16 proposals, none of which were ultimately included in the negotiated contract. The parties also agreed to a "dangerous chemicals" provision, eliminated the breaks provision, and discussed the use of helpers in place of journeymen to reduce labor costs. Concerning the latter, according to the testimony of Lally, the Association's spokesman in negotiations, the Union orally raised the possibility of a "targeted jobs proposal," whereby employers would seek the Union's permission to substitute helpers for journeymen on a job-by-job basis. The Union expressed flexibility on the issue of a helper category, but stated that it would not agree to a proposal that lacked safeguards and that it would submit a proposal at the next session.

At the next session, held on April 17, the parties discussed a proposed union clause on work preservation and the use of helpers. The Union proposed a "targeted jobs" system, which the employers stated would not work. The next meeting was on April 22, at which the parties discussed, among other things, wage data distributed by the Association, the helper category and what terms were acceptable to the Union, the targeted jobs proposal, and a possible wage rollback. The Union stated that it would try to formulate a helper proposal and present it in writing at the next meeting. According to Lally's testimony, the Association reduced its original proposal on the maximum ratio of helpers to journeymen from 100 percent to not more than 75 percent. The parties met on April 27, but no minutes of this meeting were kept by the Association. The Respondent's witness testified that at that meeting the Association lowered its offer on the ratio of helpers to journeymen on each job from not more than 50 percent to not more than 40 percent to not more than 33-1/3 percent. The Union made no counterproposals.

On April 30, the parties met again. The Union presented a "pre-apprentices clause," whereby preapprentices would be paid 40 percent of the journeyman rate and would be used to complete crews when all journeymen were working. The Union also proposed a 3-year contract with a wage freeze the first year and $1 raises the second and third years. The Association presented a final offer of employment at the journeyman rate under the old contract; the use of preapprentices to constitute up to one-third of the work force; the payment by the employer of certain benefits for preapprentices; contract duration and a wage freeze of 2 years; overtime of time-and-one-half except Sundays and holidays; and $10 reporting pay. The Association's spokesman told the union representatives that the Union's proposals were unacceptable because they were inconsistent with reducing labor costs and that introducing their counterproposal "at this late hour" was inconsistent with the party's ground rules. The Union's spokesmen told the Association that to ask their membership to agree to the helper proposal would be to ask them to vote themselves out of a job and that a change in the provision (which the Association rejected) might make the proposal more palatable.[4] Union Spokesman Branca asked if the Association would consider Federal mediation, but denied that this suggestion meant that he viewed the negotiations as at impasse and asserted that the Union was willing to work under the old contract on a day-to-day basis, but that the Union could not accept the Association's final offer.[5]

The parties met next on May 10. The Union presented written proposals that new wage rates be effective May 1 and be frozen for the duration of the contract (2 years); $13 reporting pay; and the use of probationary apprentices at 40 percent as long as all journeymen were working. The Association rejected the last proposal. The Union agreed to take the Association's last proposal back to its members, but indicated again that the preapprentice issue would probably cause it to be rejected, and again asked for Federal mediation.

On June 19 the parties met again. According to Lally's testimony, the Union, at the request of the [3] Union Business Agent Branca testified that the Union's failure to present proposals at this meeting was caused by his illness and hospital stay.

[4] The union membership voted to reject the Association's final offer on May 5 or 6.

[5] The Union and the Association apparently did meet with the Federal mediator on April 23, but the record does not reflect what transpired at the meeting.

Association spokesman, distributed a "letter of understanding," apparently under discussion in the Union's negotiations with nonassociation employers. The letter contained a provision authorizing the use of probationary employees "in quoting for roofing work which is likely to be lost to nonunion contractors." The following language had been stricken out by hand: "The ratio [of journeymen to probationary apprentices] will not be less than 1 Journeyman to 1 Probationary Apprentice per Project unless a higher ratio of Journeymen to Probationary Apprentices is requested by the Contractor." The Association suggested that this language be restored and that language relating to the Union's discretion in authorizing the use of probationary apprentices be deleted. The union representatives then told the Association that they needed to discuss the letter of understanding. The Association members agreed to disband the group on June 19 and the Union was notified formally by letter on June 24 that the Association had disbanded and that the contractors were seeking negotiations on an individual basis.

Under Section 8(d) of the Act, an employer and a union must "meet at reasonable times and confer in good faith with respect to wages, hours, and terms and conditions of employment . . . but such obligation does not compel either party to agree to a proposal or require the making of a concession." NLRB v. Reed & Prince Mfg. Co, 305 F.2d 131, 134 (1st Cir. 1953), cert. denied 346 U.S. 887 (1953). In the course of bargaining "[a] party is entitled to stand firm on a position if he reasonably believes that it is fair and proper or that he has sufficient bargaining strength to force the other party to agree." Atlanta Hilton & Tower, 271 NLRB 1600, 1603 (1984) (citation omitted).

In the case at hand, it is clear from both the minutes of the bargaining sessions and the testimony of witnesses at the hearing that the Respondent sought to reduce its labor costs through a curtailment of some economic benefits contained in the expired contract and through discretion in its use of helpers who were to work for a wage rate significantly lower than that of journeymen. It is also clear that the Union sought to augment the economic position of the employees and to forestall, limit, or place controls on the use of helpers by the employers. The Union's failure to accede to the Association's general position that it wanted to cut labor costs or to its position that its member employers should have discretion in the use of helpers is not, of itself, an indication of bad-faith bargaining. In assessing the lawfulness of a party's conduct in bargaining, the Board's inquiry is whether, based on the context of the party's total conduct, it was seeking to frustrate agreement to a contract or lawfully engaging in hard bargaining to negotiate a contract that it considers desirable. Ibid. We note that the Union met with the Respondent regularly, exchanged proposals albeit with some delays, modified or dropped some demands, and agreed to some of the Respondent's proposals. We do not find, under all the circumstances of this case, that the Union's failure to present proposals at the parties' first meeting, some of its initial proposals, its refusal to accede to the Association's proposals concerning the use of helpers, or its presentation of proposals intended to augment the economic position of its members are indicia of bad faith. Therefore, we find, based on the Union's total conduct in negotiations, that the evidence does not support a finding that the Union engaged in bad-faith bargaining.[6] We, accordingly, further find that the Respondent's contention that the Union's conduct justified the Respondent's untimely withdrawal from the Association is without merit and we conclude that the Respondent's conduct violated Section 8(a)(5).[7]

3. In her brief to the judge, the General Counsel moved to amend the complaint to include factual averments regarding the reformation of the Association in August and the Association's execution of a collective-bargaining agreement with the Union, and to allege further violations of Section 8(a)(5) arising out of the Respondent's refusal to acknowledge that it was bound by the signed agreement and its failure to implement its terms. The judge denied the General Counsel's motion to amend, but, despite his denial of the motion, found that the Respondent had violated Section 8(a)(5) by "refusing to become a signatory to the collective-bargaining agreement reached by the Association and the Union on 19 August 1985," and ordered the Respondent to "[f]orthwith sign and implement the above described agreement and give it retroactive effect from 1 May 1985." The General Counsel has excepted to the judge's denial of her motion. The Respondent opposed the General Counsel's motion to amend and now argues that the remedy imposed by the judge is inappropriate in that it depends on the grant of the General

[6] We note that the judge stated that the Union was "derelict on occasions in presenting proposals or counterproposals" and that "at various times" the Union "took an almost cavalier attitude towards bargaining." Notwithstanding these characterizations, however, the judge ultimately concluded that the Union had not bargained in bad faith. Our review of the course of bargaining here reveals that the judge's ultimate conclusion is fully supported by the record.

[7] In view of our conclusion that the Union did not, in fact, engage in bad-faith bargaining, we find it unnecessary to pass on the issue of whether a union's bad-faith bargaining with a multiemployer bargaining association would constitute "special circumstances" justifying untimely and unconsented-to withdrawal from multiemployer bargaining. Cf. Charles D. Bonanno Linen Service, 243 NLRB 1093 (1979), affd. 454 U.S. 404 (1982).

Counsel's motion, which it contends was properly denied, and in that the newly alleged violation was not fully litigated at the hearing.

We agree with the judge's denial of the General Counsel's motion to amend, inter alia, as unnecessary to the remedy and, accordingly, we do not adopt the judge's finding that the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(5) by refusing to sign and implement the agreement reached by the Association and the Union on August 19. We, however, further find no merit in the Respondent's contentions that the remedy ordered by the judge is inappropriate and we adopt the judge's recommended Order with the modifications discussed below. Thus, under the circumstances of this case, the remedy of requiring the Respondent to sign and implement the agreement is necessary to restore the status quo ante. We disagree with the Respondent that this remedy depends on a finding that the Respondent separately violated the Act by failing to sign and implement the collective-bargaining agreement reached by the Union and the Association. The Respondent withdrew from its multiemployer bargaining group in violation of Section 8(a)(5) of the Act. By so withdrawing, it did not cease to be bound by the actions of that group. The judge found that after the dissolution of the Association on June 19 all members except Warren Roofing and Insulating Co. and the Respondent reformed the Association, and that, on August 19, the Association entered into an agreement with the Union on behalf of its members. The Respondent therefore is bound by the terms of the collective-bargaining agreement duly executed by the Association on behalf of its members. To remedy the Respondent's unfair labor practice by ordering it to sign and implement that agreement does nothing more than restore all parties, and the employees affected by the Respondent's unlawful withdrawal as well, to the positions they would have been in absent the Respondent's unfair labor practice. Further, we note that the issue of the appropriate remedy was raised at the hearing and that the judge put the Respondent on notice that the nature of the remedy would be at issue in the case. In light of the foregoing, we shall modify the judge's recommended Order by deleting paragraph 1(c).[8]

[8] In accordance with our decision in New Horizons for the Retarded, 283 NLRB 1173 (1987), interest on and after January 1, 1987, shall be computed at the "short-term Federal rate" for the underpayment of taxes as set out in the 1986 amendment to 26 U.S.C. § 6621. Interest on amounts accrued prior to January 1, 1987 (the effective date of the 1986 amendment to 26 U.S.C. § 6621), shall be computed in accordance with Florida Steel Corp., 231 NLRB 651 (1977).

The General Counsel has requested the inclusion of a visitatorial clause in the Order. Under the circumstances of this case we find it unnecessary to include such an Order. See Cherokee Marine Terminal, 287 NLRB 1080 (1988).

DECISION

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

RUSSELL M. KING, JR., Administrative Law Judge. This case was heard by me in Cleveland, Ohio, on 19, 20, and 21 May 1986. The original charge was filed by the United Union of Roofers, Waterproofers and Allied Workers Local Union No. 44, AFL–CIO (the Union) on 18 June 1985, and an amended charge was filed by the Union on 27 August 1985.[2] Based on the charge, as amended, a complaint was issued on 29 August by the Regional Director for Region 8 of the National Labor Relations Board (the Board) on behalf of the Board's General Counsel.[3] The original complaint alleged that the Greater Cleveland Roofing Contractors' Association, Inc. (the Association), together with its employer-members, violated Section 8(a)(1) and (5) of the National Labor Relations Act (the Act) on or about 24 June by disbanding the Association after negotiations for a new collective-bargaining agreement (contract) had commenced.[4] At the commencement of the hearing in this case, the General Counsel moved to delete or drop from the case the Respondent Association and all Respondent Employers except for Standard Roofing Co. (Standard), and Warren Roofing and Insulating Co. (Warren). The motion was unopposed and was granted. The complaint, as it then and now stands, in essence charges Standard and Warren with an untimely withdrawal from the multiemployer group in violation of Section 8(a)(1) and (5) of the Act. Respondents Standard and Warren defend on the grounds that certain acts or actions by the Union rendered the withdrawal from the multiemployer group (and negotiations) timely and proper.

On the entire record, including my observation of the demeanor of the witnesses, and after due consideration of the briefs filed by the General Counsel, counsel for the Company, and counsel for the Union, I make the following

I. JURISDICTION AND THE LABOR ORGANIZATION

The pleadings, admission, and evidence in the case establish the following jurisdictional facts. Respondents Standard and Warren are separate business entities, which maintain principal offices and places of business in the Cleveland, Ohio area. Both Standard and Warren are engaged in the installation of roofing systems in the Cleveland, Ohio area, and, in the course and conduct of their business operations during a representative period, each individually purchase and receive at their facilities in the Cleveland, Ohio area products, goods, and materials valued in excess of $50,000 directly from points outside of the State of Ohio. Thus, I find, as alleged and admitted, that Standard and Warren are now, and have been at all times material, employers engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act.

Also as alleged and admitted, I find that the Union is now, and has been at all times material, a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

II. THE UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

A. Background

The Association (the multiemployer bargaining group or unit) and the Union had maintained a collective-bargaining relationship for a period in excess of 30 years. The most recent contract expired on 30 April. Negotiations on a new contract commenced in early March, but after some 8 to 10 negotiating sessions, the last of which was on 19 June, the parties were unable to agree on a new contract and the multiemployer group, unilaterally, came to the decision to disband and seek individual negotiations with the Union. The Union opposed the actions of the multiemployer group and requested a resumption of negotiations on a group basis through the Association. On or about 13 August, all former members of the group reformed except Standard and Warren, and on or about 19 August, the Association, on behalf of its member employers, reached agreement on a new contract. Thereafter, Standard and Warren expressed a continued desire to bargain individually, but the Union refused and insisted that Standard and Warren accept the contract that had been reached with the Association on or about 19 August. The Union thereafter filed the initial charge in this case, which was followed by the issuance of the complaint on 29 August. Subsequently, and before the hearing in this case was opened on 19 May 1986, the Association, together with its member-employ-

[3] The term "General Counsel," when used herein, will normally refer to the attorney in the case acting on behalf of the General Counsel of the Board, through the Regional Director.

[4] The pertinent parts of the Act (29 U.S.C. § 151 et seq.) provide as follows:

> Sec. 8.(a) It shall be an unfair labor practice for an employer—
> (1) to interfere with, restrain, or coerce employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed in section 7.
> . . . .
> (5) to refuse to bargain collectively with teh representatives of his employees . . . .
> Sec. 7. Employees shall have the right to self-organization, to form, join, or assist labor organizations, to bargain collectively through representatives of their own choosing, and to engage in other concerted activities for the purpose of collective bargaining or other mutual aid or protection . . . .

[5] The facts found herein are based on the record as a whole and on my observation of the witnesses. The credibility resolutions herein have been derived from a review of the entire testimonial record and exhibits with due regard for the logic of probability, the demeanor of the witnesses, and the teaching of NLRB v. Walton Mfg. Co., 369 U.S. 404, 408 (1962). As to those testifying in contradiction of the findings herein, their testimony has been discredited either as having been in conflict with the testimony of credible witnesses or because it was in and of itself incredible and unworthy of belief. All testimony and evidence, regardless of whether mentioned or alluded to herein, has been reviewed and weighed in light of the entire record.

ers (except for Standard and Warren), and the Union reached a settlement of the issues alleged in the original complaint, with the approval of the Regional Director. Thus, at the commencement of the hearing the Association, and all members-employers except for Standard and Warren, were dismissed from the case.

The contract between the Association and the Union expired on 30 April. The duration clause of the contract (art. II) provided for automatic renewal of the contract from year to year unless either party terminated the contract by written notice on or before 31 December 1984, or any subsequent 31 December. The contract also provided that in the event the parties were unable to reach an agreement prior to the expiration date, by mutual consent the parties could agree to continue the terms of the contract until a new contract was negotiated. The contract was an areawide contract, and the Union had a contractual relationship with many roofing contractors or employers in the Cleveland area, not all of which were members of the Association. Pursuant to the duration or termination clause of the contract (art. II), on 26 December 1984 Union Business Manager Branca wrote to all employers (both Association and non-Association contractors) as follows:

> Gentlemen:
> Local 44, United Union of Roofers' Waterproofers' and Allied Workers does hereby give notice pursuant to Article II of the collective-bargaining agreement of its intent to terminate the same on April 30, 1985.
> Local 44 wishes to begin collective bargaining for a new agreement as soon as possible and it is ready to meet with your representatives at their earliest convenience. Kindly contact the undersigned to arrange a time and place for the meeting.

The first negotiating session between the Association and the Union was on 5 March. On 25 March, Branca wrote to all contractors or employers with whom the Union had entered into a contract (both Association and non-Association employers) as follows:

> Dear Sir:
> Enclosed is an Interim Agreement which is self-explanatory and will enable your company to continue working in the event a new collective bargaining agreement is not consummated by April 30, 1985.
> I would appreciate your executing the same and returning it to me at your earliest convenience. Do not hesitate to contact me if you have any questions.

The interim agreement, which was attached, was a short document that in effect continued the expiring contract "until a new collective bargaining agreement is consummated." This interim agreement further provided that "all terms and conditions of any collective bargaining agreement that is consummated shall be made retroactive to April 30, 1985." Thereafter, bargaining continued between the Association and the Union, and it is clear from the record that the Union desired the new contract to be an areawide contract, applying additionally to non-Association employers. Branca testified that the mailing of the interim agreement to members of the Association on 25 March was an error.[6] However, it is clear from the record that no member of the Association entered into the interim agreement. Aside from bargaining with the Association, the Union continued bargaining with other nonmembers, and on or about 1 August entered into what the Union hoped would be an areawide agreement with two independent employers, which agreement became known as the Weathermark agreement. These two employers engaged in a considerable amount of roofing work in the Cleveland area. On 13 August, the former members of the group reformed the Association, with the exception of Standard and Warren, and on or about 19 August, the Association entered into the Weathermark agreement on behalf of its member-employers.

B. The Fragmentation Issue

The Respondents argue in this case that the Union intended at the very outset to fragment the multiemployer group and thus caused to exist unusual circumstances which justified the unilateral withdrawal from the group (the Association). I disagree. Once negotiations for a new contract have commenced, the Board will permit withdrawal from the multiemployer group only if there is "mutual consent" or "unusual circumstances." Retail Associates, 120 NLRB 388 (1958). The Board has limited application of the term "unusual circumstances" to those cases in which the withdrawing employer has been faced with dire economic circumstances, or where a bargaining unit has been substantially fragmented. Polar Air Sheet Metal Co., 264 NLRB 1331 (1982); Bonanno Linen Service v. NLRB, 454 U.S. 404 at 411 fn. 6 (1982). The Board has also held, with approval, that an impasse reached in multiemployer bargaining did not constitute an unusual circumstance that would have permitted an employer to withdraw from the group. Hi-way Billboards, 206 NLRB 22 (1973); Bonanno Linen Service v. NLRB, supra. In Sangamo Construction Co., 188 NLRB 159, 160 (1971), the Board approved a union's negotiation of interim agreements with individual members of a multiemployer group, stating as follows:

> We . . . conclude that the Respondents did not violate the Act by entering into or performing the terms of the interim agreement. The record does not convince us that such conduct has a significantly adverse impact upon the integrity of the multiemployer bargaining unit. Nor does the evidence show that the agreement was in derogation of the Association's bargaining authority or outside the coverage of the ultimate Association's contract. The facts show, rather, that bargaining did continue during the operative period and indeed resulted in an agreement which included the [employer] in its coverage.

[6] One such letter was admitted into evidence. This letter was to Warren Roofing and plainly appears to have been addressed by machine.

See also Charles D. Bonanno Linen Service, 243 NLRB 1093 (1979); Polar Air Sheet Metal Co., supra. I find that the Union's letter of 26 December 1984 was sent to Association and non-Association members in the normal course of events prior to the onset of multiemployer bargaining, and pursuant to the contract's reopener mandates on or before 30 December 1984. There is no evidence whatsoever in this case that the Union wished to terminate its relationship with the Association in this regard, and thus I find that the 26 December 1984 letter in no way constituted any proof or evidence that the Union desired to fragment or dissolve its bargaining relationship with the Association. Likewise, I find that the Union's 25 March letter regarding the interim agreement was not tantamount to a rejection by the Union of the existence of the multiemployer group (the Association), and I note in this connection that bargaining between the Union and the Association continued and no Association members signed, or considered execution of, such an interim agreement. In this case, the Association and all employer-members were dismissed from the case with the exception of Standard and Warren. In my opinion, it cannot be concluded from this that Standard and Warren were in any way forgiven for the original and total disbandment of the multiemployer group, nor did this fact in any manner act as an approval for their continued withdrawal after the Association was reformed and the contract was signed. Had all original Respondents been maintained in this case, it would have been my conclusion that they all had violated the Act by their untimely disbandment and withdrawal from the multiemployer bargaining unit and process.

C. The Union's Bargaining Tactics

The Respondents also argue in this case that the Union bargained in bad faith, resulting in the dissolution of the Association on 19 June. There were some 8 to 10 bargaining sessions commencing 5 March and ending on 19 June. During these sessions, notes or minutes were kept by either one party or the other, and most of those notes or minutes were admitted into evidence. The main thrust of the Association during bargaining was to hold down labor costs by increasing the utilization of helpers. The Association claimed that through the use of such helpers, the member-employers could better compete in the marketplace with nonunion employers. At one point in the negotiations, the Union mentioned a targeted jobs proposal, a plan in which the Employer would seek and obtain permission from the Union to use helpers on a particular job the Employer was preparing to bid on. The Association maintained that such a proposal had been shown not to work.[7] There were three categories of employees as follows: journeymen, apprentices, and probationary apprentices. Probationary apprentices were also defined as helpers. One goal of the Union was to increase the number of journeymen, the highest pay category, through the training and qualification of apprentices. Thus, the two sides were at odds in the use of the lowest pay category of employees. Throughout the negotiations, and as alleged by the Respondent, the Union was in fact derelict on occasions in presenting proposals or counterproposals, and at various points took an almost cavalier attitude towards bargaining. However, proposals were ultimately made, exchanged, and discussed. Robert Lowry was chairman of the Association's bargaining committee, and testified that the Association was disbanded because progress in the negotiations "was virtually halted." The Respondents, in their brief, characterized some of the Union's behavior during negotiations as "sand bagging." A review of the entire record, including the testimony and minutes of the various negotiating sessions, does in fact reveal that the Union was loosely prepared for some of the negotiating sessions, and that the Union on occasion took positions that could be characterized as somewhat extreme, but I do not find that the Union's actions were calculated to sabotage the negotiations. At best, the Union was guilty of dereliction on occasion, and at other times guilty at best of hard bargaining. The subject was of great concern to the Respondents, and the majority of the testimonial evidence in the case is centered on the bargaining aspects of the case, and was presented by the Respondents.[8] The General Counsel showed little interest in this area, choosing in the main to rest his case on the wrongful and untimely disbandment of the Association itself. Neither party actually argues that an impasse occurred in the bargaining. Based on the record, I cannot find that the Union was guilty of bad-faith bargaining tantamount to a violation of the Act, as alleged by the Respondents. In any event, such a finding would not have constituted "unusual circumstances" or sufficient grounds for the disbandment of the Association or withdrawal of any employer from the Association. Hi-Way Billboards, supra; Bonanno Linen Service v. NLRB, supra.

I find in this case that the initial disbandment of the Association by its member-employers was violative of the Act, and because I have before me only two of those Respondent Employers, I so find and conclude that the Respondents, Standard and Warren, violated Section 8(a)(1) and (5) of the Act by their untimely withdrawal from the multiemployer group or unit when it disbanded.

On the foregoing findings of fact and initial conclusions, and on the entire record, I make the following

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. The Respondents, Standard Roofing Co. and Warren Roofing and Insulating Co., are employers engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act.

[7] The contract eventually entered into by the Association after it was reformed did involve a targeted jobs provision.

[8] As noted earlier, the contract finally entered into by the Association and the Union was the Weathermark agreement, which had earlier been executed by the Union and two somewhat substantial non-Association employers in the area. Throughout the Union made clear its intent to obtain an areawide agreement, as it had in the past. The Respondents maintain that they were more or less forced into accepting the Weathermark agreement. There may be some validity in this contention. However, the Association knew of the Union's areawide aspirations, and also knew that the Union was bargaining with other non-Association employers. The Weathermark agreement was in the nature of a breakthrough for the Union, which, I conclude, the Association members knowingly chanced when they decided to disband the Association.

2. The Union is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

3. The Union is, and has been at all material times, an exclusive bargaining representative of the employees of the Association's members, including the Respondents, in the following appropriate multiemployer unit:

> All working foremen, block floormen, journeymen and apprentices, excluding all office clerical employees and guards and supervisors as defined in the Act.[9]

4. By participating in the disbandment of the Association on or about 19 June 1985, and thereafter refusing to become a signatory to the collective-bargaining agreement reached by the Association and the Union on 19 August 1985, the Respondents have engaged in, and continue to engage in, unfair labor practices in violation of Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act.

5. The unfair labor practices affect commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

THE REMEDY

Having found that the Respondents have engaged in certain unfair labor practices, I shall recommend that they cease and desist therefrom and take certain affirmative action that I find necessary to effectuate the policies of the Act. In this connection, I shall recommend that the Respondents be ordered to immediately sign and implement the collective-bargaining agreement reached by the Union and the Association on or about 19 August 1985, and apply the agreement retroactively through 1 May 1985, and further make their employees whole for any loss of earnings or other benefits suffered since then as a result of their failure to apply the agreement. Interest on wages due, if any, shall be paid in accordance with the provisions of Florida Steel Corp., 231 NLRB 651 (1977),[10] and shall be calculated from 1 May 1985, the effective date of the new contract entered into by the Association and the Union.[11]

On these findings of fact and conclusions of law and on the entire record, I issue the following recommended[12]

ORDER

The Respondents, Standard Roofing Co. and Warren Roofing and Insulating Co., Cleveland, Ohio, their officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall

1. Cease and desist from

(a) Refusing to bargain collectively with United Union of Roofers, Waterproofers and Allied Workers Local Union No. 44, AFL–CIO as the exclusive representative of their employees in the appropriate unit described and found herein.

(b) Withdrawing from the mulitemployer bargaining, except on adequate written notice given prior to the date set by the contract for modification, or to the agreed-on date to begin the multiemployer negotiations, except at such other time as it may lawfully withdraw.

(c) Refusing to sign and to implement the agreement reached by the Union and the Association representing its employer-members on 19 August 1985.

(d) In any like or related manner interfering with, restraining, or coercing employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them in Section 7 of the Act.

2. Take the following affirmative action necessary to effectuate the policies of the Act.

(a) Forthwith sign and implement the above-described agreement and give it retroactive effect from 1 May 1985.

(b) Make whole their employees in the above-described bargaining unit for any loss of pay or other employment benefits they may have suffered by reason of their refusal to sign and implement the aforesaid agreement, in the manner set forth in the remedy section of this decision.

(c) Preserve and, on request, make available to the Board or its agents for examination and copying, all payroll records, social security payment records, timecards, personnel records and reports, and all other records necessary to analyze the amount of backpay due under the terms of this Order.

(d) Post at their places of business in or around Cleveland, Ohio, copies of the attached notice marked "Appendix A" or "Appendix B"[13] Copies of the notice, on forms provided by the Regional Director for Region 8, after being signed by the Respondents' authorized representatives, shall be posted by the Respondents immediately upon receipt and maintained for 60 consecutive days in conspicuous places including all places where notices to employees are customarily posted. Reasonable steps shall be taken by the Respondents to ensure that [9] Respondents, in their answer to the complaint, denied the appropriateness of the unit as alleged in the complaint. However, the issue was not raised during the hearing or in the Respondents' posthearing brief. Also, as the General Counsel points out in his brief, the same unit was agreed on in the expired contract, and was also not the subject of any negotiations. I also note that it was again approved in the new contract.

[10] See generally Isis Plumbing Co., 138 NLRB 716 (1962).

[11] The subject of an appropriate remedy was raised by me at the hearing. The General Counsel, in order to ensure an appropriate remedy, made a motion in his posthearing brief to amend the complaint to additionally allege the reformation of the Association, the new agreement between the Union and the Association, and the wrongful refusal of Standard and Warren to rejoin the Association and be bound by the new agreement. The Respondents (Standard and Warren) in turn, and in addition to their posthearing brief, filed a motion for leave to file an opposition to the General Counsel's motion and a brief in opposition to the motion. Respondents' motion is granted and the brief in opposition is accepted and has been considered. However, I now do not consider the General Counsel's proposed amendments necessary for an appropriate remedy in this case, and for this and other reasons, the motion to amend the complaint is denied.

[12] If no exceptions are filed as provided by Sec. 102.46 of the Board's Rules and Regulations, the findings, conclusions, and recommended Order shall, as provided in Sec. 102.48 of the Rules, be adopted by the Board and all objections to them shall be waived for all purposes.

[13] If this Order is enforced by a judgment of a United States court of appeals, the words in the notice reading "Posted by Order of the National Labor Relations Board" shall read "Posted Pursuant to a Judgment of the United States Court of Appeals Enforcing an Order of the National Labor Relations Board."

the notices are not altered, defaced, or covered by any other material.

(e) Notify the Regional Director in writing within 20 days from the date of this Order what steps Respondents have taken to comply.

SUPPLEMENTAL DECISION AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN STEPHENS AND MEMBERS JOHANSEN AND BABSON

On October 29, 1986, the National Labor Relations Board issued a Decision, Order, and Direction of Second Election[2] in this proceeding in which it affirmed the judge's rulings, findings, and conclusions and adopted his recommended Order as set forth in the attached judge's decision. The Board in the absence of exceptions adopted pro forma the judge's conclusions that the Respondent had violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act by threatening employees with the loss of a profit-sharing plan should they become covered by a retirement plan negotiated by the Union, and by maintaining an eligibility provision in its Employee Stock Ownership Plan (ESOP), and by related explanatory language in its employee handbook and summary plan document, which unlawfully excluded employees from participation in the plan.[3]

The Respondent thereafter filed a petition to review the Board's Order with the United States Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit and the Board filed a cross-application for enforcement. On August 10, 1987, the court vacated the Board's Order and remanded the case to the Board.[4] The court determined that the Respondent, in fact, had adequately raised an exception to the judge's finding that the Respondent's ESOP eligibility provision violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act. Accordingly, the court directed the Board on remand to consider three specified questions raised to the court by the Respondent regarding its ESOP. These questions are:

> 1. Is Lynn-Edward's ESOP a retirement plan or a profit sharing plan?
> 2. Is the current ESOP eligibility provision lawful?
> 3. May Lynn-Edwards amend the eligibility provision in light of the principles of Rangaire Corp., 157 NLRB 682 (1966)?

By letter dated November 3, 1987, the Board advised the parties that it had decided to accept the remand from the court and invited them to submit statements of position with respect to the issues raised by the remand. Thereafter, the Respondent and the Charging Party filed statements of position.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has reconsidered this case in light of the court's decision, which we consider the law of the case, and the parties' statements of position, and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings, and conclusions only to the extent consistent with this Supplemental Decision and Order.

Initially, we reaffirm our adoption of the judge's finding, to which it appears the Respondent has not taken exception, that the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act on April 5, 1983, when its president, Scarzella, told employees that the "union cannot participate in ESOP" and its vice president, Riley, stated that "[a]ny employee who is a member of collective bargaining cannot be eligible for this [ESOP] plan." The basis for these violations is fully set forth in the judge's attached decision at section III,C,1, paragraphs 1–2.[5]

We next proceed to an analysis of the questions remanded to us by the court. To put the issue in perspective, we first note the following as background.

The Respondent's ESOP, in effect since 1977, was amended in 1983, retroactive to June 1, 1981. The amendment includes the following pertinent provisions:

ARTICLE I

Name and Purpose of Plan

1.1 Name

The Employee Stock Ownership Plan established by the LYNN-EDWARDS CORPORATION, a California Corporation (Employer herein) shall be known as the Stock Bonus Employee Stock Ownership Plan (Plan herein)

---

[1] On November 1, 1987, the Teamsters International Union was readmitted to the AFL–CIO. Accordingly, the caption has been amended to reflect that change.

[2] 282 NLRB 316.

[3] Chairman Stephens dissented in part, finding that the Respondent's exceptions did in fact call into question the characterization of the ESOP. Chairman Stephens would have found that the Respondent's ESOP was a retirement plan, not a profit-sharing plan, and would have revised the remedial order to permit an amendment to the eligibility provision that "makes the participation of bargaining unit employees in the ESOP a matter to be negotiated in the context of a collective bargaining agreement." 282 NLRB at 52.

[4] Lynn-Edwards Corp. v. NLRB, 825 F.2d 413 (9th Cir. 1987).

[5] Notwithstanding the later language in the judge's Conclusion of Law 3, which appears to base this violation on a finding, which we reverse infra, that the Respondent's ESOP is a profit-sharing plan, it is clear from the judge's earlier discussion that he based his finding of a violation in these comments on the fact that, whether the ESOP was a profit-sharing or a pension plan, the Respondent unlawfully threatened its employees with the loss of the ESOP immediately on their being represented by a union.

and the Employee Stock Ownership Trust executed by Employer and EDWARD F. SCONBERG, JR. and WALTER E. RILEY, (Trustees herein) shall be known as the Employee Stock Ownership Trust (Trust herein).

1.2. Purpose

It is the purpose of this plan to recognize the contribution of the Employees to the successful operation of the Employer and to reward such contribution by establishing the system that would enable the employees to acquire through a Stock Ownership Plan equity ownership in the Employer without diminishing take-home pay. A major portion of the Employer contributions to the trust will be invested in stock of Employer.

ARTICLE 3

Eligibility and Participation.

3.1 Eligibility.

. . . However, notwithstanding any provision to the contrary, no employee covered by a collective bargaining agreement between an Employee representative and the Employer shall become a Participant in the Plan, provided that retirement benefits of said class of Employees was the subject of good faith bargaining between the Employee representative and the Employer, and said Employee's retirement benefits are being funded pursuant to said collective bargaining agreements.

The General Counsel argued to the judge that the eligibility provision in the amendment violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act and the judge agreed. In so finding, the judge noted that in Rangaire Corp., 157 NLRB 682 (1966), the Board found that similar exclusionary language in a pension plan was held permissible. The judge further noted the Respondent's argument that the exclusionary language of its amendment fell "within the parameters" of Rangaire and similar cited cases. The judge rejected this argument, noting that "the gravamen of the violations in [the General Counsel's cited] cases as well as the instant case involves the language in the employers' 'profit sharing plans' which automatically preclude employees from enjoying the benefits of such plans if they become covered by a 'retirement' plan negotiated by the union [emphasis added]." (Sec. III,C,1, par. 6.) Thus, in the judge's estimate, the case turned on whether the Respondent's ESOP was a profit-sharing or a pension plan. The judge found it to be a profit-sharing plan and concluded that an employer "may not, through provisions of a profit sharing plan, automatically deprive employees of benefits therefrom if they elect to be covered by a retirement or pension plan negotiated by the union." (Sec. III,C,1, par. 8.) He thus found the Respondent's amendment with its unlawful exclusionary language violated the Act. This is the finding that the court has directed us to consider on the merits by an analysis of the three questions remanded to us. We answer those questions now in the order set out by the court.

1. Is Lynn-Edwards' ESOP a retirement plan or a profit-sharing plan?

The Respondent argues that its ESOP is a retirement plan as a matter of Federal statutory law under the Employee Retirement Income Security Act of 1974 (ERISA).[6] The Charging Party takes the position that the ESOP is a profit-sharing plan, and argues that although the Respondent's ESOP may qualify for certain tax benefits under ERISA, this does not mean that the Respondent is not offering greater benefits to nonunion employees, such as profit-sharing and retirement plans, than employees represented by the Union, and is thus violating Section 8(a)(1) of the Act. This argument is but another way of claiming that the Respondent's ESOP is a profit-sharing plan.

We now find Lynn-Edwards' ESOP to be a retirement plan within the meaning of ERISA. In this regard, we note that the Respondent's ESOP was amended in 1983 retroactive to June 1, 1981, for the express purpose of causing the plan to be a Stock Bonus ESOP under ERISA and to obtain tax-qualified status under ERISA and the Internal Revenue Code.[7] Thus, the Respondent's ESOP was designed to come within the statutory purview of ERISA. We have further considered that ESOPs, such as the one in question, are in fact created under and defined by ERISA and related regulations.[8] By statutory definition, an ESOP is an "individual account plan."[9] An individual account plan, in turn, by statutory definition, is a "pension plan."[10] Thus, individual account plans are, by definition, pension plans. Moreover, an examination of the ERISA definition of an employee pension benefit plan confirms that ESOPs are merely subspecies

[6] Pub. L. 93-406, 88 Stat. 829 (codified as amended 29 U.S.C. §§ 1001-1462, and in various sections of 26 U.S.C.).

[7] The preamble to the Stock Bonus Employee Stock Ownership Trust states:

> 2. The restated plan and this restated trust constitutes the plan intended to comply with and qualify under Section 401(a) of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954, as an Employee Stock Ownership Plan, which is defined in Section 4975 (e)(7)(A) of said code, the Employee Retirement Income Security Act of 1974 particularly Section 407 (d)(3)(a) and 407 (d)(6) and corresponding provisions of the laws of the State of California.

[8] The term "ESOP" is defined by ERISA at 29 U.S.C. § 1107 (d)(6) and by 29 C.F.R. § 2550. 407d-6 (1987).

[9] 29 U.S.C. § 1107 (d)(6).

[10] 29 U.S.C. § 1002 (34).

of federally regulated employee retirement benefit plans.[11]

We therefore find, contrary to the judge, that ESOPs, by statutory definition, are retirement plans, even if they are funded from the profits of a company. Accordingly, we conclude that Lynn-Edwards' ESOP is a retirement plan within the meaning of ERISA for purposes of the case before us.[12]

2. Is the current ESOP eligibility provision lawful?

The Respondent, relying on Handleman Co., 283 NLRB 451 (1987), argues that its ESOP's eligibility provision is lawful. It also contends that because the provision is functionally identical to the exception to minimum participation standards described in 26 U.S.C. § 410(b)(3)(A) of the Internal Revenue Code, to find that the provision violates Section 8(a)(1) would be tantamount to finding that the language Congress chose to describe the exception to minimum participation standards for tax qualification purposes also violates Section 8(a)(1) of the Act. The Charging Party, relying on Kroger Co., supra, argues that once it is determined that the Respondent's ESOP is a profit-sharing plan it is clear that the exclusionary language of the Respondent's plan is unlawful. It further asserts that Handleman is distinguishable from the instant case. We find, for the following reasons, that the Respondent's ESOP eligibility provision does not violate Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.[13]

As mentioned above, the Respondent's ESOP contains an eligibility provision, which states:

> . . . [N]otwithstanding any provision to the contrary, no employee covered by a collective bargaining agreement between an Employee representative and the Employer shall become a Participant in the Plan, provided that retirement benefits of said class of Employees was the subject of good faith bargaining between the Employee representative and the Employer, and said Employee's retirement benefits are being funded pursuant to said collective bargaining agreements.

In finding that the Respondent's eligibility provision does not violate Section 8(a)(1), we note that the provision does not automatically terminate the employees' benefits upon selection of the Union as its exclusive representative. Rather, it provides that the benefits may only be terminated if two conditions are met. First, retirement benefits for the covered employees must be the subject of good-faith bargaining. Second, the employees' retirement benefits must be funded pursuant to the collective-bargaining agreement. Thus, the employee's participation in the Respondent's ESOP continues throughout the negotiation process and is discontinued only in the event that a new retirement plan is funded through the agreement. Finally, we note that the Respondent and the Union under this scheme maintain the option, through good-faith negotiations, to either continue coverage for employees under the Respondent's ESOP, or to negotiate for the substitution of a different plan, which may include stock ownership features. Under these circumstances, it is clear that the Respondent's eligibility provision does not run afoul of Section 8(a)(1).[14]

3. May Lynn-Edwards amend the eligibility provision in light of the principles of Rangaire Corp., 157 NLRB 682 (1966)?

The Respondent argues that this issue has been rendered moot by the Board's decision in, inter alia, Handleman Co., supra, since both the language and application of the disputed provision here are less restrictive concerning the eligibility of represented employees than the eligibility provisions involved in that case. By contrast, the Charging Party premises its argument on the assumption that the Respondent's ESOP is a profit-sharing plan, a contention that we have rejected above.

We agree with the Respondent. Thus, although the Respondent may, if it so desires, amend the eligibility provision in its ESOP in light of the principles of Rangaire Corp., there is no need to do so because the eligibility provision as written does not run afoul of Section 8(a)(1).

In conclusion, we find, contrary to the judge, that the Respondent's ESOP is a retirement plan and that its eligibility provision does not violate Section 8(a)(1). Nonetheless, we reaffirm that part of the judge's Conclusion of Law 4 in which he found that "Respondent has violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act . . . by maintaining those por-

[11] 29 U.S.C. § 1002 (2)(A).

[12] Further, for the reasons set forth by Chairman Stephens at fn. 8 of his prior concurring and dissenting opinion in this case and contrary to the Union's contention in its statement of position, we find that the Board's decisions in Kroger Co., 164 NLRB 362 (1967), enfd. 401 F.2d 682 (6th Cir. 1968), cert. denied 395 U.S. 904 (1969); and Winn-Dixie Stores, 224 NLRB 1418 (1976), enfd. in part 567 F.2d 1343 (5th Cir. 1978), are not inconsistent with this holding.

[13] The Union's argument is rejected because, as more fully discussed above, the plan is a retirement plan, not a profit-sharing plan, for the purposes of the case before us. We again note that the finding that the disputed provision is lawful is not inconsistent with the holding in Kroger, supra.

[14] See, e.g., Rangaire Corp., 157 NLRB 682, 683–684 (1966); Tappan Co., 228 NLRB 1389, 1390 (1977), enfd. 607 F.2d 764 (6th Cir. 1979); Niagara Wires, 240 NLRB 1326, 1328 (1979); Sarah Neuman Nursing Home, 270 NLRB 663, 680–681 (1984); Handleman Co., 283 NLRB 451 (1987).

In finding that the disputed provision does not violate Sec. 8(a)(1), we also note the similarity between this provision and 26 U.S.C. § 410(b)(3)(A).

tions of existing booklets and documents which contain related explanatory material." It is clear that by "existing booklets and documents" the judge was referring to the Respondent's employee handbook and summary plan document, and by "related explanatory material," it is clear the judge was referring to the description in both documents that indicated that eligible for the ESOP were "[a]ll full-time employees, except those covered by collective bargaining agreements."[15] It is well settled that an employer violates Section 8(a)(1) through a provision in, or a statement about, a plan that suggests that coverage of employees will automatically be withdrawn as soon as they become represented by a union or that continued coverage under the plan will not be subject to bargaining. See, e.g., Niagara Wires, 240 NLRB 1326 (1979), and cases cited therein. Accordingly, we find the description of the ESOP in the handbook and summary plan document here violated the Act.[16]

In so concluding, we find Handleman Co., supra, and Dallas Morning News, 285 NLRB 807 (1987), to be distinguishable on this point from the instant case. In Handleman, unlike the present case, the exclusionary language contained in the respondent's eligibility provision indicated that coverage for represented employees was subject to negotiations and, thus, did not automatically withdraw or completely foreclose coverage for such employees. In Dallas Morning News, employees represented by a union had historically been excluded from coverage from various sick-pay plans instituted by the employer for the benefit of nonunion employees. Some of these plans were written and some were not. The respondent subsequently drafted a written plan to provide a consistent policy in all departments in which the employees had sick leave benefits of one kind or another and indicated that the plan excluded "those covered by a collective bargaining arrangement." The Board reversed the judge's finding there that the institution of this plan, with its exclusion of "those covered by a collective bargaining arrangement," was a per se violation of Section 8(a)(1). In doing so, the Board noted that in the past sick pay had been a subject of negotiations between the respondent and the union but that the parties had never entered into contracts that provided a sick-pay plan. The Board held that "[w]ere the per se violation found by the judge to stand, an employer would effectively be required to grant its unionized employees any benefit that the nonunit employees possessed, or at least would not be able to provide accurate descriptions of the details and scope of all its existing employee benefits when non-unit employees were the beneficiaries of any plan in which the unit employees were not included." Noting that there was no allegation of bad-faith bargaining in the unit employees' not securing a sick-pay plan or no allegation that the announcement of the plan was used as a device to defeat the union, the Board dismissed the complaint allegation. In so holding, however, the Board distinguished its decision in Melville Confections, 142 NLRB 1334 (1963), enfd. 327 F.2d 689 (7th Cir. 1964), cert. denied 377 U.S. 933 (1964), on which the judge had relied. The Board indicated that, in Melville, employer statements that suggested that employees would automatically forfeit an existing benefit plan if they voted for a union in the pending representation election constituted a violation of Section 8(a)(1). The statements in the employee handbook and summary plan document here likewise indicate that employees covered by a collective-bargaining agreement will automatically forfeit their entitlement to the ESOP and are therefore unlawful.

AMENDED CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

Substitute the following for paragraphs 3 and 4 of the judge's Conclusions of Law:

"3. The Respondent has violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act by threatening employees with loss of the Employee Stock Ownership Plan in the event they become represented by a union.

"4. The Respondent has violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act by maintaining those portions of its employee handbook and summary plan document, which contain language specifying that the Respondent's Employee Stock Ownership Plan excludes full-time employees who are covered by collective-bargaining agreements."

AMENDED REMEDY

Having found that the Respondent has engaged in unfair labor practices within the meaning of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act, we shall order that it cease and desist therefrom, and that it take certain affirmative action to effectuate the policies of the Act. Accordingly, we shall order the Respondent to amend any existing employee handbooks or summary plan documents so as to eliminate therefrom any language which indicates that employees who are covered by collective-bargaining agreements

[15] The Respondent clearly was aware that the judge had found violations based on the language in the handbook and summary plan document. Thus, we note that in its brief to the Board in support of its exceptions to the judge's decision it specifically stated, at p. 2, that the judge "found that Lynn-Edwards maintained an unlawful exclusionary provision in its profit-sharing plan, in its employee handbook, and in its summary plan document."

[16] As the judge noted, these documents were in existence during the election campaign. We therefore find no basis to reconsider our prior determination in the representation case to set aside the election and direct a second election.

automatically will be excluded from the Respondent's Employee Stock Ownership Plan.

ORDER

The National Labor Relations Board orders that the Respondent, Lynn-Edwards Corp., North Highlands, California, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall

1. Cease and desist from

(a) Threatening employees with loss of Employee Stock Ownership Plan in the event they become represented by a union.

(b) Maintaining those portions of the employee handbook and summary plan document which contain language specifying that the Respondent's Employee Stock Ownership Plan excludes full-time employees who are covered by collective-bargaining agreements.

(c) In any like or related manner interfering with, restraining, or coercing employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them by Section 7 of the Act.

2. Take the following affirmative action necessary to effectuate the policies of the Act.

(a) Amend its existing employee handbook and summary plan document so as to eliminate therefrom any language that indicates that employees who are covered by collective-bargaining agreements automatically will be excluded from the Respondent's Employee Stock Ownership Plan.

(b) Post at its North Highlands, California facility copies of the attached notice marked "Appendix."[17] Copies of the notice, on forms provided by the Regional Director for Region 20, after being signed by the Respondent's authorized representative, shall be posted by the Respondent immediately upon receipt and maintained for 60 consecutive days in conspicuous places including all places where notices to employees are customarily posted. Reasonable steps shall be taken by the Respondent to ensure that the notices are not altered, defaced, or covered by any other material.

(c) Notify the Regional Director in writing within 20 days from the date of this Order what steps the Respondent has taken to comply.

[17] If this Order is enforced by a judgment of a United States court of appeals, the words in the notice reading "Posted by Order of the National Labor Relations Board" shall read "Posted Pursuant to a Judgment of the United States Court of Appeals Enforcing an Order of the National Labor Relations Board."

DECISION

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

GERALD A. WACKNOV, Administrative Law Judge. Pursuant to notice, a hearing regarding this matter was held before me in Sacramento, California, on November 29, 1983.[1] The initial charge was filed on June 16, by Chauffeurs, Teamsters and Helpers, Local 150, affiliated with International Brotherhood of Teamsters, Chauffeurs, Warehousemen and Helpers of America (the Union), and an amended charge was filed by the Union on July 27.

Thereafter, on July 29, the Regional Director for Region 20 of the National Labor Relations Board (the Board) issued a complaint and notice of hearing alleging a violation by Lynn-Edwards Corp. (Respondent) of [1] All dates or time periods are within 1983 unless otherwise specified.

Section 8(a)(1) of the National Labor Relations Act (the Act).

Pursuant to a representation petition filed by the Union on April 7 in Case 20-RC-15616, an election by secret ballot was conducted on June 2. The tally of ballots reflects that of the approximately 79 eligible employees, 16 cast ballots for the Union and 53 cast ballots against the Union. There were three challenged ballots which were insufficient in number to affect the results of the election. Subsequently, the Union filed timely objections to the election. Pursuant to a Report on Objections, notice of hearing, and order consolidating cases issued by the Regional Director on August 31, certain objections were consolidated with the instant unfair labor practice proceeding for the purpose of hearing, ruling, and decision by an administrative law judge.

The parties were afforded a full opportunity to be heard, to call, examine, and cross-examine witnesses, and to introduce relevant evidence. Since the close of the hearing, briefs have been received from the General Counsel[2] and counsel for Respondent.

On the entire record, and based on my observation of the witnesses and consideration of the briefs submitted, I make the following

FINDINGS OF FACT

I. JURISDICTION

The Respondent is a California corporation, with an office and place of business in North Highlands, California, and is engaged in the wholesale sale and distribution of office products and supplies. Respondent, in the course and conduct of its business operations, annually purchases and receives products, goods, and materials valued in excess of $50,000 directly from points outside the State of California.

It is admitted, and I find, that Respondent is now, and has been at all times material, an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act.

II. THE LABOR ORGANIZATION INVOLVED

It is admitted that the Union is, and has been at all times material, a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

III. THE ALLEGED UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

A. The Issues

The principal issues raised by the pleadings are whether the Respondent, pursuant to the provisions of its Employee Stock Ownership Plan, unlawfully excluded employees represented by a union from participation in the plan, and threatened its employees with loss of plan benefits if the employees were to unionize; and whether such conduct warrants the direction of a second election.

[2] The General Counsel's request to correct the transcript is granted.

B. The Facts

On April 4 the Union requested recognition from Respondent in an appropriate unit.[3]

On April 5, the day following the Union's request for recognition, but before the filing of the representation petition, the Respondent held separate meetings for unit employees on each of three shifts. The Respondent was represented by Jack Scarzella, president and chief executive officer; Walter Riley, vice president in charge of marketing, and a trustee of Respondent's Employee Stock Ownership Plan (ESOP);[4] and Ken Saunders, Respondent's chief financial officer.

President Scarzella's outline of the meetings reflect that he began by telling the employees that the Company had received a claim for recognition by the Union and that it doubted whether the Union represented a majority of its employees. He then went on to enumerate six points under the general topic "UNIONS TELL YOU WHAT THEY CAN DO FOR YOU—NO GUARANTEE OF WAGE INCREASE OR SECURITY." He apparently spoke negatively about the "LARGE UNFUNDED VESTED LIABILITY" of the Teamsters pension plan, and then mentioned the Respondent's ESOP plan, telling the employees that "UNION CANNOT PARTICIPATE IN ESOP." Scarzella testified that although he did not read from the outline, he "essentially" followed it in conveying its meaning. After further statements regarding the costs of belonging to a union and other matters, Scarzella introduced Riley and Saunders for the express purpose of discussing the Respondent's ESOP plan. Riley commenced this portion of the meeting by reading the following description of the plan:

> Lynn-Edwards Corporation Employee Stock Ownership Plan (ESOP) was adopted on June 1, 1977. ESOP is a voluntary program on the part of corporation's management and its continuance and growth is dependent on contributions from profits which are not needed for growth, debt reduction, etc. ESOP is a form of retirement program designed to benefit the long term employee.
> The purpose of this plan is to recognize the contribution of the employees to the successful operation of Lynn-Edwards and to reward their contribution by enabling the employees to acquire equity ownership in the Corporation without diminishing take home pay. A major portion of the Corporate contribution to the Employee Stock Ownership Trust will be invested in Lynn-Edwards Corporation Stock. The value of the stock fluctuates with the performance of the business. Any employee who is a member of collective bargaining cannot be eligible for this plan. [Emphasis added.]

[3] The unit as described here is as follows:
All shipping and receiving employees including stock pullers, stockers, returns, packers, shipping/strappers, maintenance employee drivers, and forklift operators employed by Lynn-Edwards Corporation at its North Highlands, California facility; excluding office clerical employees, salespersons, managerial employees, guards, and supervisors as defined in the Act.

[4] The record clearly shows, and I find, that Riley is a supervisor and agent of Respondent, as alleged.

After providing the details of the plan's operation, including the vesting provisions, Riley told the employees that:

> All participating employees as of May 31, 1982 will be receiving their individual statements in the mail this week. This is being done to respect individual employee privacy.

Scarzella testified that during additional group meetings subsequent to the April 5 meetings and following the filing of the representation petition, he did recall that he compared the ESOP plan to the "contributory nature and the solidity" of the Teamsters' pension plan. However, according to Scarzella, the matter was not considered to be a major point during the preelection campaign.

The parties stipulated that all employees are furnished with Respondent's employee handbook, which contains a detailed summary of the ESOP plan. Significant portions of the handbook summary are as follows:

> EMPLOYEE STOCK OWNERSHIP PLAN (ESOP)
> The purpose of this plan is to enable full time permanent employees of the Company to share in the growth and prosperity of the Company and to provide participants with an opportunity to accumulate capital for their future economic security. The Plan is designed to do this without any deductions from participant's paychecks and without calling upon them to invest their personal savings. A primary purpose of the Plan is to enable participants to acquire a proprietary interest in the Company—consequently a major portion of the Employer Contributions made to the Trust will be invested in Company stock.
> This Plan is administered by a Committee consisting of not less than three (3) nor more than five (5) members.
> All full-time employees, except those covered by collective bargaining agreements, who have attained the age of 20 and have completed two (2) months of continuous service prior to the Plan Entry Date of May 31st, are eligible to participate. [Emphasis added.]
> Vesting Schedule:
> Vesting measures a Participant's right to receive the value of the Employer's contributions which have been allocated to his account in the event he terminates employment for reasons other than death, disability or retirement.
> ESOP contributions are made from corporation funds and are divided to all participants in same proportions as their salary is to total salaries. It is important to note that no money is withheld from the employee's salary. The Plan is totally funded by the Corporation and should be thought of as extra salary being invested for each participant. [Emphasis added.]

In 1978 a "Summary Plan Document" was distributed to employees. This summary, inter alia, contains the following:

> The purpose of this Plan is to enable participating employees of the Company to share in the growth and prosperity of the Company and to provide Participants with an opportunity to accumulate capital for their future economic security. The Plan is designed to do this without any deductions from Participants' paychecks and without calling upon them to invest their personal savings. A primary purpose of the Plan is to enable Participants to acquire a proprietary interest in the Company—consequently, a major portion of the Employer Contributions made to the Trust will be invested in Company stock. This Plan is adopted as an amendment of the Company's Profit Sharing Plan, and the assets of the Profit Sharing Plan will be transferred to the Trustee under this Plan. The Plan is administered by a Committee consisting of not less than three, no more than five members. [Emphasis added.]
> 2. When do I become eligible to participate?
> All full-time employees, except those covered by collective bargaining agreements, who have attained age 20 and have completed at least 2 months of continuous service are eligible to participate as of the effective date of the Plan. [Emphasis added.]

The documentary evidence indicates that the ESOP plan, which has been in effect since 1977, was amended in 1983 retroactive to June 1, 1981.[8] The amendment, a document of some 37 pages, contains the following:

> ARTICLE I

Eligibility and Participation

3.1 Eligibility

. . . However, notwithstanding any provision to the contrary, no employee covered by a collective bargaining agreement between an Employee representative and the Employer shall become a Participant in the Plan, provided that retirement benefits of said class of Employees was the subject of good faith bargaining between the Employee representative and the Employer, and said Employee's retirement benefits are being funded pursuant to said collective bargaining agreements.

C. Analysis and Conclusions

1. The unfair labor practice case

Both the Respondent's employee handbook and its summary plan document, copies of which have been furnished to the employees since 1977 or 1978, specify that all employees are able to participate in the plan "except those covered by collective bargaining agreements." Similarly, on April 5, the Respondent's president, Scarzella, told the employees at a series of meetings that the "union cannot participate in ESOP," and Vice President Riley stated that "Any employee who is a member of collective bargaining cannot be eligible for this plan." Such statements by Scarzella and Riley are clearly violative of the Act, as alleged.

In Niagara Wires, 240 NLRB 1326, 1327–1328 (1979), the Board found that virtually identical language appearing in a pension plan and summaries of the plan, constituted a violation of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act. The Board stated:

> While, as Respondent notes, the Board has indeed found violations under the Act based on an employer's unlawful conduct in implementing a restrictive eligibility provision to deprive otherwise eligible employees of benefits, or by explicitly using the eligibility restriction as a coercive device during an election campaign,[3] it is clear that such conduct is not a sine qua non for finding a violation in this area. Rather, we have consistently stated that the mere maintenance and continuance of a provision in a pension plan, making lack of union representation one of the qualifications for eligibility to participate therein, itself tends to interfere with, restrain, and coerce employees who are otherwise eligible in the exercise of their self-organizational rights.[4] Here, Respondent's plan, in limiting eligibility to employees who are not covered by a collective-bargaining agreement, in effect, conditions eligibility on the unrepresented status of the employees. It is clear that Respondent publicized this restriction by distributing summaries of the plan to its employees a few weeks before they were scheduled to vote in the union election. While there is no reason to assume that the distribution of the plan was unlawfully motivated, the communication and the continued existence of such an exclusionary eligibility requirement necessarily exert a coercive impact on the employees. It is for this reason that an employee benefit plan which restricts coverage to unrepresented employees is per se violative of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act, regardless of whether the employer adds to the misconduct by implementing the restriction or exploiting it during an organizing campaign.[5]

Further, even assuming the exclusionary language of the amendment to the plan, supra, is not unlawful, and that Scarzella and Riley simply misrepresented the provision to the assembled employees, as the Respondent maintains, their statements are nevertheless unlawful. Thus, in Rangaire Corp., 157 NLRB 682, 684 (1966), the Board found under similar circumstances that although the exclusionary language of the plan was not unlawful, nevertheless a "plainly misleading statement of fact which purports to exclude the possibility of bargaining over continuation of an existing condition of employment interferes with the protected right of employees to engage in collective bargaining." See also Tappan Co., 228 NLRB 1389 (1977). It is therefore clear, and I find, that the similar misleading statements by Scarzella and Riley during the course of the April 5 group meetings were per se unlawful and violative of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.

In Rangaire, supra at 683, the Board found that language in a pension plan excluding "any person covered by a collective bargaining agreement entered into with the employer, which agreement does not provide for coverage of such person by this plan" was permissible. Similarly, in Tappan, supra at 1390, the language in the "retirement savings benefit plan" which was further described as "Tappan Company Retirement Savings Plan for Non-Bargaining Unit Employees" was not found to be unlawful, in that it did not automatically exclude union employees, but rather provided that they would be excluded only if they become members "of a bargaining unit recognized for the purpose of collective bargaining, and for whom the Company maintains or contributes to an employee benefit plan pursuant to agreement with the collective bargaining representative for the unit."

The Respondent contends that the exclusionary language in its amendment to the plan falls within the parameters of the cited cases, and is therefore lawful because, as stated by the Board in Solo Cup Co., 176 NLRB 823 at fn. 3 (1969):

> This does not mean of course, that an employer may not advise his employees, in a noncoercive fashion, that pensions for those in the unit are subject to bargaining and that if a separate pension plan for those in the unit is agreed upon, coverage in the existing plan will not be maintained, i.e., the employer is not obligated to provide "double coverage."

The General Counsel, however, citing Solo Cup, supra Kroger Co., 164 NLRB 362 (1967), enfd. 401 F.2d 682 (6th Cir. 1968), cert. denied 395 U.S. 904 (1969), and Winn-Dixie Stores, 224 NLRB 1418 (1976), enfd. in pertinent part 567 F.2d 1343 (2d Cir. 1978), maintains that the language is unlawful because of the nature of Respondent's plan. As argued by the General Counsel, the gravamen of the violations in the foregoing cases as well as the instant case involves the language in the employers' "profit sharing plans" which automatically preclude employees from enjoying the benefits of such plans if they become covered by a "retirement" plan negotiated by the union. Thus, profit-sharing plans and retirement plans, as characterized by the Board, are different entities.

Profit-sharing plans are essentially dependent on an employer's current and future profits and, as in the instant case, constitute a bonus for employees whose efforts have enabled the company to make a profit. As stated in the Respondent's employee handbook, the contributions are to be viewed as "extra salary." Indeed, the amendment to the plan renames it to reflect that it is a "Stock Bonus" plan designed to reward the employees for their contributions to the Respondent's success. Although certainly more elaborate, the plan, in essence, may be viewed as similar to an annual Christmas bonus rewarding employees for a job well done; and indeed, the value of the bonus to the employees may diminish with time, as the benefits are dependent on the value of the Respondent's stock upon the employees' retirement. In contrast, retirement plans or pension plans, as contemplated or discussed by the Board in the foregoing cases, are not subject to the vicissitudes of an employer's business operations, but rather are customarily funded on a different basis, ensuring regular contributions and stability. The fact that Respondent's plan is sometimes denominated as a retirement plan by the Respondent in the various documents or speeches referred to above does not alter the plan's essential purpose. As the Board has stated in Winn-Dixie, supra at 1419, the fact that "enjoyment of the benefits derived from Respondent's contributions is deferred until a point of time normally associated with retirement," is not a determinative factor.

On the basis of the foregoing, I find that Respondent's ESOP plan is a profit-sharing plan within the purview of the aforementioned cases. It is clear that an employer may not, through provisions of a profit-sharing plan, automatically deprive employees of benefits therefrom if they elect to be covered by a retirement or pension plan negotiated by the union. Because this is precisely the express intent of the language in Respondent's profit-sharing plan, such provisions are unlawful. I therefore conclude that by maintaining such an unlawful exclusionary clause in its profit-sharing plan Respondent has violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act, as alleged. Winn-Dixie Stores, supra; Solo Cup Co., supra; Kroger, supra.

2. The representation case

Insofar as the record shows, and as found above, the Respondent has maintained an unlawful exclusionary provision in its profit-sharing plan during all times material. The amended plan was in existence during the election campaign, as were the employee handbook and the summary plan document. Immediately before the filing of the petition, and as a direct consequence of the Union's request for recognition, the Respondent emphasized language contained in the employee handbook and summary plan document, by telling the employees that the benefits of the ESOP plan were not available to union-represented employees.[6] Further, during the course of the postpetition campaign, Respondent admittedly mentioned its ESOP plan to the employees, for purposes of comparison with the Union's retirement plan.

It is clear that conduct violative of Section 8(a)(1) as found here is, a fortiori, conduct which interferes with a free and untrammeled choice in the election. Federated Department Stores, 241 NLRB 240, 253 fn. 38 (1979); Dal-Tex Optical Co., 137 NLRB 1782, 1786 (1962). Respondent contends that the ESOP plan was not considered by Respondent to be a significant issue during the preelection campaign and therefore should not constitute grounds for setting the election aside. The Board stated in Enola Super Thrift, 233 NLRB 409 (1977), the "only recognized exception to this policy [of finding that conduct violative of Section 8(a)(1) constitutes a fortiori interference with a free election] is where the violations are such that it is virtually impossible to conclude that they could have affected the results of the election." Applying this test to the instant factual situation, it is clear that Respondent's contention is without merit.

Moreover, I find no merit to Respondent's similar argument that because the vote was overwhelmingly against union representation, it would serve no useful purpose to conduct a second election. It is clear that "whether certain conduct warrants setting aside an election does not turn on the election results, but rather on its likelihood to coerce prospective voters to cast their ballots in a particular manner." United Broadcasting Co., 248 NLRB 403, 404 (1980).

The Respondent's profit-sharing plan is a financial benefit which, it may reasonably be presumed, significantly affects each unit employee. Indeed, the Respondent, when confronted with the Union's request for recognition, deemed it expedient to present the employees with the details and benefits of the plan in an effort to persuade them that not only was a union unnecessary, but that selecting a union would result in their exclusion from the plan. I therefore conclude that, under the circumstances, it is necessary to recommend that a second election be conducted.[7]

[6] It is well-established that prepetition conduct may be considered for purposes of evaluating objections insofar as it lends meaning and dimension to postpetition conduct or assists in its evaluation. Arthur Briggs, Inc., 265 NLRB 299 (1982); Maywood, Inc., 251 NLRB 979 fn. 4 (1980); Dressler Industries, 231 NLRB 591 (1978); Parke Coal Co., 219 NLRB 546 (1975).

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. Respondent is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act.

2. The Union is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

3. The Respondent has violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act by threatening employees with loss of a profit-sharing plan in the event they become covered by a retirement plan negotiated by the Union.

4. The Respondent has violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act by maintaining article 3.1, Eligibility, of its amended profit-sharing plan which unlawfully excludes employees from participation in the plan, and by maintaining those portions of existing booklets and documents which contain related explanatory material.

5. The aforesaid unfair labor practices are unfair labor practices affecting commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

6. By the unfair labor practice found above, the Respondent has interfered with the freedom of choice of its employees in the representation proceeding, and it is recommended that the election in Case 20–RC–15616 held on June 2, 1983, be set aside and that a second election be conducted.

THE REMEDY

Having found that Respondent violated and is violating Section 8(a)(1) of the Act, I recommend that it be required to cease and desist therefrom and from in any like or related manner interfering with, restraining, or coercing its employees in the exercise of their rights under Section 7 of the Act, and take certain affirmative action described here, including the posting of an appropriate notice attached hereto as "Appendix [omitted from publication]."

Having found that Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act by maintaining article 3.1 "Eligibility" of its amended profit-sharing plan, it is recommended that Respondent cease and desist from further maintaining the paragraph. Further, Respondent shall be ordered to amend the plan and any existing employee booklets and/or publications so as to eliminate therefrom any language which suggests that employees covered by a retirement plan resulting from collective bargaining through a union will be disqualified from participating in Respondent's profit-sharing plan.

[Recommended Order omitted from publication.]

DECISION AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN STEPHENS AND MEMBERS JOHANSEN AND CRACRAFT

On April 6, 1988, Administrative Law Judge Claude R. Wolfe issued the attached decision. The General Counsel filed exceptions and a supporting brief, and the Respondent filed cross-exceptions and an answering brief.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the decision and the record in light of the exceptions and briefs and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings,[1] and conclusions and to adopt the recommended Order.

ORDER

The recommended Order of the administrative law judge is adopted and the complaint is dismissed.

[1] The General Counsel has excepted to some of the judge's credibility findings. The Board's established policy is not to overrule an administrative law judge's credibility resolutions unless the clear preponderance of all the relevant evidence convinces us that they are incorrect. Standard Dry Wall Products, 91 NLRB 544 (1950), enfd. 188 F.2d 362 (3d Cir. 1951). We have carefully examined the record and find no basis for reversing the findings.

DECISION

[1]CLAUDE R. WOLFE, Administrative Law Judge. This proceeding was litigated before me at Philadelphia, Pennsylvania, on 25, 26, and 27 January 1988 pursuant to charges timely filed and served in June 1987 and complaint issued on 11 August 1987.[1] The complaint alleges that The Wackenhut Corporation (Respondent) refused to hire Dwain Haines, Michael Wascheck, Robert Condo, and Mark Nixon because they supported and assisted the United Plant Guard Workers of America, Local 506 (the Union), and thereby violated Section 8(a)(3) of the Act. The General Counsel theorizes that the refusals to hire were prompted by the four employees' activities in processing grievances and opposing ratification for the current collective-bargaining agreement between Respondent and the Union. Respondent contends it based its refusal to hire Wascheck, Condo, and Nixon on their work and discipline record as employees of Yoh Security, Inc., and that Haines did not file an application for work with Respondent.

After considering the record, the demeanor of the witnesses testifying before me, and the posttrial briefs submitted by the parties, I conclude, for reasons set forth below, that Respondent has not violated the Act as alleged.

FINDINGS AND CONCLUSIONS

I. JURISDICTION

Respondent is, and has been at all times material, a Florida corporation engaged in the provision of security services at several locations throughout the United States, including Salem Hope Creek Nuclear Generating Station in Lower Alloways Township, New Jersey, and, during the year preceding the issuance of the complaint, Respondent, in the course and conduct of these business operations, derived gross revenues in excess of $500,000 and performed services valued in excess of $50,000 to customers located outside the State of New Jersey. Respondent is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act.

II. LABOR ORGANIZATION

The Union is, and has been at all times material, a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

III. THE ALLEGED UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

On 29 April, Respondent commenced performing its contractual duty to supply security services at the Salem Hope Creek Nuclear Generating Stations. Before that date, those services had been furnished by Yoh Security, Inc. (Yoh). During its incumbency, Yoh was party to a collective-bargaining agreement with the Union which covered Yoh's employees at this location. Condo, Nixon, Wascheck, and Haines were among those employees. After securing the contract to perform the security work, Respondent advised Yoh employees by letter of 23 December 1986 that it had been awarded the work, would prepare transition plan and discuss continued employment of Yoh employees in January, and would be in touch with their bargaining representative regarding wages and benefits. Subsequently, Respondent negotiated a collective-bargaining agreement with the Union effective 1 May which was ratified by the employees. The ratification was not unanimous, and the General Counsel adduced uncontroverted and credited testimony that the alleged discriminatees opposed ratification of the agreement.

There were two ratification meetings for each shift. The first series of meetings was held on or about 24 March 1987. During the meeting with his particular shift on this date, each of the four men named above expressed his opposition to Respondent's contract proposal. The proposal was rejected. There is no evidence that Respondent knew these employees had so acted. Several other employees opposed ratification during these March meetings.

After the March rejection of Respondent's proposal, further negotiations were held on or about 10 April. Robert Condo served on the Union's negotiating team during this bargaining session which resulted in a contract reached by the parties on that date. On redirect examination, Condo testified that, as everyone was leaving the meeting and shaking hands, he said to Respondent's representative, Frobea, and union negotiators McConville and Hartladge that he was shaking hands under protest and did not agree with the agreement reached by the other participants. On recross-examination, Condo testified that he did not so tell Frobea, but so told McConville. Heltien added that Frobea was there and heard it. I do not rely on Condo's conclusion that Frobea heard his comments to McConville because he does not explain how he knows that to be the case; his two statements are inconsistent; and his failure under repeated questioning to relate in even vague detail what transpired during the 3-hour negotiation meeting of 10 April indicates either faulty recollection or evasion, either of which detracts from the reliability of his testimony regarding the events of that day. Nevertheless, he was believably certain, and I find, that he did state his opposition to Respondent's proposal during the meeting in the presence of Respondent's negotiators and was not in agreement with the results of the negotiation. These results were placed before the various shifts of employees on or about 13 April. Condo attended each of these shift meetings as a member of the negotiating team, but spoke neither for nor against ratification during these meetings. Nixon, Wascheck, and Haines did not speak at these meetings in opposition to ratification, as did other employees. The trust of the credible testimony is that these were more insistent in their opposition than the others, but there is no evidence that Respondent knew which of the employees opposed the contract in ratification meetings or who were the most insistent in their opposition. The proposal was ratified, with about 20 employees voting against against ratification, and, as I have noted above, the Union and Respondent became party to a collective-bargaining agreement concerning the security employees at the installation involved here.

Condo, Nixon, Wascheck, and Haines all served as union shop stewards during their employment with Yoh. Condo was the Union's vice chairman for the bargaining unit in 1987 until he resigned that position about 2 weeks before 24 April 1987. Wascheck filed a class action grievance on 2 April 1987 seeking 2 hours' pay at time and a half from Yoh for item spent by its guards filling out applications and related documents for Respondent. He also acted as steward on five grievances filed by other employees of Yoh between March and November 1986. Haines filed seven grievances on his own behalf between March and November 1986, and represented another employee on a grievance filed on November 1986. Nixon filed no grievance on his own behalf, but represented others on two grievances filed in May and August 1986, respectively. There is some testimony from Wascheck, Nixon, and Condo that grievances were processed and union business discussed by them with Brian Eastman, Yoh's acting project manager at the time, in an office shared by Eastman and John Robbins, Respondent's director of operations. Robbins agrees that for a time after he arrived at the site in early February 1987 he shared an office with Eastman, and that two or three grievances were discussed while he was present in the office. He denied any involvement in the discussions or any recollection of the identity of the union representatives involved. In this regard, I note that Condo testified that Robbins probably was not aware Condo had asked Eastman to have Robbins leave, even though Robbins was present in the office at the time. Robbins does recall that someone told him Condo took part in the negotiations and that he (Robbins) considered at one point, due to Wascheck's dress in coat and tie, that Wascheck may have been a candidate for union office.

The date is not certain, but it appears Respondent commenced its employment process among Yoh employees in early March 1987. The first step was the posting of notices establishing two dates for employees on each shift to file applications. That Respondent was amenable to a change of date on reasonable excuse is shown by Condo's testimony that although he was on vacation on 31 March, the date he was scheduled to apply, he was permitted by Respondent to file on 3 April 1987. At the time of filing, employees were also fingerprinted and required to sign a release of their personnel records maintained by Yoh. On receipt of the Yoh files, Respondent by its agents, Program Manager Robert Young and Director of Operations John Robbins, examined them and determined which employees they would hire and which they would not. Robbins testified it was decided not to hire Condo, Nixon, Wascheck, Michael Ottinger, or Robert Merritt. One hundred and five (105) Yoh employees were hired by Respondent effective 29 April 1987, including several union officials and stewards.

When Condo appeared for his scheduled job interview on 24 April, he was told by Robbins that Respondent would not hire him because of incidents in his work record. Robbins enumerated an altercation with a nonemployee motorist on the access road to the facility, not wearing a hardhat, and sleeping on the job. Robbins asserts the key reasons were the 2 November 1986 confrontation with the motorist, which showed Condo had a quick temper, and a 22 February 1983 incident where Condo was observed with his eyes closed for 2 minutes, which Robbins concludes is an indication Condo was sleeping. Condo's personnel record at Yoh also shows Condo was not wearing a hardhat on 14 May 1983, and took his badge home on 22 February 1985. These later two incidents were not cited by Robbins as significant factors in his decision not to hire Condo.

Mark Nixon does not recall the reasons other than attendance given by Robbins for rejecting his application. I therefore credit Robbins that he told Nixon of each and every incident set down in Yoh's files, which are in substance as follows:

> 23 April 1986—refusal to sign for a 24 minute late arrival at guard mount.

17 October 1983—eating in the break trailer with his radio off [an intercom] when he was supposed to be on another post.

21 November 1983, 19 January, and 5 February 1984—reading newspaper on post.

24 May 1984—counselled to button his shirt.

26 May 1984—involved with controlled substance.

30 April 1983—another guard reported that after he signed in at a post, Nixon left and was not seen for the rest of the night.

18 August 1986—19 points[2] for absence and tardiness.

23 October 1985—drove through guard post barricade with minor damage to his car.

March 1987—20 points for absenteeism.

Robbins testifies that he rejected Nixon principally because of the volume of incidents and the alleged involvement with a controlled substance which, as he recalls, was ownership of marijuana. Robbins notes that he placed little reliance on absenteeism and tardiness unless it displayed an unacceptable level like that of Merritt who, among other things, was suspended seven times by Yoh for absence and tardiness.

Wascheck's record at Yoh reflected the following incidents, in substance:

26 August 1986—11 points for absenteeism.

05 May 1986—wearing a union badge on his uniform.

25 August 1985—not wearing hard hat or safety glasses.

10 September 1984—not wearing safety glasses.

29 August 1984—no hard hat or safety glasses.

30 May 1984—playing cards in the break trailer.

12 February 1984—reading newspaper on post.

06 January 1984—drove personally owned vehicle in an unauthorized area.

30 November 1982—took public service bicycle for a joy ride.

Robbins told Wascheck this work record was the reason he would not be hired, and testified that this decision was reached because of the number of items as well as the taking of the bicycle which, although may be a prank, displayed a personality and attitude which could be a major problem.

The General Counsel submitted the Yoh work records of 13 employees whom Respondent hired. These records were included in the personnel documents examined by Robbins and Young when they were hiring Yoh employees. An examination of these records shows that Respondent hired employees who had engaged in conduct similar to that presented as primary reasons for refusing to hire Condo, Nixon, and Wascheck. Condo's sitting with his eyes closed for 2 minutes is not unlike the conduct of Charles Maurer in 1984 when he was suspended for 5 days because he was leaning back in his chair with his eyes closed giving the impression he was sleeping. Thomas Davis was also suspended for 5 days in 1985 for nodding and inattentiveness on duty. Kenneth Coombs was warned for nodding on duty; no date shown. In 1985, Kenneth Stanton was warned for lying on the floor on his back, but not sleeping. Maurer, Davis, Coombs, and Stanton were all hired by Respondent.

In the case of Nixon, Robbins stresses the volume of his misdeeds and his alleged involvement with a controlled substance. Kenneth Stanton was counseled 15 times on personal grooming, and was suspended 9 times for absence and lateness. Valerie Robinson was suspended seven times for absence and lateness. Several other employees who were hired were suspended from four to six times for absence and lateness. Valerie Robinson, Thomas Davis, and Michael Dawson had all been warned for reading on post, Dawson twice, but they were hired. In this connection, Nixon was warned three times for reading on post. Thomas Davis and Michael Dawson left their posts without proper relief. Kenneth Coombs left his post without authorization. Dianne Hunter was late to her assigned post on two occasions. These improper comings and goings of employees hired by Respondent are of the same genus, but not the same species, as Nixon's refusal to sign for late arrival, his leaving his post and not returning, and his eating in the break trailer when he was supposed to be at another post. There is no evidence that any other employee engaged in conduct equivalent to Nixon's driving through a guardpost barricade. With respect to Nixon's alleged involvement with a controlled substance, I note that another employee who was hired was accused of using drugs by an anonymous phone caller.

As with Nixon, Wascheck's record of infractions is not as lengthy as those of some employees hired. There is, however, no evidence of conduct by any other employee paralleling Wascheck's joyride on the bicycle owned by the public service company.

The hiring of employees who, while employees of Yoh, had been warned or otherwise disciplined for conduct similar to that advanced as reason for the failure to hire Condo, Nixon, and Wascheck, and had engaged in other misconduct sufficient to require a warning or suspension, warrants viewing the reasons advanced for the refusals to hire with suspicion. Nevertheless, the General Counsel's case is deficient in terms of employer knowledge and hostility. It has not been shown that, with the single exception of Condo's opposition during negotiations, Respondent was aware of the alleged discriminatees' opposition to the negotiated collective-bargaining agreement. The opposition was, except in the case of Condo, voiced in ratification meetings limited to employees and union officials. There is no evidence it was made known to, or could or should have been known by, Respondent in all the circumstances. Similarly, there is no persuasive evidence Respondent resented employee opposition to the contract, or the filing of grievances, or believed the alleged discriminatees were or might have been the most active grievance filers or processors. The other stewards and union officials were hired. So far as this record shows Respondent never uttered any antiunion statements or otherwise displayed any hostility toward the Union, its adherents, or employee union activities. To the contrary, Respondent made no discernible effort to evade its bargaining obligations, but, rather, promptly entered into bargaining with the Union resulting in a collective-bargaining agreement opposed by a minority of bargaining unit employees. Concurrently with the bargaining, Respondent accepted applications from Yoh employees who were represented by the Union, and subsequently hired all but a very few.

Discrediting the reasons assigned for refusing to hire Condo, Nixon, and Wascheck would not prove the requisite unlawful motivation which must rest on the result of an evaluation of all the relevant evidence.[3] There is no other evidence of unlawful motivation in this case. The rationale applicable is set forth in Briarwood Hilton, 222 NLRB 986 (1976); where the Board stated at 991:

> The employer's explanation for a discharge is a factor which is weighed in determining whether the action was unlawful. However, a feeble reason for the termination, alone, or together with evidence that the employer knew of the dischargee's union sympathies and was opposed to an ongoing organizational campaign, does not spell out an unlawful discharge. To find a violation of Section 8(a)(3) the evidence must permit a positive finding (which may be based on circumstantial evidence) that union activity was a contributing factor in the decision to discharge the employee. Suspicion that such was the case is not enough.

I conclude the same reasoning is applicable to refusal to hire. Assuming, at the risk of being guilty of substituting one's own business judgment for that of the employer, that the reasons for refusing to hire Condo, Nixon, and Wascheck are feeble, there is no other evidence, circumstantial or direct, of unlawful motivation. Furthermore, the proof of employer knowledge is somewhat less than persuasive. Briarwood Hilton was a far stronger case than this in terms of evidence. The alleged discriminatee, Turner, was known to be an active union adherent. Respondent was vigorously opposed to union organization, and committed an independent violation of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act. Finally, the reason for Turner's discharge was very weak. With all this, no violation was found. This case is not that strong. Accordingly, I conclude and find that the General Counsel has failed to establish a prima facie case that Respondent violated Section 8(a)(3) of the Act by refusing to hire Condo, Nixon, and Wascheck. Briarwood Hilton, supra; Raysel-Ide, Inc., 284 NLRB 879 (1987).

The situation of Dwain Haines is completely different. His prior work record is not in issue. Respondent simply contends that Haines never filed an application for work with Respondent. Haines was off sick on 31 March, the date his shift was scheduled to apply. He knew before that date that 31 March was his date to apply. On 1 April, he asked Lieutenant Jerry Hand, a Yoh employee, if there would be a makeup date. Hand said he thought there would. On several other occasions before 20 April, Haines asked Hand when he would be able to file an application. Hand each time told him he had not heard anything. On 20 April, Haines again asked when he could file an application. Hand promised to call back and let him know. Hand did call back on 20 April and told Haines that Wackenhut would get back to Hand.[4] On 24 April, Haines again contacted Hand who said he would contact the program manager to "find out anything" and would call Haines back. Hand did call Haines back that day, and told him that Brian Eastman, program manager, had said Haines should go see Wackenhut after work that day. Haines had not prior to that date talked to any Wackenhut representative regarding employment. Haines met with Robbins and Young between 2 and 2:30 p.m. that day. There is no serious disagreement between Robbins, Young, and Haines regarding what was said. I regard their testimony as complementary, and conclude the following is a fair summation of what happened at this meeting. Haines inquired about filing an application. Robbins responded that, because he had filed no application, Respondent had concluded Haines was not going to work for Wackenhut. Robbins further explained Respondent had reached its manning level, but would entertain Haines' application at its offsite office in Pennsville, New Jersey, when Respondent needed more people. Robert Young credibly testified that commencing about 3 April all applications were handled at the Pennsville office, none at the site. Haines has never applied, and the mere fact that Hash and Rizzo later applied and were hired in the next group is probative evidence of nothing. There is no probative evidence Respondent had not reached its manning level by 24 April, and no one else was hired for more than a month thereafter. I therefore credit Robbins. Its work force for 29 April was full when Haines showed up. Respondent explained that Nathaniel Pierce, who did not file his application until 26 April, had been advised in March that although he would not be able to file his application with his shift, he did want to work for Respondent. Respondent decided to hire him on the basis of his personnel file, and Pierce was permitted to file the late application after he had in fact been told he would be hired. Two other employees were hired who filed applications on 22 April. The Respondent was lenient with these three employees and Condo with respect to filing applications, and the same might well have been true with Haines had he applied with Respondent before the employee complement had been completed. Haines, however, directed his inquires to Hand, an employee of Yoh for whose conduct Respondent is not responsible. Contrary to the General Counsel's assertion in his brief, Respondent is not responsible for Haines' failure to make application. He was not refused an application, but was advised future needs would be filled from applications filed at its Pennsville office where he elected not to go. Regarding the other three alleged discriminatees, there is insufficient evidence to support a finding that Respondent was hostile to any statutorily protected activity by Haines. It is unfortunate that he was not given better advice by Hand, or that he did not himself inquire of Respondent before he did, but Respondent cannot be held responsible for either of these circumstances. There is no evidence Haines would have been rejected had he filed an application earlier, or had earlier let Respondent know he wanted to be considered. I have credited Respondent that its manning level had been met when Haines first made known his interest. This alone would be sufficient to defeat the allegation Haines was unlawfully denied employment, but it is not necessary to rely on this factor because counsel for the General Counsel's failure to affirmatively prove unlawful motivation leaves him without a prima facie case that Section 8(a)(3) of the Act has been violated by the failure to hire Haines.

[4] Haines' testimony as to what Hand told him is hearsay received over Respondent's objection to explain further actions by Haines, but not for the truth of Hand's statement. Hand did not testify. I therefore do not find that Hand's statements constitute probative evidence of the content of communications to him by Respondent's agents.

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. Respondent is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act.

2. The Union is a labor organization with the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

3. The General Counsel had not established by a preponderance of the credible evidence that Respondent has violated the Act as alleged in the complaint.

On these findings of fact and conclusions of law and on the entire record, I issue the following recommended[5]

ORDER

The complaint is dismissed in its entirety.

[5] If no exceptions are filed as provided by Sec. 102.46 of the Board's Rules and Regulations, the findings, conclusions, and recommended Order shall, as provided in Sec. 102.48 of the Rules, be adopted by the Board and all objections to them shall be deemed waived for all purposes.

SUPPLEMENTAL DECISION AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN STEPHENS AND MEMBERS JOHANSEN AND CRACRAFT

On May 20, 1988, Administrative Law Judge Claude R. Wolfe issued the attached supplemental decision. The Respondent filed exceptions and a supporting brief, and the General Counsel filed an answering brief.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the decision and the record in light of the exceptions and briefs and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings,[1] and conclusions[2] and to adopt the recommended Order.

ORDER

IT IS ORDERED that the application of the Applicant, Raytown United Super, Inc., Raytown, Missouri, for an award under the Equal Access to Justice Act is dismissed.

[1] We find it unnecessary to rely on the judge's finding that the General Counsel was substantially justified because she prevailed before the judge in the unfair labor practice stage of the proceeding.

[2] The Applicaut argues that the General Counsel was not substantially justified in pursuing the complaint because the Board, in finding there was no agreement on the contract's term, relied on the Union's own negotiating notes, which clearly rebutted the General Counsel's case. We disagree. The context in which the Board referred to the Union's negotiating notes makes clear that it was the Respondent's testimony coupled with the notes which led the Board to conclude the contract's term was unresolved. The Board did not indicate that it would have reached the same result on the basis of the Union's notes alone and it may not have if the contract term was the only unresolved issue, particularly in light of the credited testimony of the Union's witnesses.

SUPPLEMENTAL DECISION

CLAUDE R. WOLFE, Administrative Law Judge. On September 8, 1986, I issued a decision in this proceeding finding that Raytown United Super, Inc. (Raytown) and the Union orally agreed to all substantive contract terms by September 25, 1985, and Raytown therefore violated Section 8(a)(5) of the Act by refusing to execute a collective-bargaining agreement embodying those terms. Raytown filed exceptions. The National Labor Relations Board then issued its decision on January 29, 1988,[1] finding Raytown had not violated the Act because the parties had not reached agreement on the contract term or a seniority provision, and therefore did not reach full agreement on a contract.

On February 24, 1988, Raytown filed an application for award of attorney's fees and expenses under the Equal Access to Justice Act, Pub. L. 96–481, 94 Stat. 2325 and Section 102.143 of the Board's Rules and Regulations, contending that the General Counsel was not substantively justified in proceeding to complaint and litigating the case. The Board referred the application to me on February 24, 1988, for appropriate action.

On March 29, 1988, counsel for the General Counsel filed a motion to dismiss the application because the General Counsel's position in the underlying unfair labor practice was at all times substantially justified. Raytown opposes the motion.

Raytown argues as follows:

> From the outset of the investigation, it was or should have been clear that there had been no agreement between the parties on the length of the alleged contract or on a seniority proposal made by the Company.
> As noted in the Board's decision, the Union's own bargaining notes confirmed the absence of an agreement on the critical issue of contract duration. All that General Counsel could argue in her brief (citation omitted) was that the reference in the Union's bargaining notes was likely "either a mistake . . . or simply a reflection of another attempt by Kays to toss in a red herring and go back on an earlier agreement." As to the former, it was not substantially justified for General Counsel to have proceeded on a complaint when the Charging Party's own notes reflected no agreement for the term of the alleged agreement. As to the latter, General Counsel's argument that the Company was seeking to backtrack on earlier agreements was inconsistent with the theory of alleged violation on which the case was tried, as noted by the Board in its decision.
> [A]s found by the Board, the case does not turn on disputed issues of credibility. The Board held:
> > It is clear that the parties had not agreed on at least two material terms . . . .
> This had been the employer's position from the outset of the Regional investigation. General Counsel was in possession of the Union's own bargaining notes substantiating the Company's position. The Board held that it was clear no agreement was reached, and General Counsel's position to the contrary was not substantially justified.

Raytown refers to the notation in the Union's negotiating notes for September 17 reading "Term-Date of rat.-2/28/87." The Board pointed to this as part of the evidence supporting its conclusion that Raytown on September 17 proposed the effective date of the contract to be the date of its ratification, but the Board rejected Raytown's contention that the evidence showed "it was resolved" on Septemeber 17 that the effective date would be the ratification date. If, as Raytown initially argued in its exceptions to my decision, the union notes and testimony showed the parties had agreed on September 17 to make the collective-bargaining agreement effective on the date of ratification, there would have been no open issue on the contract term on September 25. Now Raytown argues it should have been clear from the outset of the precomplaint investigation that the Union's September 17 notes confirmed the absence of any agreement on the contract term. Thus we have the Board viewing the note as evidence of a Raytown proposal on September 17, and Raytown viewing it first as proof of a September 17 agreement on the effective date of contract and second as proof of no agreement. That the note is ambiguous and susceptible of different interpretations appears obvious. The General Counsel cannot be faulted for continuing to investigate and to prosecute merely because Costanza's notes are ambiguous.

The General Counsel urges, and I find, that the fact the Board's conclusions differ from those of the General Counsel's and my conclusions does not necessarily mean that the General Counsel's prosecution of the case was not substantially justified.[2] Keeping in mind that "substantially justified" means "more than mere reasonableness,"[3] I find, for the following reasons, that the General Counsel's position was substantially justified.

Raytown correctly notes that the Board found it clear that the parties had not agreed on the term of the contract and seniority. That is the law of the case, but that does not mean that no other reasonable inference could have been drawn from the facts. I credited Union Representative Costanza's testimony regarding his September 25, 1985 negotiations with Raytown's president, Kays, wherever their testimony conflicted. This determination was not disturbed by the Board. According to Costanza's credible testimony, a complete agreement was reached by the end of this meeting that seniority was agreed to. When one considers this credible testimony together with the written list of unresolved issues presented to Costanza by Kays at the beginning of the September 25 meeting, which does not enumerate term of agreement as an unresolved issue and only notes with respect to seniority that language was being drafted by Raytown's counsel, it may reasonably be concluded that the General Counsel had a prima facie case that complete agreement was reached. Combine all this with Kay's statement on October 13 that he would not sign the agreement if it had a union-security provision (which he had specifically agreed on September 25 was a settled issue) without protest or question of any other portion of the contract the was asked to sign, it is clearly not unreasonable to conclude term of contract and seniority had been agreed on September 25.

What we have in this case is a situation where the Board and Raytown drew certain inferences from the facts leading to conclusions contrary to those drawn by me and the General Counsel. None of these inferences drawn by the parties, the Board, or me are so bereft of reason as to be suject to rejection out of hand. Given the inferences drawn by me and the General Counsel, a finding that there was a prima facie case of final agreement is warranted. That alone is sufficient to establish that the General Counsel had substantial justification for litigating the issue.[4] That the General Counsel did not prevail before the Board does not indicate otherwise.[5] It appears to me that the fact the General Counsel prevailed at the administrative law judge stage should suggest that the General Counsel was substantially justified for proceeding as she did from the outset, and certainly was substantially justified in proceeding after she prevailed at that stage. As judge King has cogently observed, "Where the General Counsel advances in good faith a close question of law or fact, and thereafter loses, a finding that [s]he was not substantially justified in issuing the complaint would have a chilling effect on the proper pursuit of the duties of the General Counsel to enforce the Act, as the Act so mandates."[6] Here there was a close question of fact susceptible of various reasonable interpretations. Accordingly, when the General Counsel in good faith selected one, issued a complaint, and litigated the issue before me, where she prevailed, and the Board, she was substantially justified in so doing. I therefore find that Raytown United Super, Inc. is not entitled to an award under the Equal Access to Justice Act, and issue the following recommended[7]

BY MEMBERS JOHANSEN, BABSON, AND CRACRAFT

On September 30, 1987, Administrative Law Judge Howard I. Grossman issued the attached decision. The Respondent filed exceptions and a supporting brief.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the decision and the record in light of the exceptions and brief and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings,[1] and conclusions[2] and to adopt the recommended Order.

ORDER

The National Labor Relations Board adopts the recommended Order of the administrative law judge and orders that the Respondent, Greensboro News & Record, Inc., Greensboro, North Carolina, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall take the action set forth in the Order.

[1] The Respondent has excepted to some of the judge's credibility findings. The Board's established policy is not to overrule an administrative law judge's credibility resolutions unless the clear preponderance of all the relevant evidence convinces us that they are incorrect. Standard Dry Wall Products, 91 NLRB 544 (1950), enfd. 188 F.2d 362 (3d Cir. 1951). We have carefully examined the record and find no basis for reversing the findings.

[2] The judge erroneously stated that employee James Roberts was reinstated in October 1985 rather than in October 1984. In adopting the judge's conclusion that the Respondent unlawfully warned Roberts, we do not rely on statements in the employee handbook as evidence of union animus.

Further, we find that the Respondent and the Union had not bargained to impasse on the subject of overtime assignment prior to the Respondent's unlawful unilateral assumption of control of the overtime board.

Ronald A. Lindsay, Esq. (Seyforth, Shaw, Fairweather & Geraldson), of Washington, D.C., for the Respondent.

DECISION

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

HOWARD I. GROSSMAN, Administrative Law Judge. The original charge in Case 11–CA–12135 was filed on 17 September 1986[1] by Greensboro Printing and Graphic Communications Union, Local No. 319, Graphic Communications International Union, AFL–CIO, CLC (the Union), and an amended charge on 23 October. The Union also filed the original charge in Case 11–CA–12193 on 20 November, an amended charge on 2 December, and a second amended charge on 2 January 1987. Further, the Union filed the original charge in Case 11–CA–12263 on 2 February 1987 and an amended charge on 6 March 1987.

After prior issuance of two complaints, a consolidated complaint issued on 6 March 1987. It alleges that Greensboro News & Record, Inc. (Respondent or the Company) violated Section 8(a)(3) and (4) of the National Labor Relations Act (the Act) by issuing warnings to employee James L. Roberts on three occasions because of his union activities and because he cooperated with the National Labor Relations Board in the investigation of a prior case, testified before the Board in the case, filed charges with the Board, and cooperated in the investigation of other cases.

Further, the consolidated complaint alleges that Respondent violated Section 8(a)(5) of the Act by engaging in various unilateral actions, to wit (1) assuming control of the overtime board; (2) altering the method of operation of the overtime board by (a) refusing to allow substitutes to work, (b) giving press assistants priority, (c) changing the journeyman to press assistant overtime ratio, and (d) changing the overtime reporting requirements for foremen; (3) altering its break policy by first restricting breaks to two specified areas, and then to one area; (4) altering its cleanup policy; and (5) altering its vacation board and vacation policy.

Finally, the consolidated complaint alleges that the Respondent unlawfully refused to provide the Union with information regarding the number of employees who would have had to work double shifts in order to fill the unfilled shifts in May, June, and July 1986.

A hearing was held before me on this matter in Greensboro, North Carolina, on 7 and 8 April 1987. On the entire record, including briefs filed by the General Counsel and the Respondent and on my observation of the demeanor of the witnesses, I make the following

I. JURISDICTION

The pleadings establish that Respondent is a North Carolina corporation with a facility located at Greensboro, North Carolina, where it subscribes to an interstate news service, publishes nationally syndicated features, advertises nationally sold products and, during the 12-month period preceding issuance of the complaint, received at its Greensboro, North Carolina facility goods and raw materials valued in excess of $50,000 directly from points located outside the State of North Carolina. The pleadings further establish that Respondent is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

[1] All dates are in 1986 unless otherwise specified.

II. THE LABOR ORGANIZATION INVOLVED

The pleadings further establish that the Union is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

III. THE ALLEGED DISCRIMINATORY WARNINGS AND UNILATERAL CHANGES IN BREAK POLICY

A. The Prior Proceeding

In a former proceeding,[2] the Board found that Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act by threatening reprisals against employees for associating with persons engaged in union activities, by issuing a warning to an employee for engaging in such activities, and by unlawful interrogation of employees.[3]

The Board also found that the Respondent discriminatorily discharged employee James Roberts because of activities on behalf of the Union, thus violating Section 8(a)(3) and (1) of the Act. The Board concluded that the Respondent's asserted reason for discharging Roberts, sabotage, was pretextual, and that the reason was his "substantial and continuous union activity at the Respondent's plant, which include enforcing the terms of the pressmen's collective-bargaining contract and work rules, organizing in other departments, and filing unfair labor practice charges and testifying before the Board."[4] The Board's remedial Order, inter alia, required that the Respondent reinstate Roberts.

B. The Current Allegations

The facts underlying the allegations of discriminatory warnings issued to Roberts are linked to the evidence concerning the alleged unilateral changes in the Company's break policies. Accordingly, these matters will be considered together.

C. Roberts' Renewed Union Activities

Roberts was reinstated in October 1985[5] and, as president of the Union, resumed his union activities. A few months after reinstatement, while filing a grievance, Roberts informed Production Director Merrell B. Stafford that he intended to continue his efforts to organize the newspaper.

Roberts concentrated on Respondent's approximately 200–250 mailroom employees.[6] These employees were represented by another union, but only 20 were union members according to Roberts, and there was no collective-bargaining agreement. During the year preceding the hearing in this matter, Roberts talked to 20–30 mailroom employees, principally during lunchbreaks. He originally tried to get the mailroom employees to join his union. However, they expressed a preference for the Teamsters, and Roberts continued to talk with them thereafter. A notice was posted in the mailroom in October 1986 regarding a Teamsters meeting. Production Director Stafford was aware of the Teamsters' organizing effort, and discussed the matter with his supervisors. The Teamsters were organizing at the time of the hearing in this matter.

D. Prior Restrictions on Breaks by Pressroom Employees

The General Counsel adduced evidence that Roberts was warned against going into the mailroom and the cafeteria. Similar evidence was elicited in the former proceeding. Thus, the Respondent posted a notice in 1982 "that no one from the pressroom could go into the mailroom or any other department. However, when Roberts complained about it, the notice was taken down."[7]

In the instant proceeding, Former Vice President for Administration Richard Hendricks agreed that the notice had been "taken down," but also asserted that a concomitant "agreement" with the Union limited the withdrawal of the restriction to pressroom employees working in the reel room, i.e., other pressroom employees were still restricted to the "quiet room." Although the issue is not crucial in this proceeding, I note the inconsistency in Hendricks' contention that a notice assertedly still applicable to some pressroom employees was nonetheless removed. For this reason, and because Hendricks' testimony is contrary to the Board's finding in the former case, I do not credit Hendricks on this issue.[8]

E. The October Conversation and Letter to Roberts

1. Summary of the evidence

Mailroom Superintendent Don Lister testified that he noticed "pressroom employees" coming into the mailroom and its breakroom "on a regular basis" in October 1986. He asserted concern that "pressmen" with ink on "their" uniforms were soiling seats in the mailroom breakroom, and thus staining the clothes of mailroom employees, most of whom did not wear uniforms. According to Lister, he complained about this in mid-Octo-

Although the name of Respondent is not exactly the same as the name in the former proceeding, the fact that the same Employer is involved is established by the parties' situplation that the discriminatee in the prior case, James Roberts, was reinstated by Respondent here in compliance with the Board's prior Order (Jt. Exh. 33), and by the testimony of witnesses for the General Counsel (Roberts) and the Respondent (Richard Hendricks).

[6] Roberts estimated 200 mailroom employees, although Mailroom Superintendent Don Lister said there were 250.

[7] Greensboro News Co., 272 NLRB at 140. The notice, dated 19 January 1982, is in evidence in this proceeding and reads as follows:

TO PRESSROOM EMPLOYEES

Because of the noise in the Press Room, employees working there have been allowed and recommended to rotate in leaving the Press Room every 20 or 30 minutes. They can spend a few minutes in the "quiet room," or go to the canteen.

Some Press Room employees have developed a habit of spending such break time in other areas of Company operations, talking to employees in such departments. This not only makes it difficult for Press foremen to locate Press employees if they are needed suddenly, but it also distracts the workers of other departments to have Press Room employees appear at odd times in areas other than their own.

In the future, Pressmen taking a noise break will restrict themselves to the "quiet room" or the Canteen [R. Exh. 12].

[8] The administrative law judge in the former proceeding made findings contrary to Hendricks' testimony, and specifically discredited him at one point (272 NLRB 140 fn. 19).

ber to Production Director Stafford. Stafford asked who was in the mailroom, and Lister replied that Roberts was "one of them." Stafford stated that he would have Pressroom Supervisor Clayton Patterson speak to Roberts about the matter.

Pressroom Superintendent Dennis Clark testified that Lister came to him in October and asked that Clark's "people" eat their lunch and take breaks in their own breakroom because of ink on their uniforms and limited space in the mailroom. Clark's testimony about this conversation does not mention Roberts. According to Clark, he talked to Stafford about the matter, and the latter said he would bring it up at a staff meeting.

Production Director Stafford's description of his conversation with Lister omits reference to any employees other than Roberts, or to the regularity of the alleged infractions. According to Stafford, all that Lister said was that Roberts had taken a break in the mailroom; the two supervisors agreed to bring the matter up at a staff meeting. Stafford contended that he had no knowledge of employees other than Roberts taking breaks outside the pressroom area.

Roberts testified that, on 30 October 1986, Pressroom Supervisor Clayton Patterson told him that he was spending too much time in the mailroom. Roberts replied that he did not spend any more time there than did other employees, and asked whether Patterson was ordering him not to go into the mailroom. Patterson replied in the negative. Roberts then got Union Secretary-Treasurer William D. Seward to join the conversation, and asked Patterson to repeat what he had said. Patterson did so. Seward's testimony corroborates Roberts. Patterson did not testify.

Roberts had a conversation the next day, 31 October, with Production Director Stafford. Roberts was on the job in the pressroom about 8:30 a.m. He testified that Stafford came up to him and said that he had been warned the day before not to go into the mailroom but, nonetheless, he had had lunch there. The production director stated that he was concerned about the possibility of Roberts getting ink on something. Roberts replied that Stafford had never been concerned about this problem before. Stafford remarked that Roberts could go to the cafeteria or the mailroom lunch area if he changed clothes. Roberts objected that he would have to change clothes twice, and that this had never previously been required. Stafford said that he might have to discipline Roberts, at which point the union president got Union Chairman Jerry Holsclaw to join the conversation, which resumed in the pressroom breakroom.

At Robert's request, Stafford repeated what he had said, and Holsclaw stated that the Company was setting up Roberts for another discharge. According to Roberts, he told Stafford that the latter was simply trying to stop Roberts from talking to other employees about the Union. Roberts asked whether the new policy applied to everybody or just to him. According to Roberts, the production director replied that it applied only to Roberts, because he was the only one going "down there." Various statements about lawsuits and threats of lawsuits followed.

Holsclaw corroborated Roberts, regarding his own comment that the Company was about to discharge Roberts, Stafford's threat of discipline, and his statement that the policy applied only to Roberts.

Stafford testified that he talked with Roberts about keeping out of the mailroom breakroom or the cafeteria wearing a dirty uniform. He denied that he was concerned with Roberts' conversations with other employees about the Union.

Subsequent to the conversation, Stafford caused a letter to be delivered to Roberts summarizing Stafford's version of it.[9] On direct examination, Stafford was asked the following question and answered as indicated:

> Q. Now was this something that you were addressing just to Mr. Roberts or to all pressroom employees or—why don't you explain what you were trying to do with this letter.
> A. Well, this particular letter was to Mr. Roberts. I mean there's no doubt about it. It had his name on it and he's the one that did it and it was addressed to him.

Later in his testimony Stafford denied that he told Roberts during the conversation that the restriction was intended to apply only to him.

2. Factual analysis

Mailroom Superintendent Lister's testimony about "pressroom employees" coming into his department on a "regular basis," and Pressroom Superintendent Clark's testimony about Lister's complaints concerning Clark's "people," show that Lister at least professed concern about more than one pressroom employee. I credit his testimony, not contradicted by Stafford, that he told the latter that Roberts was "one of them."

---

[9] The letter, dated 31 October 1986, reads as follows:

This letter is just a reminder regarding our conversation today and Pat Patterson, Supervisor, talk with you yesterday.

I chose to talk with you today because after Pat talked to you, before lunch yesterday you decided to have lunch in the mailroom.

I explained to you the purpose of press breakrooms and why we asked you to use it for lunch, and not the mailrooms.

Pressmen cannot help but get ink and grease on their uniforms during work and that is why we supply the uniforms. When you lunch in another area you leave ink and grease on the chairs and fellow employees get this on their street clothing.

I mentioned to you also, if you changed out of your uniform you were welcome to have lunch in the mailroom.

In my 2 years at the News & Record I have not seen other pressmen have lunch in the cafeteria or Mailroom breakroom. They may have, but I have not seen them or has it been brought to my attention.

You said I am singling you out, because of the grievance with the Labor Board. This is not the case. We do not want the pressmen to start using other breakrooms because of the reasons given.

Your threat of a law suit was not necessary over this matter.

I want to emphasize we are not restricting your movements if you choose to change your cloths [sic] you may have lunch in the Mailroom breakroom.

I hope you understand our position and the common courtesy to other employees. If you need further clarification, please contact me [Jt. Exh. 5].

Stafford stated that the letter was not "intended to be a warning," and was not placed in Roberts' personnel file.

I credit Robert's and Holsclaw's consistent testimony that Stafford threatened discipline of Roberts, and that Holsclaw said the Company was trying to set up Roberts for discharge. Further, I credit Roberts' and Holsclaw's averments that Stafford said the new policy applied only to Roberts because he was the only one going "down there." Because Holsclaw was a current employee of Respondent his testimony is unlikely to have been fabricated.[10] I do not credit Stafford's denial that he said this in the conversation because of the greater probative weight of Roberts' and Holsclaw's testimony. Further, I note the contradiction in Stafford's assertions about what he said during the conversation, contrasted with his testimony that the letter was addressed to Roberts, not "to all pressroom employees." Stafford's denial in the letter that he was "singling out" Roberts was simply an attempt to gloss over what he actually said.

On 10 November 1986, Roberts filed a grievance over the incident, and requested that the Company withdraw its action,[11] but Stafford refused to do so.

F. Roberts' Visit to the Mailroom in December and Stafford's Second Letter

Roberts testified that he went to the mailroom breakroom on 11 December to make a purchase from one of the vending machines, and paused on the way back. The evidence is conflicting on where he stopped.

Respondent submitted two photographs taken within the mailroom showing a door leading to the reelroom.[12] Roberts testified with the assistance of one of these photographs (R. Exh. 23). Immediately to the right of the door, approximately 3 feet from the wall abutting the door, is a vertical piece of machinery at least as tall as the door. Immediately to the right of this piece of machinery is another device resting on a bar, which in turn appears to be resting on a cylindrical turntable. The bar seems to be about 4 or 5 inches high, and extends almost back to the wall. Roberts testified that he paused "just a couple of feet" to the right of the door, and was watching some employees operate a machine. There was a skid of papers to the left of the door.

According to Roberts, Mailroom Superintendent Lister was looking at him "through the window in his glass on a higher level." Lister came down and said that Roberts was "bothering" people by watching them work and requested him to leave. Roberts denied that he was bothering anybody, and asked why Lister said nothing to other employees who came into the mailroom. Lister asserted that Roberts was the only one who came there, and Roberts denied it. Roberts then returned to the pressroom and spoke to two pressmen,[13] who told him that they had been in the mailroom themselves that morning, one of them twice.

Lister agrees that he had a conversation with Roberts, but his testimony is ambiguous on Roberts' location. Although Lister appears to say that Roberts was initially near the door, he contends that Roberts later was "standing away from the wall in the flow of traffic." Lister told Roberts that he was standing "in the middle of the floor" interfering with employees trying to get to work during a shift change. The superintendent agreed that he did not see Roberts talking with anybody. He also asserted that the mailroom employees, most of whom are female, do not like being watched and had complained about obscenities yelled through a "window" by pressroom employees.

Because Roberts testified with the assistance of Respondent's photograph, and because of uncertainty in Lister's testimony, I credit Roberts' testimony as to his location. On the basis of Respondent's Exhibit 23 and Roberts' credited testimony, there is no way in which Roberts could have been in the "flow of traffic." The next day Stafford gave Roberts another letter.[14]

G. Applicability of Stafford's First Two Letters

Roberts contended that Stafford's first two letters applied only to him despite the reference to "other pressmen" in the second letter. The matter was never brought up at employee meetings by Pressroom Superintendent Clark, and Roberts' fellow employees believed that Roberts was being singled out. "The same thing happened when I was fired before," Roberts testified. "It started with them barring me from going to other departments and the guys felt like they were doing the same thing again." Roberts denied that the other pressmen believed they were affected by the letters. As Roberts put it, if Stafford had wanted "a rule for everybody, he would have posted it."

I am sure you are completely aware of taking rest periods in the Pressroom breakroom. I will explain it again. Pressmen are to take their rest periods in the Pressroom breakroom or they can go to the cafeteria and return quickly. By following this procedure the Supervisor can locate press employees if they are needed suddenly.

> Patterson and myself have verbally spoken to you so you could hear it. This is my second letter to you so can see it. This disciplinary action could lead to you terminating yourself from the Greensboro News & Record.

while he was at work on 8 January. Stafford asked whether he had eaten lunch in the cafeteria that day, and Roberts replied affirmatively. Roberts added that he had done so for 10 years, and did not think that the warnings applied "to that." The production supervisor said he was concerned about Roberts getting ink on something, and added that he was going to have to discipline Roberts. The latter then got Union Secretary-Treasurer Seward to join the conversation.

Roberts asked Stafford whether he had any complaints about Roberts or any other pressman getting ink on anything. Stafford replied that he had no complaints but wanted to make sure that there was none. Roberts reminded Stafford that only a few months before, Stafford had been having lunch in the cafeteria with the composing room superintendent when Roberts came in to get something. Stafford invited Roberts "to sit down and have lunch with them," and made a "big joke" of it when Roberts refused. Roberts testified that Stafford professed not to remember the invitation. The production director said that he was going to post a notice stating that no pressroom employee could go into other departments or eat in the cafeteria. Roberts protested that this was a "change of conditions." Secretary-Treasurer Seward corroborated Roberts' testimony.

On the same day, 8 January, Stafford delivered a letter to Roberts that Stafford considered to be the first specific warning.[15] A few days later, Roberts filed a grievance on the matter.[16]

Stafford does not contradict Roberts, and omits any reference to the asserted invitation from Stafford to Roberts to "sit down" for lunch with him in the cafeteria. In one portion of the transcript, Stafford appears to say that he had had no conversations about lunchbreaks with Roberts prior to 8 January when he warned Roberts for violating prior instructions.[17]

I. Respondent's New Policy on 9 January 1987 Regarding Lunch and Breaks—Prior Policy

On 9 January 1987, the day after the last Roberts-Stafford conversation, Respondent posted a notice that all pressroom employees were to take lunch periods and breaks in the pressroom breakroom, with indicated exceptions.[18]

The General Counsel elicited a large body of evidence that pressroom employees and others with and without ink on them customarily ate in the cafeteria and took breaks in the mailroom breakroom. According to Roberts, prior to the 1982 notice,[19] pressroom employees ate and took breaks wherever they wished—in the mailroom, the advertising department, or the cafeteria. Other employees such as electricians, machinists, and maintenance men also wear uniforms, work on presses, and get as dirty as the pressmen. Supervisors occasionally get dirty when working as part of a crew.[20] These employees customarily took breaks in the mailroom breakroom or the cafeteria. Roberts identified two such employees.[21]

Union Chairman Jerry Holsclaw testified that two maintenance men were eating lunch in the cafeteria with dirty uniforms on the same day that they had been working in the pressroom. Holsclaw himself and other employees[22] customarily took breaks in the mailroom breakroom, and were seen by various supervisors.[23]

Union Secretary-Treasurer William D. Seward affirmed that he ate in the mailroom breakroom, and on one occasion met Production Director Stafford, who spoke with him briefly. Seward testified that "just about everybody at one time or another on the press crew's been in there," with the knowledge of various supervisors.[24]

Press apprentice Roy Marsh testified that there was no rule against eating in the cafeteria with the pressman's uniform on prior to 9 January 1987. He identified three supervisors[25] who saw him eating there, and three others[26] who observed him taking breaks in the mail-

> This is a written warning regarding your actions today. You had lunch in the cafeteria when specifically we asked you to use the Pressroom breakroom for this purpose.

[17] The transcript of Stafford's testimony on direct examination reads at one point as follows:

> Q. Do you recall having any conversations with Mr. Roberts or any other communications with Mr. Roberts between December 12, 1986 and prior to January 8, 1987 regarding lunches or breaks?
> A. Lunch, yes.
> Q. Prior to January 8, 1987?

> Q. So—but—so to answer my question, prior to January 8th you didn't have any—

[18] The notice, signed by Pressroom Superintendent Dennis Clark, reads:

> This memo is to remind all pressroom employees that all lunch periods and breaks are to be taken in the pressroom breakroom.
> When on a break you must be readily available in the event of press problems.
> The reason for this is that you may have ink or grease on your uniforms that could transfer to the chairs in the cafeteria and ruin somebody's clothes inadvertently.
> You are welcome to have lunch in other areas if you change into your street clothes.
> If you go to the cafeteria for food or drink items, please be careful not to track ink on the floors.

[23] Holsclaw identified Troy Parish, Jimmy Davis, and Hudson Owens (retired) as supervisors who knew he was eating in the mailroom breakroom or the cafeteria.

room breakroom, sometimes two or three times a day without protest. Marsh identified employees[27] who spent "large chunks of their breaks . . . four or five minutes, in the mailroom breakroom."[28]

Respondent did not elicit testimony from any of the persons asserted to be supervisors or introduce evidence contradicting their asserted supervisory status. I credit the testimony of the General Counsel's witnesses.

Finally, the 1982 company rule, taken down after the Union's protest, itself permitted pressmen to eat in the "canteen," i.e., the cafeteria.[29]

Production Director Stafford testified that he "counselled" an employee whom he found eating in the paper handlers' area. This employee, unlike Roberts, was not given a warning because Roberts had previously been "counselled."

J. Conclusions With Respect to the Alleged Discrimination

It is obvious that Stafford's statements and letters to Roberts on 31 October, and his letter on 12 December, constituted warnings despite Stafford's denial. Thus, on 31 October, Stafford told Roberts that he had been warned by a supervisor the prior day about visiting the mailroom, and that Stafford might have to discipline Roberts. Stafford's second letter, on 12 December, contains an explicit reference to the possibility of disciplinary action. Respondent concedes that the third letter was a warning.

Roberts resumed his union activities soon after his reinstatement, and Respondent had knowledge of those activities. In the prior proceeding, the Board concluded that Respondent's maintenance of an employee handbook stating that union membership was not necessary for its employees constituted evidence of antiunion animus.[30] The Company continues to maintain an employee handbook with a similar statement,[31] and I reach the same conclusion here.

Respondent's argument that Roberts was barred from visiting the mailroom and eating in the cafeteria because of ink on his uniform is pretextual because of the disparate treatment of other employees with ink who were not similarly restricted.

Respondent's knowledge of the activities of these other employees is clear. Production Director Stafford saw Seward in the mailroom breakroom and spoke with him—apparently without criticism. Stafford in fact invited Union President Roberts to have lunch with him in the cafeteria. The pleadings establish that Stafford and Don Lister, named by Union Official Seward as an observer of mailroom breaks by other pressroom employees, are supervisors within the meaning of the Act,[32] and I make the same conclusion with respect to the other employees named as supervisors by the General Counsel's witnesses. The knowledge of such individuals concerning the break activities of other employees is attributable to Respondent under established law.[33]

The fact that Respondent's new break policy on 9 January was intended as a mask for its discrimination against Roberts is evidenced by the inconsistent provisions in the new policy. In addition to its asserted concern about inky uniforms, Respondent said in the notice that pressroom employees had to be restricted to the pressroom breakroom because of the need to have them "readily available in the event of press problems."[34] But the same notice states that pressroom employees may eat in the cafeteria if they change into street clothes. What happens if a press breaks down while employees are eating in the cafeteria in their street clothes? How are they to be contacted? Are they expected to rush back to the pressroom and handle the problem in their street clothes? Take additional time to change back into their uniforms? The clothes-changing exception to the new rule was simply Respondent's attempt to make its new rule seem reasonable. The rationale is contradicted by Respondent's asserted need to have pressroom employees readily available to handle problems, and by the prior policy of allowing employees with inky uniforms to have free access to other locations in the plant.

Because of the pretextual nature of the reasons advanced by Respondent for its three warnings to Roberts, Respondent's animus, and Roberts' union activities and prior testimony before the Board, I conclude that the warnings issued because of those activities, and that Respondent thereby committed unfair labor practices within the meaning of Section 8(a)(1), (3), and (4) of the Act.[35]

K. The Alleged Unilateral Change in Break Policy

The consolidated complaint alleges that on or about 11 December 1986 Respondent unilaterally altered its break policy governing pressroom employees by restricting breaks to two specified areas and, on or about 8 January 1987, further altered its policy by restricting breaks to one specified area.[36] The only evidence with respect to the first allegation is that listed above in connection with the discriminatory warning issued to Roberts. This evidence shows that the new rule applied only to Roberts and, accordingly, could not have been a rule applying to the other pressmen. Indeed, the fact that it did not apply to them is the reason for the finding that they were disparately treated and, accordingly, that Roberts was discriminatorily treated. This complaint allegation is inconsistent with the allegation of discrimination in December, and I shall recommend that it be dismissed.

The second allegation is not precisely accurate. Respondent's notice on 9 January restricted pressroom employees to all breaks in the pressroom breakroom unless they changed to street clothes. This, however, was a unilateral change in break policy and, although not precisely alleged, was fully litigated. I shall consider the legal significance of this change hereinafter in connection with the other allegations of unilateral changes.

IV. THE ALLEGED VIOLATIONS OF SECTION 8(A)(5)

A. The Contractual Relationship Between the Parties

The Union has represented the Company's pressroom employees since 1966 and has entered into successive collective-bargaining agreements with the Company.[37] The record contains a copy of the agreement preceding the last agreement.[38] The parties engaged in bargaining for a new contract from January 1981 to 13 May 1983.[39] On that date they entered into a new agreement terminating on 31 December 1983.[40]

The parties stipulated that, in an attempt to reach a new agreement, they "bargained to impasse sometime prior to June 1985." The testimony of Union President Roberts and former Vice President for Administration Richard Hendricks establishes that the parties reached impasse over the Company's demand that the Company's president be the final arbitrator in all grievance proceedings. Although there is reference to other issues prior to impasse, none is specified.

B. History of the Overtime Board

As noted, the complaint alleges that Respondent violated the Act by unilateral assumption of control of the overtime board. The overtime board was a method of offering overtime to employees on a departmental seniority basis. Under the Union's operation, it was a bulletin board on which employees were given a "mark" each time they were offered overtime, whether they accepted it. As new overtime became available, the employee with the least number of "marks" was offered the additional work.

Except for a brief period in 1981, the overtime board was run by the Union. Union Chairman Jerry Holsclaw affirmed that the Union went through the "whole board," by seniority, in assigning overtime. Union Secretary-Treasurer Seward testified that the Union assessed a fine against an employee rejecting overtime. According to Seward, when the Union was operating without a contract in 1981, union counsel advised it that the assessments may have been unlawful. Accordingly, they were discontinued.

Despite the fines, union witnesses contended that overtime work was voluntary except for work at the end of a shift. The Company contended that a "reasonable" amount of overtime was mandatory, but imposed no penalties on employees who refused overtime. The expired contract was silent on this point.[41]

During the negotiations for a new contract in 1981, the operation of the overtime board was taken over by the Company for about a month. According to Union Secretary-Treasurer Seward, the Company posted "work rules" during the period in 1981 when no contract was in effect and, after discussion with union counsel, the Union suggested that the Company operate the board. Union President Roberts testified that the Union's offer was a negotiating tactic that it thought would impose a burden on the Company. According to Roberts and Seward, a short time later, the Company asked the Union to take it back because it was a "headache," the foreman did not have time to run it, and the employees complained about the way the Company was operating it. Production Director Stafford, who was not employed by Respondent in 1981, asserted that the Company "took it away" from the Union.

Former Vice President for Administration Hendricks agreed with the Union's chronology, but contended that it was the Union that asked for return of the Board, and that the Company agreed because, supposedly, the Union promised to run it fairly. However, Hendricks conceded that the Company's operation of the board caused "the foremen a lot of time . . . on the phone." I credit the accounts of Seward and Roberts as to the circumstances in which the board was briefly given to the Company by the Union in 1981 and then returned.

C. Discussions in 1986 and the Company's Assumption of Control of the Overtime Board

The Company had no complaints through 1985 about the Union's supply of employees willing to work overtime, according to former Vice President for Administration Hendricks. However, in 1986, the Company's business increased significantly, and staffing became a problem. A series of conversations about the overtime board took place in 1986 between the Company and the Union.

The first discussion took place on 22 April 1986. Production Director Stafford said that the men were not working enough overtime. Roberts replied that the Company needed to hire more employees because of all the work and the fact that the existing employees had to work double and sometimes triple shifts. Stafford said that the Company might have to take the overtime board away from the Union and discipline the union chairman. Roberts objected to both suggestions. Stafford's testimony does not disagree with this account and adds that he asked the Union for suggestions on how to fill the vacant positions.

Another discussion took place in July, and the parties asserted basically the same arguments. The Company said that the "overtime positions were not being filled." The Union suggested that the Company hire more employees and utilize "substitutes," i.e., qualified pressmen from outside the bargaining unit. Stafford testified that the Union's suggestions were "silly." However, he acknowledged that the Company had three pressroom vacancies in July 1986. According to Roberts, Stafford again said that the Company might have to take the overtime board away from the Union. He gave the Union a few more weeks to come up with new ideas.

An additional discussion took place on 15 August, and the parties asserted the same basic positions. Stafford announced that the Company was taking operation of the overtime board away from the Union, and Roberts objected. The Company posted a notice on 21 August announcing the new policy.[42]

On 5 September, the Union asked for return of the board, and the Company refused. According to Stafford, he told the union representatives that the Company's assumption of control of the board was a "past practice."

Under the Company's operation of the system, it changed from a bulletin board to a looseleaf notebook. Production Director Stafford conceded that the Company does not call all employees for overtime according to the seniority system and their "marks," but only those employees whom it knows, through experience, will be willing to work.[43]

Pressroom Superintendent Dennis Clark affirmed that under the Union's operation of the overtime board, the Company would be "short-handed" on the night shift because overtime positions had not been filled, and the Company did not find this out until late in the day. Production Director Stafford agreed, and asserted, that under the Company's operation of the overtime system it knows by 2 p.m. each day which positions will be filled. However, Stafford and Pressroom Superintendent Clark conceded that the Company never asked the Union to give the Company notice of overtime staffing problems at any particular time of the day, nor did Clark complain to the Union about personnel shortages that occurred on one particular day.[44]

Clark said that the problem of shortages of personnel on overtime had "decreased" since the Company took over, but that the Company still worked "short-handed" at times. Roberts testified that he informed Stafford on 5 September that the pressroom was still working "short a lot of men" on every shift.

D. The Alleged Unilateral Refusal to Allow Substitutes to Work

1. Contractual provisions regarding substitutes—past practice on area and traveling substitutes

The last two contracts barred overtime work by regular employees if competent substitutes were available at straight time rates.[45] However, according to Union President Roberts, this provision was not literally enforced. The Union made a distinction between area substitutes, those living nearby with full-time jobs elsewhere, and traveling substitutes, individuals from other locations looking for new full-time jobs. For what the Union considered to be equitable reasons, it gave preference to the traveling substitutes, and applied the contractual ban on overtime by regular employees only when traveling substitutes were available. Traveling substitutes were given regular work if possible. If only area substitutes were available, the ban did not apply, and regular employees were given overtime work in preference to straight time work by area substitutes. Roberts testified that this had been the practice for at least 10 years, that the Company did not question it, and that he did not recall any conversation about the practice with former Vice President for Administration Hendricks. The latter asserted that from 1979 to 1985, the Company did not "contend" that the overtime ban applied only to traveling substitutes. However, Hendricks did not contradict Roberts' testimony that the Company did not question the Union's application of this contractual provision. Accordingly, I credit Roberts that this was the Union's practice.

The Company contends that it was unaware of the distinction between area and traveling substitutes. However, in a September 1986 discussion with Roberts, Stafford did not assert surprise at Roberts' advocacy of the policy, but merely argued that it was "dead wrong." It is highly unlikely that the Company did not know the home addresses of the substitutes it employed, and thus that the Union's policy was to give preference to traveling substitutes. Accordingly, I do not accept the Company's position on this issue.

The Union's president stated that no substitutes had worked during the 2 years prior to the hearing, i.e., during the period in which, according to Hendricks, the Company had no overtime staffing problems. However, before that time, hiring of substitutes happened "a lot," according to Roberts.

2. Summary of the evidence on the alleged change

a. The Union's position

As indicated above, the Union suggested hiring of substitutes during its 1986 meetings with the Company as one solution of the overtime staffing problem. Roberts testified that during the 15 August meeting of the parties,

[42] The notice reads:

> Beginning Friday, August 22, 1986 the office, in an effort to fill the overtime positions available, will hire all personnel to work overtime. The following procedure will be used.
> Each shift the Supervisor will post a list with the number of overtime positions to be filled for the next day or nights run. This list will be posted by 12:00 noon on the dayside, and 12:00 midnight on the night side. Anyone desiring to claim an overtime shift must sign up by 12:00 midnight for a day shift or 12:00 noon for a night shift. If a person is off they may call the Supervisor if they want to be put on the list.
> At 12:00 the Supervisor will fill the overtime positions "Round Robin" from the list of personnel signed up.
> If there are more positions than personnel signed up to fill them the Supervisor will call anyone he feels may work to fill these positions.
> After 12:00 the Supervisor will notify those signed up for work if they are needed and at what time. If you haven't been contacted by 2:00 you may assume you were not needed, and you will not be charged for working or turning down a shift [Jt. Exh. 3].

[43] Stafford contended that the Union did the same thing, but could not identify the employee who assertedly told him this. I do not credit this aspect of Stafford's testimony. The General Counsel conceded that the failure of the Company to call all employees according to their seniority ranking and "marks" was not a separate complaint allegation.

he again suggested this solution, and told Stafford that he thought the Union could get substitutes to cover part of the overtime. Stafford replied that he was not interested, according to Roberts. The Union's president did not supply specific names because of this answer.

On 29 August, the Union filed a grievance protesting the asserted fact that since 22 August the Company "refused to allow the Union to give available work to substitutes in violation of established conditions of employment."[46]

Roberts testified that the Union repeated the suggestion during a meeting on 5 September. Stafford then agreed to hire only "area" substitutes, and to give them work prior to any overtime to regular employees. The Union objected to "another change after they'd already made a change."

On 18 November, Stafford sent Roberts a letter stating that the Company was willing to hire substitutes and was waiting to hear from the Union.[47] At a meeting on 10 December, Stafford originally told Roberts that substitutes could be hired as they had in the past, according to Roberts. However, Press Superintendent Clark objected, the Company "caucused," and Stafford then changed his mind and said that the Company would not hire substitutes.

b. The Company's position

Stafford testified that when the Union suggested substitutes during the July meeting between the parties, Stafford replied that he did not wish to hire them at that time, but would not "rule it out" in the future—he preferred to keep overtime within the unit. However, Stafford denied that he ever refused to hire a substitute specifically proposed by the Union.

With respect to the September meeting on the issue, as described above, Stafford told Roberts that the Union was "dead wrong" in wanting overtime for regular employees before straight time for area substitutes—this was contrary to the contractual language. Stafford repeated his preference for overtime within the unit rather than substitutes. However, Stafford asserted the Company would hire a substitute named by the Union "with the understanding that they know that the unit is going to lose their overtime."

Neither Stafford nor Pressroom Superintendent Dennis Clark discussed Roberts' testimony that on 10 December the Company first agreed to continue the former method of hiring substitutes and then, after a caucus, refused to hire them at all.

3. Factual analysis

The complaint alleges that Respondent unilaterally altered the method of operation of the overtime board by refusing to allow substitutes to work.[48]

It is clear that the Company had a history of hiring substitutes and that the contractual ban on overtime work by regular employees when substitutes were available for straight time work was, in practice, applied only to traveling substitutes. When only area substitutes were available, regular employees were first offered overtime work.

Roberts' testimony that the Company refused to hire substitutes in July is corroborated by Stafford, despite the latter's assertion that he would not rule it out in the future. In the middle of 1986, the Company asserted willingness to hire substitutes, but only on condition that area substitutes get work in preference to overtime for regular employees—contrary to past practice and the way in which the overtime board had been run. Further, crediting Roberts' uncontradicted testimony about the December meeting, the Company finally returned to its original position that it would not hire substitutes. Respondent's argument that it never refused to hire a specific substitute named by the Union is mere sophistry. When Roberts said that he had some substitutes available, Stafford replied that he was not interested. Roberts was not required to engage in the futile act of supplying a list of names in light of this answer.

There is no explanation for the Company's reluctance to hire substitutes in 1986 and Stafford's asserted desire to keep overtime "within the unit," in the face of the Company's increased business, the double and triple shifts regular employees were working, and the inability to fill many overtime positions. In any event, the credited evidence supports the complaint allegation.

E. The Alleged Unilateral Overtime Priority for Press Assistants

1. The contractual provisions

The last contract provided for "two classifications of pressroom employees: pressmen, including journeymen and apprentices, and press assistants."[49] The latter's "duties shall be, and limited to, all work performed in the reel room." This work consisted principally of the loading of reels with paper, to be fed up to the presses immediately above the reel room. When positions for apprentice pressmen became available in the pressroom, press assistants were to be given first choice for these positions based on seniority.[50]

Section 3.08(b) reads as follows:

> (b) Where all press assistants have declined to accept an apprentice pressman situation, and the employer has to hire from outside the bargaining unit, the new employee (apprentice pressman) will immediately assume priority over all press assistants for vacation choice, layoffs, or any other area where priority is a deciding factor, as it is understood that all pressmen, journeymen and apprentices, shall at all times have priority over all press assistants.[51]

In addition to limiting press assistants to the reel room, the contract contained language limiting their number, their ratio as compared to pressmen, and shift assignments, as follows:

[46] Jt. Exh. 8.
[47] Jt. Exh. 13.
[48] G.C. Exh. 1(aa), par. 15 (b).
[49] Jt. Exh. 1, sec. 3.01.
[51] Jt. Exh. 1.

> Section 3.04. Effective May 13, 1983, the Company may employ in the bargaining unit four press assistants for the night shift. The total number of press assistants the Company may employ during the life of this agreement shall be four. If the number of press assistants employed exceeds a ratio of one press assistant to each six journeymen and apprentices employed, then the Company shall reduce the number of press assistants to the allowable ratio by offering press assistants with the most seniority an apprenticeship in the pressroom.[52]

The contract also provided that in the event of a layoff or reduction in force, all press assistants were to be laid off before any journeyman or apprentice.[53] "With the exception of the provision in this article," press assistants were to be governed by the same rules, working conditions, and hours of labor as all other pressroom employees.[54]

Article X, entitled "Priority," asserts that "[i]n filling day situations, preference shall be given employees according to priority (seniority as a journeyman pressman with the Company) as to length of service on night shifts."[55] The overtime section of the contract defines overtime and recites the amount of compensation therefor, but does not state the employees entitled to overtime.[56]

Union President Roberts testified that he prepared the contract language concerning press assistants, that it represented the combined views of the Union and Company Representative Hendricks, and that the latter told him that the Company wanted press assistants to work only at night.

2. Summary of the testimonial evidence

Union Secretary-Treasurer Seward was acting president of the Union during the time when Roberts had been discharged, as described in the former proceeding. Seward testified that because of an increase in work, he made a verbal agreement with Vice President for Administration Hendricks that press assistants would be allowed to work overtime on day shifts, after the pressmen had been offered overtime. Roberts corroborated Seward. Press assistants worked only at night, but there was "so much work" that Seward made an oral agreement with Hendricks to allow press assistants to work overtime on day shifts, but only after the pressmen had declined.

The Company presented two responses to this evidence. First, Hendricks acknowledged that he had a discussion with Seward about press assistants. According to Hendricks, he insisted that press assistants share overtime "equally" with pressmen, and Seward objected. "After that," Hendricks testified, "I think they shared in the overtime equally." This was followed by a more affirmative answer from Hendricks in response to a leading question.

The Company's second response was a legal argument—the last contract allows press assistants to work overtime on the day shift even if a pressman desires the work. According to Hendricks and Stafford, the language of the contract restricting press assistants to night shifts in the reel room applies only to straight-time work. Shown the last contract, Stafford remarked that it "doesn't say they can't work overtime on days." Hendricks asserted that overtime work on day shifts was part of the "bargaining history."

Roberts testified that the Company had made changes in the overtime board by "hiring press assistants on the day shifts ahead of journeymen and apprentices," although Stafford acknowledged that the Company was hiring press assistants on the day shift to do press assistant work "even if a pressman wanted that position." Roberts filed a grievance asserting "blatant violation of established agreements" and demanding that pressmen be "made whole" for all shifts from which they had been "illegally denied."[57] Thereafter, in a meeting between the Union and the Company, Pressroom Superintendent Clark argued that the Union's method of giving overtime to press assistants was illegal because it was not hiring them even though they had "a lower number on the board." Roberts reminded the Company of the contractual provisions, and Stafford told Clark to continue operating the board in the same way.

3. Factual and legal analysis

The complaint alleges that the Company unilaterally altered the method of operation of the overtime board by giving press assistants priority.[58]

The Company argues that the Hendricks-Seward discussion of press assistants involved only the issue of whether they were to get equal treatment during overtime work on day shifts—not whether they were to do any work at all on day shifts. The implied premise in this argument is that press assistants were allowed to work overtime on day shifts prior to the Hendricks-Seward conversation. Hendricks claimed that such overtime had previously been allowed, and was part of the "bargaining history."

This position is not only contrary to the language of the last agreement stating that the Company could employ four press assistants "for the night shift," but is also contrary to similar language in the prior agree-

[52] Jt. Exh. 1, sec. 3.04. The prior contract also limited the number of press assistants, then known as reel tenders, to work on the "night shift" (R. Exh. 11, sec. 4.05).

[53] Id. at sec. 3.09.

[55] The entire article reads:

> In filling day situations, preference shall be given employees according to priority (seniority as a journeyman pressman with the Company) as to the length of service on night shifts. When situations are switched from day to night, the opposite procedure shall govern. Priority employees shall have choice of new shifts, new situations, off days and vacation dates. When a new situation arises, each priority employee shall have five (5) days to claim this situation after notification of eligible employees. However, with the exception of the above, length of service with the Company shall determine earned benefits such as vacations, retirement benefits, and any other benefits which are contingent upon length of service with the Company [Jt. Exh. 1, Art. X].

[56] Jt. Exh. 1, art. VI.

[57] Jt. Exh. 8.

[58] G.C. Exh. 1(aa), par. 15(c).

ment.[59] For this reason, the Company's position on "bargaining history" is not persuasive. Roberts' testimony that Hendricks stated he wanted press assistants for night-shift work only is uncontradicted. Because of the language of the agreements, and because Roberts and Seward appeared to be more truthful witnesses than Hendricks and Stafford, I credit the testimony of the former on this issue.

In addition, I credit Seward's testimony about his conversation with Hendricks concerning press assistants. Faced with a contract limiting press assistants to night work and an increased workload, the acting union president made a concession to the Company by relaxing the contractual restrictions. Hendricks did not explicitly deny this aspect of Seward's testimony; he merely asserted that they disputed whether pressmen should get overtime priority over press assistants. Accordingly, I find that Seward made an oral agreement with Hendricks allowing press assistants to work overtime on day shifts, but only after pressmen had declined it.

The Company contends that the contractual provisions cited above do not specifically give pressmen priority over press assistants for overtime work. An argument may be made that such priority is implied in some of the contractual language, but this is beside the point. The last two contracts clearly limited press assistants to night work, and this was changed only after the Hendricks-Seward oral agreement. If the contracts had permitted day-shift work by press assistants, no such agreement would have been necessary.

I also find that the Union ignored Hendricks' argument that press assistants should receive equal overtime assignments on day shifts, and that it gave them such assignments, subsequent to the Hendricks-Seward agreement, only after overtime had been declined by pressmen.

As noted, the complaint alleges that the Company unilaterally altered the operation of the overtime board so as to give press assistants "priority." On the basis of the company-union meeting subsequent to the union grievance, and the colloquy between Roberts and Clark, I conclude that the Company changed the Union's practice and gave press assistants overtime work on day shifts in the same manner as that utilized with respect to other employees, i.e., the employee with the least number of marks received the work. Whether this constituted giving the press assistants "priority" is a semantic question.

However, it is clear that by agreement of the parties, the contractual ban on daytime work by press assistants was relaxed so as to permit their overtime work on day shifts after pressmen had declined the overtime. After the Company took over the overtime board, this practice was unilaterally altered so as to give press assistants equal opportunity for overtime work on day shifts, and so as to deprive pressmen of the priority for such work to which they were entitled pursuant to the contract, the Seward-Hendricks agreement, and established practice resulting therefrom. The parties understood the issues, and the matter was fully litigated.

F. The Alleged Unilateral Change in Journeyman to Press Assistant Overtime Ratio

1. Summary of the evidence

The complaint alleges that Respondent unilaterally altered the overtime board by changing the journeyman to press assistant overtime ratio.[60] This allegation is unclear, because the only overtime issue pertaining to press assistants is that related above, and concerns the issue of priority rather than ratios. However, as noted above, the last contract prescribed a 1-to-6 ratio of press assistants to pressmen.[61]

In addition, the contract provided that, "[w]hen press assistants are employed on any shift, a journeyman pressman will be designated as a lead journeyman in the reel room, to instruct the press assistants.[62]

Roberts testified that, after the Company assumed control of the overtime board, it employed press assistants in the reel room without the presence of a journeyman. On 29 August, Roberts filed a grievance on the issue.[63] Although the grievance also asserts that the Company has hired press assistants "in the place of journeyman and apprentices," it does not precisely allege violation of the one-to-six ratio requirement of the contract,[64] and there is no testimony from the General Counsel's witnesses directly addressed to this issue.

Stafford testified that newly hired reel tenders for "the first sixty days [sic] [were] supposed to be one above the crew. In other words, they're not counted as the crew." This is an apparent reference to section 3.05 of the last contract, which provided that press assistants shall serve a 2-year training period "and for the first ninety days, for training purposes, shall be above the requested number of employees in the reel room during this training period." According to Stafford, at the time the Union grievance was filed, "the sixty [90 according to the contract] days wasn't up."

With respect to the required presence of one journeyman in the reel room, Stafford testified as follows:

> The one about the crew, we were still short. We were not getting the overtime and we said that we would bring that journeyman in the reel room upstairs if we needed to get that press started or run. We were doing what we needed to do to get that paper out.

2. Factual and legal analysis

Because of the ambiguity of the complaint allegation, the absence of any explicit evidence from the General Counsel on the 1-to-6 ratio issue, and Stafford's uncontradicted testimony that any press assistants were still within their training period and thus "above the requested number of employees in the reel room,"[65] I am unable to conclude that this issue was fully litigated.

[59] Hendricks erroneously testified that the last agreement was the only one dealing with press assistants.

[63] Jt. Exh. 8.
[64] Ibid.

Nonetheless, Roberts did testify that the Company employed press assistants in the reel room without the presence of a journeyman (contrary to the requirements of sec. 3.07 of the contract), and Stafford admitted that he brought "that journeyman in the reel room upstairs . . . to get that paper out." Accordingly, despite the inadequacies of the complaint, I conclude that this matter was fully litigated and that the Company unilaterally altered the ratio of press assistants to journeymen in that it removed the one journeyman required by the contract and established practice to be in the reel room in order to instruct press assistants.[66]

G. The Alleged Change in Overtime Reporting Requirements for Foremen

Foremen were given opportunity for overtime work, as were the other employees, and were treated the same way as the others under the Union's operation of the overtime board. The General Counsel's witnesses testified that on several occasions after the Company took over the overtime board, foremen were given overtime without being "marked up," i.e., without having a record of their overtime entered in the overtime book that the Company maintained. However, the witnesses agreed that the Company took corrective action when these matters were brought to its attention. The General Counsel has not adduced evidence that these matters were the result of deliberate company policy, and Stafford denied that he instructed foremen to work overtime without recording it. Accordingly, I shall recommend that this allegation be dismissed.

H. The Alleged Unilateral Change in Cleanup Policy

The work of the pressmen involved occasional spillages of ink, chemicals, and water on the pressroom floor. The witnesses generally agreed that the pressmen responsible for such spillages were required to clean them up, particularly if they constituted safety hazards. Thus, Union Chairman Jerry Holsclaw affirmed that the pressmen "always got it up" if a "lot of ink" was spilled, and Roberts, who had a dispute with Pressroom Superintendent Clark over a water spill, agreed that he would have cleaned it up without protest if it had constituted a safety hazard. Former Vice President for Administration Hendricks said that pressmen clean up the spills during working hours and maintenance employees thereafter. Production Director Stafford and Pressroom Superintendent Clark stated that spillages constituting a safety hazard should be cleaned up immediately.

In the spring of 1986, newly arrived Pressroom Superintendent Clark posted a cleanup notice requiring spoils and loose paper to be picked up, dirty rags to be disposed of, tools to be kept clean, chemicals to be marked, and spillages of ink, water, or chemicals to be wiped up immediately.[67]

In early January 1987, Clark ordered Union President Roberts to clean up a puddle of water underneath a press that was not operating. Roberts said that it was not his job and questioned that it constituted a safety hazard, but nonetheless cleaned up the puddle.

Union Chairman Holsclaw asserted that there had been a recent change in cleanup policy in that the pressmen were required to clean up "footprints and different spots of ink on the press." Press apprentice Roy J. Marsh added "paper" to the list, and said that building maintenance employees used to do this work.

The dispute between Roberts and Clark involved a factual issue—whether the water puddle constituted a safety hazard. The evidence establishes that hazardous spillages were previously required to be cleaned up by pressmen during their hours of work, and the Clark-Roberts incident is insufficient to indicate a change of policy.

However, the notice posted by new Pressroom Superintendent Clark in the spring of 1986, and the credible testimony of Holsclaw and Marsh establish that additional duties, not involving hazardous spillages, were assigned to the pressmen. These had previously been the function of maintenance employees. Accordingly, the evidence supports this complaint allegation.

I. The Alleged Unilateral Alteration in the Vacation Board and Policy

Roberts and Stafford agree that, according to past practice, three pressmen were allowed to be on vacation at one time. They also agree that, in January 1987, the Company unilaterally reduced this figure to two. Roberts and Stafford also agreed that the Company removed certain weeks from the vacation schedule—three of the busiest weeks according to Stafford and more according to Roberts.[68]

Stafford conceded that he made these changes without discussing the matter with the Union. It would have been futile to do so, according to Stafford.

J. The Alleged Refusal to Provide Information

Because of the shortage of employees for overtime work, Production Director Stafford directed Pressroom Superintendent Clark to prepare a study showing how many employees were available for overtime during certain periods in 1986 without having to work triple shifts. Utilizing shift records, Clark did so[69] and, according to his testimony, needed about 6 hours to complete the work.

At a meeting on 15 August, the Union asked for information on the number of employees available for overtime without having to work double shifts, and the Company replied that it did not have this information. Rob-

[65] Jt. Exh. 1, sec. 3.05.

[66] On the blurred issue of whether the Company was replacing pressmen with press assistants, as indicated hereinafter, I am recommending a broad order.

[67] G.C. Exh. 2.

[68] Roberts filed a grievance contending that the Company had given vacation priority to night-shift pressmen, thus violating the seniority of daytime pressmen (Jt. Exh. 12), whereas Stafford testified that one day-shift and one night-shift pressman were allowed to be on vacation simultaneously.

[69] Jt. Exh. 21.

erts testified that he did not understand how the triple-shift information was derived and, on 1 October, filed a grievance demanding the double-shift information.[70] The Company took the position that it was not required to do the calculations required to derive the double-shift information from the shift records. However, on 18 November, Stafford wrote Roberts a letter with the following offer: "We will supply to you, upon request, the material needed for you to determine double shifts in regard to overtime."[71]

Roberts conceded that the Company offered the underlying data, and that he may have replied that he wanted the Company to do the calculations. This, in effect, was the issue dividing the parties—the Union believed that the Company should do the double-shift calculations just as it had done for triple shifts.

I therefore find that the Company offered to provide the underlying data required to produce the information requested by the Union, but refused to do the required calculations.

K. The Parties' Negotiating Positions

The parties manifested different conceptions of their functions during these meetings. The Company contended that whenever it made a specific proposal, the Union insisted on going back to the (preimpasse) "bargaining table" on the specific issue. Roberts conceded that he may have made such statements as this, and may have demanded that the Company make proposals to the "negotiating committee." The reason, he contended, was Stafford's asserted habit of discussing issues individually with employees on the floor.

On 25 February 1987, Roberts wrote Stafford a letter on "the contract impasse our bargaining unit is now working under," and declared willingness to make a change in the Union's position.[72] However, the union membership was still unwilling to accept the Company's president as final arbitrator of grievances, according to Roberts. He therefore wrote Stafford on 13 March 1987 that he had been "a bit premature" in his prior letter.[73]

The Union's position was that the Company was "trying to piece meal (the Union) one item at a time, while refusing to bargain on the contract." According to Union President Roberts and Secretary-Treasurer Seward, at a meeting on 24 September, Stafford said that "the only thing the Company had to do if they wanted to change something was meet with (the Union) a few times and then go ahead and put it into effect." Stafford denied that he made this statement. I credit Roberts and Seward. Former Vice President for Administration Hendricks testified that the Company had bargained to impasse with all the unions representing its various employees, and had secured agreements from two of them to operate without a contract.

L. Conclusions with Respect to the 8(a)(5) Allegations

1. The issue of "past practice" concerning operation of the overtime board

The evidence shows that the Union traditionally operated the overtime board except for a brief period in 1981 when no contract was in effect and the parties were negotiating. At that time, operation of the board was voluntarily transferred from the Union to the Company and then transferred back again voluntarily.

The Company argues that its assumption of control of the Board in 1986 was not a unilateral change because it was consistent with past practice. In support of this argument, the Company cites Chef's Pantry, 274 NLRB 775 (1985), and apparently relies on the employer's notices therein prohibiting employees from leaving their jobs unless they had completed their work or had obtained supervisory permission. However, the Board's conclusion that this did not constitute a unilateral change was grounded on its finding that supervisors previously had discretion to require completion of a job, that employees had not generally worked more overtime since posting of the new rule and that, accordingly, the employer had not "applied a new policy as to overtime" (id., 274 NLRB at 776). Further, contrary to Respondent's position, the Board, in Chef's Pantry, held that the employer's grant of a 2-day holiday on one occasion during the 1979–1980 Christmas-New Year holiday season, without any announced change in its holiday practices, was insufficient evidence on which to base a finding that the employer's practice was to grant 2-day holidays. Accordingly, the employer's later withdrawal of the 2-day holiday and its return to prior practice did not constitute a change in an established condition of employment (ibid.).

Respondent also relies on Gulf Coast Automotive Warehouse Co., 256 NLRB 486 (1981), in which the employer's use of polygraph tests was found to be a past practice, although the practice had been applied on a "haphazard basis" (256 NLRB 486 at 489). Respondent also cites Fafnir Bearing Co., 151 NLRB 332 (1965), but here again, the allegedly unlawful action—the subcontracting of maintenance work—had been engaged in by the employer for "many years" (151 NLRB 332 at 340).

Unlike these cases, there is no history herein of prior company operation of the overtime board, except for the brief period during negotiations in 1981. There is no evidence that this short hiatus in what was otherwise union assignment of overtime was intended to be binding precedent.

The contract is silent on the issue. In Consolidated Aluminum Corp., 258 NLRB 281 (1981), the General Counsel contended that the employer's prior settlement of a grievance concerning payment of witness fees constituted past practice to which the employer refused to adhere on another occasion. Noting the ambiguity of the contract, the Board rejected this position and stated that "there is no evidence that the parties intended the settlement to be binding precedent. . . . Indeed, the record shows that [the employer] has never before or since settling [the employee's] grievance paid out witness pay to employees for attendance at administrative or regulatory proceedings" (258 NLRB 281 at 281–282).

For these reasons, and on this authority, I conclude that past practice herein was that the Union controlled the assignment of overtime through the overtime board, and that the Company's assumption of control of the board in 1986 was a change in this practice.

2. The impasse issue and conclusions concerning the overtime board

Respondent argues that it "bargained to impasse with the Union prior to assuming control of the overtime board"[74] and, accordingly, that its assumption of control of the board thereafter was not unlawful.

The Board's position on this issue is well established. As stated in Taft Broadcasting Co., 163 NLRB 475, 478 (1967), enfd. 395 F.2d 622 (D.C. Cir. 1968):

> An employer violates his duty to bargain if, when negotiations are sought or are in progress, he unilaterally institutes changes in existing terms and conditions of employment. On the other hand, after bargaining to an impasse, that is, after good-faith negotiations have exhausted the prospects of concluding an agreement, an employer does not violate the Act by making unilateral changes that are reasonably comprehended within his pre-impasse proposals.

The problem with Respondent's argument is that, as the parties stipulated, they had previously bargained to impasse prior to June 1985, and the only issue that separated them, as far as the evidence shows, was the identity of the final arbitrator of grievance proceedings. There is no evidence, e.g., that the Company repeatedly demanded, and that the Union refused, to give up control of the overtime board prior to impasse in 1985. Accordingly, control of the board was not "reasonably comprehended" within Respondent's "pre-impasse proposals" (ibid.). Respondent appears to take the position that once impasse has been reached on one issue, it is at liberty to continue to bargain to impasse, individually, on all remaining terms and conditions of employment. As long as it discusses the matter with the Union a few times, it is free thereafter to make unilateral changes. In fact, Stafford asserted this right during his discussions with the Union. Such a position is without precedent, and its implementation would continue the bargaining process ad infinitum.

In a recent case in which there was no evidence that the employer's unilateral changes were part of its pre-impasse negotiations with the union, the Board held that those changes violated Section 8(a)(5).[75] It is clear in this case that Respondent did not, after impasse, secure the Union's agreement that the Company take over the overtime board. Accordingly, I conclude in so doing Respondent thereby violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act.

3. The unilateral refusal to hire substitutes

The Company argues that the Union's distinction between area and traveling substitutes was a "hypothetical" issue, that there was no such distinction in the contract, and that practice about which one party is unaware is not binding on the other. However, as noted above, after some vacillation on the issue, the Company finally returned in December 1985 to the position that it would not hire any substitutes. The Company's only argument is that it never refused to hire any "specific" substitutes referred by the Union. As indicated above, the Union was not required to engage in the futile act of referring individuals that the Company had previously stated it would not hire. Accordingly, I conclude that, by unilaterally changing this previous employment policy, the Company violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1).

4. The unilateral changes in overtime for press assistants and the requirement that one pressman be in the reel room

As shown above, the Company unilaterally changed the provisions of a Company-Union agreement whereby the contractual prohibition against day-shift work by press assistants was relaxed so as to permit their overtime work on day shifts provided the pressmen were first offered such overtime. The Company's change consisted in permitting press assistants equal opportunity for such work.

Further, the Company unilaterally changed the contractual requirement and practice of requiring one pressman in the reel room at all times in order to train press assistants. I find that, by making such changes unilaterally, Respondent further violated Section 8(a)(5).

5. The remaining unilateral changes

As hereinafter explicated, the Company also unilaterally changed its break policy on or about 8 January 1987, altered its cleanup policy, and changed its vacation board and policy.[76] I conclude that these actions constituted similar violations of the Act.

6. The alleged refusal to supply information

As shown above, Pressroom Superintendent Clark compiled information showing the number of triple shifts that would have been necessary to fill all overtime positions in the spring of 1986. He used shift records for this purpose, and it took him about 6 hours to make the compilations. The Union wanted the same information with respect to double shifts. The Company offered the underlying shift records but refused to engage in the additional calculations necessary to derive the double-shift information.

The requested information appears to be relevant and necessary for intelligent bargaining, and the Company offered the underlying data from which the information could have been derived. The dispute, therefore, is over who should have borne the expense of the additional calculations.

In similar circumstances, the Board approved of a finding that the employer was not required to go through 30,000 Rolodex cards in light of "the substantial nature of the cost."[77] In a case where the employer offered underlying data to the unions but refused to expend its own funds to prepare the reports and information desired, the Board held that the employer was not required to duplicate or conform its records, at its own cost, for the convenience of the "Unions."[78] In another case the employer had previously furnished monthly information on the basis of which the union could have prepared the seniority list which it had requested from the employer, and the Board dismissed the allegation.[79] More recently, the Board reaffirmed that an employer is not required to furnish relevant information to the union in the exact form requested by the latter.[80]

I conclude that it would have taken approximately the same amount of time to calculate the double-shift information as it did the triple-shift information, i.e., approximately 6 hours, and that this would have involved an expense that was more than de minimus. On the basis of the authority cited above, I further conclude that Respondent was not obligated to do this work, and that it satisfied its obligation by offering to the Union the underlying shift records from which the Union could have made the calculations. Accordingly, I shall recommend that this allegation be dismissed.

In accordance with my findings above and on the entire record, I make the following

Conclusions of Law

1. Greensboro News & Record, Inc. is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

2. Greensboro Printing and Graphic Communications Union, Local No. 319, Graphic Communications International Union, AFL–CIO, CLC is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

3. Respondent, by delivering verbal and written warnings to employee James L. Roberts about 31 October 1986 and about 8 January 1987 and a written warning about 12 December 1986 so as to restrict Roberts' movements throughout the plant because of Roberts' union activities and prior testimony before and filing charges with the Board, thereby committed unfair labor practices within the meaning of Section 8(a)(1), (3), and (4) of the Act.

4. The following employees of Respondent constitute a unit appropriate for the purposes of collective bargaining within the meaning of Section 9(b) of the Act:

> All pressroom employees employed by Respondent at its Greensboro, North Carolina facility, including journeymen and apprentice pressmen and press assistants; excluding office clerical employees, guards and supervisors as defined in the Act.

5. Since about 1966 and at all material times, the Union has been the designated collective-bargaining representative of the employees in the above-described appropriate unit and has been recognized as such representative in prior collective-bargaining agreements with Respondent.

6. Following expiration of the last collective-bargaining agreement on 31 December 1983, the parties engaged in bargaining but reached impasse sometime prior to June 1985.

7. Following impasse, Respondent unilaterally and without the Union's agreement changed its past practice by making the following alterations in the terms and conditions of employment:

> (a) Assumed control of the overtime board, a system of assigning overtime that had previously been controlled by the Union.
> (b) Refused to hire substitute employees and demanded that area substitutes be given work prior to overtime by regular employees.
> (c) Gave press assistants equal opportunity for overtime work on day shifts, in lieu of giving priority for such work to pressroom employees.
> (d) Removed the one journeyman from the reel room previously required to be there for the training of press assistants.
> (e) Altered its cleanup policy so as to impose additional duties on pressroom employees.
> (f) Changed its vacation policy to the detriment of employees.
> (g) Altered its break policy so as to restrict pressroom employees to the pressroom breakroom unless they first changed to street clothes.

8. None of the changes in terms and conditions of employment described above was reasonably comprehended within Respondent's pre-impasse proposals to the Union.

9. By engaging in the unilateral actions described above, Respondent thereby committed unfair labor practices within the meaning of Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act.

10. The above-described unfair labor practices are unfair labor practices affecting commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

11. Respondent has not committed any unfair labor practice except as specified herein.

The Remedy

Having found that Respondent has engaged in certain unfair labor practices, I shall recommend that it be ordered to cease and desist therefrom and take certain affirmative actions designed to effectuate the policies of the Act.

Having found that Respondent discriminatorily issued warnings to employee James L. Roberts restricting his movements, I shall recommend that it be ordered to inform Roberts in writing that its letters to him dated 31 October 1986, 12 December 1986, and 8 January 1987 are null and void, that he is to disregard any statements to him by Production Director Merrell B. Stafford or any other supervisor regarding locations where he may take breaks, and that he is free to engage in union activities and other activities before the National Labor Relations Board. I shall further recommend that Respondent be required to remove from its records all references to its aforesaid actions and, in its writing to Roberts, inform him that it has done so and that it will not base any future personnel actions against him on such records or references.

Having also found that Respondent unilaterally changed certain terms and conditions of employment of its employees in violation of the Act, I shall recommend that it be required to rescind such changes and restore the status quo ante.[81] Thus, I shall recommend that Respondent be ordered to rescind its assumption of control of the overtime board and of overtime and to restore the control to the Union.

Further, I shall recommend that Respondent be required to hire substitutes when work for them is available in the same manner as that established by past practice, i.e., despite the contractual ban on overtime work for regular employees when substitutes are available, regular employees are to get such overtime when only area substitutes are available, but not when traveling substitutes are available.

I shall also recommend that Respondent be required to restore the prior right of pressroom employees (journeymen and apprentices) to overtime work on day shifts in preference to press assistants and to give the latter such work only when it has been refused by pressroom employees. This recommendation supplements the recommendation above that overtime in general be returned to the control of the Union.

In addition, I shall recommend that Respondent be required to maintain one journeyman in the reel room at all times, in accordance with the last contract and past practice.

It will also be recommended that Respondent be required to publish a rescission of its notice to employees entitled "Standard Operating Procedure,"[82] and to notify employees in writing that its cleanup policy will continue to be that which was in effect prior to publication of the notice.

I shall additionally recommend that Respondent be required to reinstate its prior vacation board and vacation policy, and to grant to employees such vacation rights as may have been denied to them by reason of Respondent's unilateral change in its vacation policies.

Finally, I shall further recommend that Respondent be required to rescind its unilaterally imposed change in breakroom policy for pressroom employees, to rescind its notice to such effect dated 9 January 1987[83] and to notify pressroom employees that their break privileges will remain as they were in the past, and that they need not change to street clothes prior to taking breaks in areas other than the pressroom breakroom.

This is the second time that Respondent has discriminated against union activist James L. Roberts. Further, its postimpasse unilateral changes and statements justifying same manifest a bargaining policy which, if successful, would defeat the purpose of the Act to encourage meaningful collective bargaining. Accordingly, I shall recommend that the cease-and-desist order be a broad one requiring Respondent to cease-and-desist from infringing in any other manner on the rights guaranteed employees by Section 7 of the Act.[84]

On these findings of fact and conclusions of law, and on the entire record,[85] I recommend the following[86]

ORDER

The Respondent, Greensboro News & Record, Inc., Greensboro, North Carolina, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall

International Association of Bridge, Structural and Ornamental Iron Workers, Local No. 433 and David Frye Companies, Inc. and Carpenters Local 42L, United Brotherhood of Carpenters and Joiners of America, AFL–CIO. Case 21–CD–559

July 29, 1988

DECISION AND DETERMINATION OF DISPUTE

BY CHAIRMAN STEPHENS AND MEMBERS JOHANSEN AND CRACRAFT

The charge in this Section 10(k) proceeding was filed April 1, 1988, by David Frye Companies, Inc. (David Frye Companies or the Employer), alleging that the Respondent, International Association of Bridge, Structural and Ornamental Iron Workers, Local No. 433 (Iron Workers Local 433) violated Section 8(b)(4)(D) of the National Labor Relations Act by engaging in proscribed activity with an object of forcing the Employer to assign certain work to employees it represents rather than to employees represented by Carpenters Local 42L, United Brotherhood of Carpenters and Joiners of America, AFL–CIO (Carpenters Local 42L). The hearing was held April 21, 1988, before Hearing Officer Martha Z. Villanueva.[1] The Employer and Carpenters Local 42L waived their right to file briefs.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board affirms the hearing officer's rulings, finding them free from prejudicial error. On the entire record, the Board makes the following findings.

I. JURISDICTION

The Employer, David Frye Companies, Inc., a California corporation, engages in commercial plastering and drywall installation in the building and construction industry, with its offices located in Bakersfield, California. During the past 12-month period, David Frye Companies, Inc. purchased and received goods valued in excess of $100,000 directly from suppliers located outside the State of California. The parties stipulate, and we find, that the Employer is engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act and that Iron Workers Local 433 and Carpenters Local 42L are labor organizations within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

[1] Although served with notice of the 10(k) hearing, Iron Workers Local 433 was not present at the hearing.

II. THE DISPUTE

A. Background and Facts of Dispute

David Frye, the president of the Employer, testified that the Employer is signatory to a contract with General Contractor H. Phelps at a jobsite located in Riverside, California, which began in January 1988. Pursuant to the contract, the Employer was to furnish and install exterior prefabricated Dryvit panels, fireproofing, interior light gauge metal framing, and drywall. By a letter dated February 24, 1988, the Employer assigned the installation of Dryvit panels, which includes the rigging, lining, leveling, welding, placing, and any other incidental work, to employees represented by Carpenters Local 42L.

Sometime in January or February 1988, Frye received a phone call from Dan Prentiss, the labor representative for Iron Workers Local 433, who told Frye that employees represented by Iron Workers Local 433 should be hired to set the panels and attach the angle clips; otherwise, there was "the possibility" the job would be picketed. Frye replied that he had no intention of hiring Iron Workers-represented employees as the Employer was already signatory to the Carpenters agreement, and the Employer had used Carpenters-represented employees in the past and was satisfied with their work.

A few days after this conversation, Frye met with H. Phelps' job superintendent who told Frye that Prentiss had informed him that if H. Phelps did not hire Iron Workers Local 433-represented employees at the Riverside jobsite, Iron Workers Local 433 would picket the job. According to Frye, H. Phelps was preparing for the expensive operation of pouring concrete at this time, and Phelps was concerned about a picket line shutting down the jobsite. For this reason, Frye agreed to allow Phelps to hire one employee represented by Iron Workers Local 433 to do welding alongside the employees represented by Carpenters Local 42L. The employee represented by Iron Workers Local 433 was hired in late February or early March 1988.

About March 28, 1988, Phelps laid off the employee represented by Iron Workers Local 433 for 2 days because there was not enough welding work available, and no welding work was being performed on one day due to windy weather. On March 30, 1988, this employee was recalled to work. On the same day, Prentiss appeared at the jobsite and complained that the employee represented by Iron Workers Local 433 was not performing 100 percent of all the welding on the clips and also that the employee had lost 2 days of work due to the layoff. Frye replied that he had only agreed to allow one Iron Workers-represented employee to work with the crew, but if more than one welder was needed, the Carpenters-represented employees that were certified heavy gauge welders would also perform the welding work in order to keep up with the schedule set forth by the general contractor.

On March 31, 1988, Iron Workers Local 433 set up a picket line at the Riverside jobsite and, as a result, no work was performed at the jobsite. Iron Workers Local 433 stopped the picketing when Frye, Phelps, and Carpenters Local 42L agreed to have a meeting that day. According to Frye, Prentiss stated at the meeting that if Iron Workers Local 433 came to the Riverside jobsite and observed that the Iron Workers-represented employees were not doing 100 percent of the welding, picketing would resume. The parties failed to reach an agreement at this meeting.

B. Work in Dispute

The disputed work involves the attachment, through welding, of steel angles to the steel subframes of buildings for use in the alignment and attachment of Dryvit panels on the exterior of buildings at a jobsite located at 9997 County Farm Road[2] in Riverside, California.

C. Contentions of the Parties

The Employer contends that the work in dispute should be awarded to employees represented by Carpenters Local 42L based on the fact that it has a collective-bargaining agreement with the Carpenters, employer preference, past practice, area and industry practice, relative skill, and economy and efficiency of operation.

Carpenters Local 42L contends that the work in dispute should be awarded to the Carpenters-represented employees based on the fact that it has a collective-bargaining agreement with the Employer, past practice, area and industry practice, relative skill, and economy and efficiency of operation.

D. Applicability of the Statute

Before the Board may proceed with a determination of the dispute pursuant to Section 10(k) of the Act, it must be satisfied that there is reasonable cause to believe that Section 8(b)(4)(D) has been violated and that the parties have not agreed on a method for the voluntary adjustment of the dispute.

As indicated above, sometime in January or February 1988, the labor representative for Iron Workers Local 433 told the Employer that there was "the possibility" that the Riverside job would be picketed if the Employer did not use Iron Workers-represented employees to perform the disputed work. On March 31, 1988, Iron Workers Local 433 set up a picket line at the Riverside jobsite. Furthermore, the Employer and Carpenters Local 42L stipulated at the hearing that they had been unable to agree on a method for the voluntary adjustment of the work in dispute.

We find reasonable cause to believe that a violation of Section 8(b)(4)(D) has occurred and that there exists no agreed method for voluntary adjustment of the dispute within the meaning of Section 10(k) of the Act. Accordingly, we find that the dispute is properly before the Board for determination.

E. Merits of the Dispute

Section 10(k) requires the Board to make an affirmative award of disputed work after considering various factors. NLRB v. Electrical Workers IBEW Local 1212 (Columbia Broadcasting), 364 U.S. 573 (1961). The Board has held that its determination in a jurisdictional dispute is an act of judgment based on common sense and experience, reached by balancing the factors involved in a particular case. Machinists Lodge 1743 (J. A. Jones Construction), 135 NLRB 1402 (1962).

The following factors are relevant in making the determination of this dispute.

1. Certification and collective-bargaining agreements

There was no evidence presented that either Union has been certified by the Board as the collective-bargaining representative of any of the employees involved. Accordingly, this factor is not helpful in determining the dispute.

Iron Workers Local 433 and David Frye Companies have no collective-bargaining agreement. David Frye Companies is signatory to a master labor agreement between United General Contractors, Inc. and United Brotherhood of Carpenters and Joiners of America. By virtue of the Employer's being signatory to this agreement, the Employer is also signatory to the Drywall/Lathing Master Agreement between California State Council of the United Brotherhood of Carpenters and Joiners of America, AFL–CIO and California Drywall Contractors Association when it performs lathing or drywall work. Both agreements cover the disputed work. Accordingly, we find that this factor favors an assignment of the work to employees represented by Carpenters Local 42L.

[2] The jobsite is referred to as 9997 County Farm Road in the hearing transcript and as 9998 County Farm Road in the February 24, 1988 letter from the Employer assigning the disputed work to employees represented by Carpenters Local 42L.

2. Company preference and past practice

David Frye, president of the Employer, testified that David Frye Companies prefers to assign the disputed work to employees represented by Carpenters Local 42L. David Frye Companies has hired employees represented by the Carpenters Union in the past to perform similar work at Shell Plaza, California Corporate Towers, and the San Joaquin Medical Office Building. The Employer has never previously used employees represented by Iron Workers Local 433 to perform such work. These factors favor an assignment of the work in dispute to employees represented by Carpenters Local 42L.

3. Area and industry practice

David Frye testified that other companies in the Southern California area, such as E. F. Brady Company, Pierce Enterprises, The Rutherford Company, George Raymond Company, and Design Cast West, have utilized employees represented by the Carpenters Union to perform work similar to the disputed work. Frye also testified that the practice in the industry is to use Carpenters-represented employees to perform such work. Accordingly, these factors favor an assignment of the work in dispute to employees represented by Carpenters Local 42L.

4. Relative skills

David Frye testified that the skill required of the employees to perform the disputed work entails welding, heavy gauge welding, experience in fine alignment within an eighth of an inch of segments of 10 feet, a basic concept of how the clip is attached and positioned, and reading blueprints and positioning angles in accordance with blueprints. According to Frye, the employees represented by Carpenters Local 42L possess such skills and have been trained to work within smaller tolerances than Iron Workers-represented employees. There is no record evidence indicating that employees represented by Iron Workers Local 433 possess skills comparable to those of Carpenters-represented employees. Accordingly, we find this factor favors an assignment of the disputed work to employees represented by Carpenters Local 42L.

5. Economy and efficiency of operation

Both David Frye and Uri David Laub, a business representative of Carpenters Local 42L, testified that Carpenters-represented employees are more versatile than Iron Workers-represented employees as the former are able to perform different tasks on the jobsite, whereas the latter are limited to welding. Based on the above, we find that the factor of economy and efficiency of operation favors an award to employees represented by Carpenters Local 42L.[3]

Conclusions

After considering all the relevant factors, we conclude that employees represented by Carpenters Local 42L are entitled to perform the work in dispute. We reach this conclusion relying on collective-bargaining agreements, employer preference and past practice, area and industry practice, relative skills, and economy and efficiency of operation. In making this determination, we are awarding the work to employees represented by Carpenters Local 42L, not to that Union or its members. The determination is limited to the controversy that gave rise to this proceeding.[4]

DETERMINATION OF DISPUTE

The National Labor Relations Board makes the following Determination of Dispute.

1. Employees of David Frye Companies, Inc., represented by Carpenters Local 42L, United Brotherhood of Carpenters and Joiners of America, AFL–CIO, are entitled to perform the work of the attachment, through welding, of steel angles to the steel subframes of buildings for use in the alignment and attachment of Dryvit panels on the exterior of buildings at the jobsite located at 9997 County Farm Road, Riverside, California.

2. International Association of Bridge, Structural and Ornamental Iron Workers, Local No. 433 is not entitled, by means proscribed by Section 8(b)(4)(D) of the Act, to force David Frye Companies, Inc. to assign the disputed work to employees represented by it.

3. Within 10 days of this date, Iron Workers Local 433 shall notify the Regional Director for Region 21 in writing whether it will refrain from forcing David Frye Companies, Inc., by means proscribed by Section 8(b)(4)(D), to assign the disputed work in a manner inconsistent with this determination.

SUPPLEMENTAL DECISION AND ORDER

MEMBERS JOHANSEN, BABSON, AND CRACRAFT

On June 30, 1987, Administrative Law Judge James F. Morton issued the attached supplemental decision. The Respondent filed exceptions and a supporting brief, the General Counsel filed exceptions and a supporting brief, and the Respondent filed a brief in response to the General Counsel's exceptions.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the supplemental decision and the record in light of the exceptions and briefs and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings,[1] and conclusions only to the extent consistent with this Supplemental Decision and Order.

Year/Qtr.	Amount
1981-2	$3838
1981-3	2929
1981-4	4459
1982-1	4459
1982-3	2219

The Respondent's employees, represented by Local 455, the Union, went on strike July 1, 1975. The Respondent subsequently violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act by refusing to bargain with the Union when it requested bargaining in July 1978.[2] In August 1978, the Union made an unconditional offer to return to work. In 1980, the Board found that the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(3) by failing to reinstate fully its striking employees.[3] Thereafter, the Regional Director issued the instant backpay specification.

The judge found that the Respondent must reimburse discriminatees Smith, Kurm, and Kuzma for their net earnings lost. We agree. The judge also found, inter alia, that no discriminatee for whom the General Counsel sought backpay pursuant to the make-whole order was entitled to reimbursement for fringe benefits lost as a result of participation in the strike. Additionally, he did not find that John Kuzma and Michael Griffin were entitled to reimbursement of medical expenses. For the reasons set forth below, we disagree with the judge.

1. It is well settled that the "finding of an unfair labor practice . . . is presumptive proof that some backpay is owed by the [Respondent]."[4] The burden is on the General Counsel to prove the gross amount of backpay due.[5] The burden then shifts to the Respondent to establish facts which negate or mitigate its liability.[6]

In analyzing the General Counsel's backpay claims for the discriminatees, the judge acknowledged that the collective-bargaining agreement effective just prior to the 1975 strike provided unit employees various fringe benefits. He also found that the Respondent did not provide these contractual benefits to employees after the strike began. The judge mistakenly stated that the Regional Director's amended backpay specification sought to make the discriminatees whole by requiring the Respondent to provide them the fringe benefits that the Union had established in an industrywide agreement, notwithstanding the Respondent's timely withdrawal from multiemployer bargaining in 1976. The judge then reasoned that requiring the Respondent to provide such benefits would compel the Respondent to grant concessions to the Union, which had not been achieved in negotiations, thereby violating Section 8(d) of the Act.

The amended backpay specification does not seek to impose on the Respondent any terms in the Union's collective-bargaining agreements with other employers; rather, the specification uses a formula based on continuing the terms of the parties' expired agreement. Although the Second Circuit held that the Respondent validly withdrew from the multiemployer group following the 1976 impasse in bargaining between the group and the

[1] In sec. E, part 3, of his supplemental decision, the judge inadvertently stated that John Kuzma's hourly wage rate would have increased to $10.70 by September 8, 1981, rather than September 8, 1978.

Also in sec. E, part 3, the judge set forth by calendar quarter the amounts of net earnings Kuzma lost as claimed in the amended backpay specification and for which he is entitled to reimbursement. The judge inadvertently excluded the following lost earnings for which Kuzma is entitled to reimbursement as claimed in the amended backpay specification:

In agreeing with the judge that Joseph Chopko is not entitled to backpay, we rely only on Chopko's testimony that he did not seek interim employment. Michael Griffin's backpay period therefore commences on July 1, 1979.

Union,[7] the Union, as the incumbent, was still entitled to a presumption of majority status among the Respondent's unit employees.[8] The Respondent was, therefore, obligated to bargain on request with the Union as an individual employer because the Respondent did not show a good faith doubt as to the Union's majority status.[9] As the Union retained majority status, the Respondent was obligated to bargain with the Union on its July 1978 request for bargaining.[10] The Respondent was likewise required to continue giving effect to its expired collective-bargaining agreement with the Union until bargaining to impasse.[11] Thus, the amended backpay specification, based on the expired agreement's terms, correctly calculated the gross amounts of backpay due. The Respondent, on the other hand, has not established any facts to negate or mitigate its liability.

Specifically, the judge denied all claims set forth in the amended backpay specification for vacation, holiday, and sick leave pay, as well as contributions to the Union's welfare, pension, and annuity funds. We will, therefore, order the Respondent to make the discriminatees whole by making the contributions to the Local 455 welfare fund,[12] pension fund, and annuity fund on their behalf in the respective amounts set forth in the amended backpay specification, and by paying Louis Douda the amounts set forth in the amended backpay specification for vacations, holidays, and sick leave.

2. The General Counsel has excepted to the judge's failure to include in the make-whole remedy reimbursement of John Kuzma and Michael Griffin for the purchase of substitute health insurance and out-of-pocket medical expenses incurred during the backpay period. The documented expenses total $1222 and $904.38 for Kuzma and Griffin, respectively. The judge, who, as stated above, dismissed all fringe benefit claims for all discriminatees, did not specifically address medical expenses.

It is customary to include reimbursement of substitute health insurance premiums and out-of-pocket medical expenses in make-whole remedies for fringe benefits lost.[13] Because the Respondent has established no facts that would negate or mitigate its liability, we will order the Respondent to reimburse Kuzma $1222 and Griffin $904.38 for their documented medical expenses during the backpay period.

ORDER

The National Labor Relations Board orders the Respondent, Achilles Construction Co., Inc., Brooklyn, New York, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, to make whole the employees named below by paying them the amounts of backpay set forth opposite their names, plus interest in the manner prescribed in New Horizons for the Retarded,[14] less tax withholdings required by Federal and state laws, and by paying to the welfare fund, pension fund, and annuity fund of Shopmen's Local Union No. 455, International Association of Bridge, Structural & Ornamental Iron Workers, AFL–CIO, the respective amounts on their behalf set forth opposite their names, plus interest in the manner prescribed in Merryweather Optical Co.[15]

[12] The Respondent asserts that a discriminatee is made whole when he is reimbursed for the cost of premiums incurred in obtaining substitute health insurance coverage and for his out-of-pocket medical expenses to the extent that those expenses would have been reimbursed through the Local 455 welfare fund. In order to be made whole, however, a discriminatee must be restored to the position he would have occupied had the discrimination not occurred. This includes not only reimbursement of the discriminatee's premiums and medical expenses, but also requires the Respondent to contribute to the welfare fund according to the expired contract's terms so that the discriminatee's future interests in the Fund will be ensured. "[T]he diversion of contributions from the union funds undercut[s] the ability of those funds to provide for future needs." Stone Boat Yard v. NLRB, 715 F.2d 441, 446 (9th Cir. 1983).

Hassett Maintenance Corp., 260 NLRB 1211 (1982), a cryptic decision on which the Respondent relies, focused on what it characterized as the double insurance costs that would result from requiring the employer (which had provided other coverage) in that case to make contributions to the welfare fund. Hassett did not address restoring the full range of an employee's interests in the welfare fund. The Hassett decision did not reconcile its limited remedial order with pre-Hassett precedent requiring employer contributions to union welfare funds on employees' behalf, see, e.g., Kraft Plumbing & Heating, 252 NLRB 891 (1980), affd. mem. 661 F.2d 940 (9th Cir. 1981), as does precedent decided after Hassett. See Stone Boat Yard, 264 NLRB 981 (1983), which the Ninth Circuit enforced. The court rejected the double-coverage/punitive claim: the "employer cannot complain of the extra cost of improperly created, substitute fringe benefits . . . . The company is merely required to repay what it has unlawfully withheld." Stone Boat Yard v. NLRB, 715 F.2d 441, 446 (9th Cir. 1983).

SUPPLEMENTAL DECISION

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

JAMES F. MORTON, Administrative Law Judge. This is a proceeding to determine how much, if any, backpay is owed by Achilles Construction Co. Inc. (Respondent) to six employees. Respondent had been ordered to make them whole for earnings they lost as a result of its having discriminated against them in violation of Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the National Labor Relations Act (the Act). Respondent unlawfully failed to reinstate five of these six employees when they sought to return to work after they had gone out on strike. The sixth employee had been reinstated; the issue, as to him, is whether he was fully reinstated.

The hearing in this case was held in New York City in connection with five related cases. It opened on 12 September 1984 and closed on 7 October 1986.

On the entire record including my observation of the demeanor of the witnesses, and after due consideration of the briefs filed by the General Counsel and by Respondent, I make the following

FINDINGS OF FACT

A. Background

As reported in the decision by the Board that underlies this compliance hearing, i.e., Kuno Steel Products Corp., 252 NLRB 904 (1980), and as related in the decision issued in an earlier case, Independent Assn. of Steel Fabricators, 231 NLRB 264 (1977), Respondent had, before mid-1975, been part of an employer association that bargained with Shopmen's Local Union No. 455, International Association of Bridge, Structural & Ornamental Iron Workers, AFL–CIO (Local 455) as the representative of a production and maintenance employees unit employed by the employer-members of that association. A collective-bargaining agreement between that association and Local 455 expired on 30 June 1975. Local 455 struck the next day. Respondent, in early 1976, effected a timely withdrawal from the associationwide bargaining. At that time Local 455 was contending that Respondent was still part of the multiemployer bargaining group. Respondent, since the strike started, put into effect a number of changes in employee benefits. Indeed, as noted recently, Respondent operated for the next 7 years as if it were a nonunionized company. See JD–(NY)–9–85. Respondent had discontinued contributions to the various benefit plans provided for in the Local 455 contract; it reduced the number of paid holidays, set up its own medical insurance plan, and made other changes. It was not until late 1978 or early 1979 that Local 455 requested Respondent to bargain with it as the representative of the unit limited to Respondent's production and maintenance employees. The Board in Kuno, supra, ordered Respondent to bargain with Local 455 for those employees.

In the amended answer filed by Respondent, it avers that Respondent and Local 455 have not reached agreement on a contract.

The Board, after finding in Kuno, supra, that Respondent has unlawfully refused, since 9 August 1978, to reinstate five strikers, further noted

> Our order of course, does not require [Respondent] to create new jobs for the discriminatees or pay them backpay for periods when employment was not available at [Respondent's] plant. [Respondent] will be permitted to introduce evidence in the compliance stage of this proceeding concerning the existence of jobs for unreinstated strikers at all times material therein.

The Board, in Kuno, also held that several of the employers there, including Respondent, had violated Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act by not having fully reinstated employees who had been on strike but who had returned to work on their own, prior to Local 455's application therefor of 9 August 1978. Louis Dauda is the only one of Respondent's employees affected by that holding. The following excerpt, from footnote 5 of the Kuno decision, is relevant to the backpay claim that the General Counsel has asserted on behalf of Dauda:

> The General Counsel presented evidence establishing a prima facie case which [Respondent has] not adequately rebutted, that [one] striker individually returned to work prior to August 9, and [was] not fully reinstated to conditions current at the time the strike began. . . . We agree. . . . that determination whether the total wages and benefits package [he has] received since returning to work in substantially equivalent to the wages and benefits [he] received prior to the strikers—and thus satisfies the full reinstatement requirement—should be considered in the compliance stage of this proceeding. Under the circumstances of this case, we hold that [Respondent's] backpay liability to [Dauda] should run only from 6 months prior to the filing of the charges herein [N.B.—As the charge was filed 2 January 1979, the backpay period began 1 July 1978].

B. The Wage Claims

The amended specification also seeks backpay for five strikers whom Respondent refused to reinstate on 9 August 1978. Respondent's amended answer places in issue whether there was work available for all of them, whether two had retired, whether another was too ill to work, whether the rates of pay sought by the General Counsel for them are appropriate and whether these five were entitled to fringe benefits claimed. These contentions shall be considered insofar as they relate to the respective claims. The striker with the most seniority would have been the first one recalled. His claim is now discussed.

1. Grover Smith

Smith had worked for Respondent for 31 years as a mechanic when he went on strike on 1 July 1975. His backpay period, according to the Board's decision in Kuno began on 9 August 1978 and ended on 31 December 1978 when he would have retired, according to the amended backpay specification.

Respondent asserts that the language of footnote 5 in Kuno spells out the appropriate gross backpay formula to be used. That language clearly applies to strikers, such as Louis Dauda, who returned to work before 9 August 1978 and not to the unreinstated strikers, including Smith.

Respondent contends that Smith had retired from active employment prior to the start of his backpay period and urges that he is thus entitled to no backpay. In support thereof, it placed in evidence a questionaire he signed that was filled out by his wife. Therein is a notation that he had "retired December 31, 1978" and a "No" box is checked alongside a question asking if he was unemployed and looking for work during the backpay period. A "Yes" box was checked alongside another question asking if there was any period after 1 July 1978 when he was unavailable for work.

Smith testified that he had looked for work in the industry but was unsuccessful. He did obtain other work. During the third quarter of 1978 (i.e., in the backpay period) he had interim earnings that offset in part the gross backpay claimed for that quarter. In the Kuno decision supra, the administrative law judge noted that, based on the record made before him in September 1979, two of the unreinstated strikers whom he named had retired on pension. Smith was not one of them.

I find that Smith was available for work in 1978, i.e., during his backpay period. The questionnaire he signed is conclusional and insufficient to offset the simple fact that he was working in the latter part of 1978 and had interim earnings then. If Respondent had any genuine doubts about his work availability then, it could have resolved them simply by having offered him reinstatement, instead of by violating the Act as it did.

Smith had been earning $6.70 an hour when he and the other discriminatees were out on strike on 1 July 1975. As noted above, one of the discriminatees, Louis Dauda, returned to work before the strike ended. Dauda received wage increases totaling $1.50 in the interval between his return and the start of the backpay period. The General Counsel postulates that Smith would have received similar increases and alleges that as of 9 August 1978 Smith's wage rate would have been $8.20 had he been recalled. Respondent's payroll records, based on the testimony before me, demonstrate that it had a turnover of employees such that Dauda, during the backpay period, was the only one that could reasonably be said to be an employee similarly situated to the unreinstated strikers. I find that, absent the discrimination, Smith would have been receiving $8.20 an hour as of the start of the backpay period. I further find that as Dauda received a further hourly wage increase of $1 on 8 September 1978, Smith's hourly rate would have been increased then to $9.20.

Respondent's answer places in issue whether there was any work for Smith in the backpay period. The testimony offered by the General Counsel in explication of the amended specification establishes that Respondent had, on its payroll in the backpay period, a number of irregular employees in addition to Louis Dauda and that the hours of these employees were sufficient to have permitted Smith to work a 40-hour week, as set out in the General Counsel's formula.

I find that he would have worked the hours set out in the specification at the rates noted above, and conclude that his backpay for the last two quarters of 1978, after deducting interim earnings, is as follows:

1978, 3d quarter—$3811
1978, 4th quarter—$4784

2. John Kurn

Kurn is the next most senior unreinstated striker, in terms of service with Respondent. He was earning $8.90 an hour in 1975 and based on wage increases given to Louis Dauda, as discussed above, I find that Kurn's hourly wage rates as of 1 January 1979 would have been $11.40, and that he would have received a 50-cent-an-hour increase on 6 August 1981 when Dauda received the same increase.

The General Counsel alleges that, on the retirement of Grover Smith on 31 December 1978, as related above, Kurn would have replaced him as the next senior employee. His backpay period ended on 15 August 1982 on Respondent's offer of reinstatement.

Respondent, in its answer, asserts that work would have been available for Kurn during the backpay period on a limited basis, e.g., for 105 hours in the third quarter of 1979. It based this contention on a further assertion that Kurn would have replaced a specifically named employee for the quarter. In support of both these assertions, it offered the testimony of the individual who maintained Respondent's books. Her testimony did not controvert the testimony of the General Counsel's witness, discussed above with respect to Smith's claim. The evidence offered by the General Counsel, and the formula the General Counsel proposes give weight to the experience and seniority of the unreinstated strikers and make for a more rational basis to evaluate their backpay claims. Any confusion or uncertainty that exists is not to redound to Respondent's benefit. I find, based on the evidence before me, that Kurn would have, during the backpay period, worked the hours on which the net backpay claim for him has been predicated in the amended specification. I find applicable thereto are the hourly wage rates noted earlier. Accordingly, and as set out in the amended specification, Kurn lost net earnings of $4301 plus interest.

3. John Kuzma

Kuzma is the next most senior of the unreinstated strikers. Based on the wage formula discussed above, I find that his $8.20 an hour wage rate as of 1975 would have been increased by $1.50 to $9.70 by the start of the backpay period, to $10.70 by 8 September 1981, and to $11.20 by 6 August 1981. His backpay period ended on 15 August 1982 when Respondent offered to reinstate him.

Respondent would limit the hours of available work for him to those worked by a specific replacement employed in each of several quarters of the backpay period. I rejected this approach in the section above relating to Kurn's claim for backpay. I accept, instead, the testimony offered by the General Counsel that because of high employee turnover, it is appropriate to consider the total available hours of work and allocate these according to seniority and on the premise that the unreinstated strikers would have been assigned to work on a steady basis, as Louis Dauda had been. Thus, Kuzma should be compensated based on the available hours as allowed for him in the amended specification, multiplied by the appropriate wage rate, for each quarter.

Respondent would disallow Kuzma's claim in material part because he had been injured during the course of his interim employment and, as a result, unavailable then for work. The Board had rejected this argument. See Big Three Industrial Gas & Equipment Co., 263 NLRB 1189, 1200 (1982), and the discussion there of the governing principles. I therefore reject this contention of Respondent.

Based on the foregoing, I find that Kuzma is entitled to the net backpay claimed for him in the amended specification.

Year/Qtr.	Amount
1979–3	$1028
1979–4	1028
1980–1	1740
1980–2	1740

4. Joseph Chopko

Chopko earned $8.20 an hour when the strike began. The General Counsel contends that he would have been recalled along with John Kuzma on 1 July 1979, inasmuch as Respondent's payroll records disclose that its work force increased to the equivalent of two positions. Respondent asserts that Chopko had retired and was unavailable for employment.

Based on the original hearing in Kuno, in February 1979 the administrative law judge observed that Chopko had retired on pension. He was born in 1905 and was 74 when the backpay period began. He had no interim earnings during this backpay period. Indeed, he acknowledged at the hearing that he had not looked for work of any kind.

Based on the foregoing, I find that Chopko had retired from active employment as of about January 1979 before any backpay could be claimed for him and therefore, no backpay is due him.

5. Michael Griffin

The General Counsel, in an asterisked footnote to her motion to amend, dated 28 January 1985, states that no backpay, based on lost wages sought for Griffin as his interim earning equaled or exceeded the gross backpay due him under the General Counsel's formula.

6. Louis Dauda

The sixth discriminatee named in the specification, Louis Dauda, had abandoned Local 455's strike long before Local 455 applied for reinstatement of the five employees whose claims were just discussed. The amended backpay specification makes no wage claim for Dauda as the General Counsel concedes that he, at all times, had been fully compensated insofar as his wage rates and hours worked are concerned. A claim for fringe benefits, however, has been asserted for him, as well as for the other five discriminatees. That matter is next discussed.

C. The Claims Based on Fringe Benefits

In the amended backpay specification, the General Counsel seeks, on behalf of the six discriminatees, payment by Respondent of contributions to a pension fund a welfare fund and an annuity fund for the period 1 July 1978 to 1 July 1983. Respondent had, under the collective-bargaining agreement it had with Local 455, prior to 1 July 1975, contributed to those funds. The General Counsel contends further that other contractual fringe benefits (vacation, holidays, sick leave, overtime pay, and so on) also must be compensated for. The rationale offered in support of this contention appears to be that Respondent would thereby remedy the discrimination found by the Board in Kuno Steel, supra. There, the Board noted that as various reinstated discriminatees employed by several companies (including Louis Dauda, employed by Respondent) were not reinstated to the benefits enjoyed prior to the start of the strike, a prima facie showing of discrimination had been made out and as it was not thereafter rebutted by any evidence proferred by any of those companies, Respondent, inter alia, violated Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act.

Respondent contends that the Board, in Kuno, specifically directed the use of the backpay formula contained in Respondent's answer, i.e., that a comparison he made of the total package of wages and benefits paid by Respondent on an after 1 July 1978, with the package as it existed three years before—with no allowance for any wage or other increments in the years between 1975 and 1978. Respondent asserts that such a comparison shows that no backpay is due.

I find no merit in the General Counsel's claim for the following reasons. In view of the bargaining history recounted earlier, it is readily apparent that, were Respondent ordered to furnish the discriminatees in effect, with contractual benefits on and after 1 July 1978, it would for all practical purposes be thereby compelled to grant these individuals the benefits of an industrywide agreement, notwithstanding that, as found by the U.S. court of appeals, it had timely withdrawn from multiemployer bargaining in 1976. It is not appropriate to use a backpay specification as a vehicle to compel concessions that Local 455 has been unable to secure from Respondent in the course of collective bargaining. Section 8(d) of the Act forbids the compelling of concessions. It would be equally erroneous to provide Dauda and the other discriminatees with a Local 455 fringe benefit package, pursuant to a backpay award, while ignoring Respondent's other employees. Such disparate treatment would itself be invidious and certainly should not be required under an award that is aimed at remedying discriminatory conduct.

I therefore find that the fringe benefits claimed for the discrimatees in the amended backpay specification should be denied.

DECISION AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN STEPHENS AND MEMBERS BABSON AND CRACRAFT

On December 16, 1987, Administrative Law Judge George Christensen issued the attached decision. The Respondent and the General Counsel filed exceptions and supporting briefs.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the decision and the record in light of the exceptions and briefs and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings, and conclusions and to adopt the recommended Order as modified.[1]

The judge found, and we agree, that the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act when it refused to remit to the Trust Fund in January 1987 a report with payments for shifts worked by employees from December 1 to December 22, 1986. We find no merit to the Respondent's contention that it was not obligated to make the payments because the parties reached a valid impasse in negotiations on December 23, 1986, before the payments became due in January 1987. Rather, on the record before us we find that the employees' entitlement to have payments made on their behalf by the Respondent to the Trust Fund accrued with the completion of each shift worked by an employee. Thus, the Respondent's liability for the payments in question here attached prior to the December 23, 1986 impasse date, and not in January 1987, as claimed by the Respondent. That the Respondent was permitted to defer remittance of the payments to the month following the one in which the shifts were worked does not alter the fact that the obligation to make payment arose on completion of the shifts, events which took place prior to impasse.[2] For this reason, we agree with the judge that the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) by refusing to comply with the Trust Fund's January 29, 1987 request for payment.[3]

ORDER

The National Labor Relations Board adopts the recommended Order of the administrative law judge as modified below and orders that the Respondent, Shelter Island, Inc., San Diego, California, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall take the action set forth in the Order as modified.

1. Substitute the following for paragraph 1(b).

"(b) Refusing to pay to the Trust Fund the amounts owed for each such shift."

2. Substitute the attached notice for that of the administrative law judge.

[1] The General Counsel has excepted only to the portion of the judge's recommended Order which requires the Respondent, Shelter Island, Inc., to make the Charging Party whole by paying the Fund $2 for each shift worked by its employees from December 1 to December 22, 1986. The General Counsel contends that the trustees of the Fund had authority to and, in fact, did raise periodically the rate which the Respondent under the contract was required to contribute per shift and that, consequently, the recommended Order should be modified to provide for a general make-whole remedy, with the correct amount to be paid by the Respondent left to the compliance stage of this proceeding for determination. We find merit in the General Counsel's exception and shall, accordingly, modify the judge's recommended Order to provide for a general make-whole remedy. We leave to the compliance stage of these proceedings the determination of the correct rate and amount to be paid into the Fund by the Respondent.

[2] We find nothing in the record to support our dissenting colleague's conclusion that "the use of the previous month's shifts to calculate fund payments for the subsequent month was merely a convenient method of calculation used by the parties to determine the amount of contribution due . . . ." Sec. 19(b) of the parties' agreement states, in relevant part, that: "The Employer shall pay the sum of two dollars ($2.00) per day for each shift worked by each employee covered by the terms of the contract to the San Diego Bartenders and Culinary Workers Insurance Fund. The Employer shall forward to the Trustees (on forms approved by, and at a time and place designated by them) a report of the names and number of days of employment of all employees covered by this contract." Sec. 19(g) of the agreement further authorizes the Trustees to take legal and other action "in the event payments have not been received by the Trust by the twentieth of the month succeeding the month for which payments are due" (emphasis added). The above contractual language clearly indicates that the Respondent was liable for payments for shifts worked by employees as a matter of obligation, not calculation. There is nothing in the contract which provides that the previous month's shifts will be used to calculate payment for the subsequent month. That it has been the Fund's practice (within the discretion granted the Trustees in the agreement) to use the payment for the previous month's shifts to assure coverage for the month in which payment is received has no bearing on the Respondent's obligation to make payment for shifts worked prior to impasse.

[3] We find, for the reasons stated by the judge, that the Board's decision in O'Malley Lumber Co., 234 NLRB 1711 (1978), is distinguishable from the present case and, therefore, not controlling here. We further note that although in O'Malley, as here, the employer, inter alia, was alleged to have ceased unilaterally, making payments to a union trust fund, the issue in O'Malley centered on whether the parties reached a valid impasse in negotiations and, if so, whether the employer's unilateral changes were consistent with its preimpasse proposals. There is nothing in the O'Malley decision to suggest that any of the parties to the proceedings either raised or litigated the issue posed by the instant case of whether the payments which the employer failed to make had accrued prior to impasse. Finally, we note that in O'Malley the contract expired on May 31, 1976, and the respondent made no payments in July 1976 for work completed in June 1976. While the judge in O'Malley found that the parties initially reached impasse on the health and welfare issues on June 16, 1976, he did not pass on whether the impasse was broken by a strike which occurred that same day because the parties, in any event, were at an impasse on this issue on June 29, 1976. In view of his failure to pass on that issue, we cannot determine for certain if the impasse occurred before the employees had worked the full June hours which would have triggered the employer's obligation to make the July payment. On these facts, we do not find O'Malley to be controlling or inconsistent with our decision here.

MEMBER CRACRAFT, dissenting.

Contrary to my colleagues, I would not find that the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) by failing to make payments to the San Diego Bartenders and Culinary Workers Insurance Trust Fund for shifts worked by its employees between December 1 and December 22, 1986, and by failing to submit a report indicating which shifts were worked during this period.

The expired collective-bargaining agreement[1] provided, inter alia, that the "Employer shall pay the sum of two dollars ($2.00) per day for each shift worked by each employee covered by the terms of the contract to the San Diego Bartenders and Culinary Workers Insurance Fund." Each contribution paid for health coverage for the entire month in which payment was made. The amount of the premium was based on the number of shifts worked the previous month. Legal action for delinquencies could be instituted by the Trust in the event payments were not received by the 20th of the month following the month for which payments were due.

The parties reached impasse in negotiations on December 23, 1986. Prior to impasse the Respondent had forwarded a December payment to the Fund, thereby providing health coverage for the employees through December 1986. The December payment was calculated based on the number of shifts worked in November. In January 1987, the Respondent notified the Fund that it was withdrawing from the contract plan and would not make any further payments to the Fund because it was going to institute the health plan it had proposed during negotiations. Initially, the fund administrator notified the Respondent that because the Respondent was providing coverage beginning January 1, it was unlikely that further contributions would be required. However, in late January the Fund advised the Respondent that it was entitled to payments on behalf of unit employees for shifts worked through the date of impasse and requested a report reflecting the number of shifts worked between December 1 and December 22 and payment for those shifts.

This case is essentially a contract dispute. In NCR Corp., 271 NLRB 1212 (1984), the Board held that in cases involving contract interpretation where there is no evidence that the respondent acted out of animus toward the union or in bad faith, or that the respondent was seeking to undermine the union, the Board will not attempt to determine which of two equally plausible contract interpretations is correct. See also Thermo Electron Corp., 287 NLRB 820 (1987). Here, there is no evidence of union animus or that the Respondent was acting in bad faith.[2] The Respondent was not attempting to undermine the Union. Moreover, the parties present two plausible contract interpretations. Thus, the principles of Thermo Electron and NCR would normally apply and the complaint would be dismissed.

However, both Thermo Electron and NCR Corp. are grounded, in part, on a discretionary exercise of jurisdiction.[3] I believe it would effectuate the purposes of the Act to exercise that jurisdiction here.

There are no private dispute resolution mechanisms available to the parties herein. The Trust Fund is not a party to the collective-bargaining agreement and thus could not use the contract's grievance-arbitration procedure even if the requirements in Indiana & Michigan Electric Co.[4] were satisfied. Furthermore, there is no ERISA remedy for an employer's failure to make fund contributions after the expiration of the collective-bargaining agreement. Laborers Trust Fund v. Advanced Lightweight Concrete Co., 484 U.S. 539 (1988). Because there is no forum for resolution of the two plausible contract interpretations herein, in these limited circumstances it would effectuate the purposes of the Act to resolve the dispute.

I conclude, contrary to my colleagues, that the fact that the fund payments were calculated based on hours worked during the previous month and that legal action for delinquencies could be instituted by the 20th of the month following the month for which payment was due does not compel the conclusion that the benefits accrued with the completion of each shift. Rather, I believe that the use of the previous month's shifts to calculate fund payments for the subsequent month was merely a convenient method of calculation used by the parties to determine the amount of contribution due, and did not indicate that benefits had accrued.[5]

[1] The collective-bargaining agreement expired October 31, 1986.

[2] The Respondent provided health coverage for the employees under the terms of the expired contract up to and beyond the date of impasse.

[3] The cases relied on by the Board in NCR Corp. and Thermo Electron are based on an abstention doctrine. See, e.g., Vickers, Inc., 153 NLRB 561, 570 (1965) ("the Board ordinarily will not exercise its jurisdiction to resolve a dispute between the parties as to whether the employer's interpretation was correct."); Timken Roller Bearing Co. v. NLRB, 161 F.2d 949, 955 (6th Cir. 1947) ("the dispute . . . was a dispute as to the interpretation of the management clause, and the contract specifically provided that such disputes were to be settled within the grievance procedures."); Consolidated Aircraft Corp., 47 NLRB 694, 706 (1943), enfd. 141 F.2d 785 (9th Cir. 1944) (Board "deems it unwise" to exercise jurisdiction to attempt to police contract where the parties have not exhausted their remedies under the contract); National Dairy Products Corp., 126 NLRB 434, 439 (1960) ("the Board does not ordinarily exercise its jurisdiction to resolve conflicts regarding which party has correctly interpreted the contract.").

The Respondent provided health coverage under the expired collective-bargaining agreement beyond December 23, 1986, the date of impasse. No other benefits had accrued as of that date. Accordingly, I find that the Respondent did not violate Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act by failing to make fund payments in January 1987.

[5] I do not find O'Malley Lumber Co., 234 NLRB 1171 (1978), in which on similar facts no violation was found, to be particularly relevant to the instant case.

DECISION

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

GEORGE CHRISTENSEN, Administrative Law Judge. On July 30, 1987, I conducted a hearing at San Diego, California, to try issues raised by a complaint issued on April 10, 1987, based on a charge filed by San Diego Bartenders and Culinary Workers Insurance Trust Fund (Fund) on March 2, 1987.

The complaint alleged Shelter Island, Inc. (Respondent) violated Section 8(a)(1) and (5) of the National Labor Relations Act (Act) by refusing to make payments to the Fund for shifts worked between December 1 and 22, 1986, by its employees represented by Local 30, Hotel and Restaurant Employees Union, AFL–CIO (Union).

The Respondent conceded it refused to make the payments in question but denied it thereby violated the Act.

The issue is whether the Respondent violated the Act by refusing to make those payments.

The General Counsel and the Respondent appeared by counsel and were afforded full opportunity to adduce evidence, examine and cross-examine witnesses, argue, and file briefs. Both filed briefs.

Based on my review of the entire record, observation of the witnesses, perusal of the briefs and research, I enter the following

FINDINGS OF FACT

I. JURISDICTION AND LABOR ORGANIZATION

The complaint alleged, the answer admitted, and I find at all pertinent times the Respondent was an employer engaged in commerce and in a business affecting commerce and the Union was a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2 of the Act.

II. THE ALLEGED UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICE

A. Facts

The Respondent operates two restaurants in San Diego (The Bali Hai and Tom Ham's Lighthouse). Since at least 1975, the Respondent has recognized the Union as the exclusive collective-bargaining representative of:

> All kitchen and stockroom employees, lunch and dining room employees, bartenders and cocktail lounge employees, special occasion bartenders, housekeeping and service department employees, and cafeteria employees employed by the Employer; excluding all other employees, office clerical employees, professional employees, guards and supervisors as defined in the Act.[1]

[1] I find this unit is appropriate for collective-bargaining purposes within the meaning of Sec. 9 of the Act.

Through its duly designated representative for collective-bargaining purposes, the Restaurant-Hotel Employers Council of San Diego, Inc. (Council), the Respondent entered into collective-bargaining contracts with the Union setting forth the wages, rates of pay, hours, and working conditions of its employees within the unit. The latest contract was executed in 1980.

That contract, inter alia, contained the following provisions:

SECTION 19—HEALTH AND WELFARE PLAN:

(a) The San Diego Bartenders and Culinary Workers Insurance Fund Trust Indenture executed on the Seventh (7th) day of January, 1952, and any amendments as may be made from time to time thereto, are hereby incorporated by reference and made a part of this Agreement. The Employer, by signing this Agreement, agrees to be bound by all the terms and provisions of said Trust Indenture.

(b) The Employer shall pay the sum of two dollars ($2.00) per day for each shift worked by each employee covered by the terms of the contract to the San Diego Bartenders and Culinary Workers Insurance Fund. The Employer shall forward to the Trustees (on forms approved by, and at a time and place designated by them) a report of the names and number of days of employment of all employees covered by this contract. Said payments are to be made by the Employer directly to the Trustees of the San Diego Bartenders and Culinary Workers' Health and Welfare Trust Fund. The Employer signatory hereto hereby accepts the present Council appointed Trustees and their duly selected successors and alternates as his representatives on said Trust Fund.

(d) The Employer, upon demand of either the Trustees of the San Diego Bartenders and Culinary Workers Insurance Fund or of the Local Joint Board, shall submit such reasonable information, employment and payroll records as may be relevant and necessary for the ascertainment by the Trustees or the Union, of the amount of monies due and owing by the Employer of the Trust.

. . . .

(g) The Trustees of the Fund, in the event payments have not been received by the Trust by the twentieth of the month succeeding the month for which payments are due, may sue said Employer for one or more of the following: An accounting, injunction, recovery of the delinquent payments, reasonable costs of suit and any other relief that may be appropriate under the circumstances.

Reports of the number of shifts worked by each unit employee were normally prepared shortly after the end of each month and sent to the Fund, accompanied by the requisite payments. Those payments assured health coverage under the plan administered by the Fund for the month in which the payment was received, provided the Fund received payments from the Respondent and other employer participants in the health plan for more than 12 shifts worked by each covered employee during the preceding month.[2]

Prior to the October 31, 1986 expiration of the contract, the Respondent timely withdrew the Council's authority to represent it, so notified the Union, and terminated the contract.

During subsequent negotiations between the Respondent and the Union over terms for a successor contract, the Employer proposed to substitute a health plan of its choice for the contract plan and the Union proposed to continue the contract plan unchanged.[3]

The parties reached an impasse in their negotiations on December 23, 1986.

Between the date the contract expired and the impasse date, the Respondent sent an early November and early December 1986 report to the Fund accompanied by the requisite payments, assuring eligible employees health coverage under the contract plan for November and December 1986.

In early January 1987, the Fund received a letter from the Respondent dated December 31, 1986, stating it was withdrawing from further participation in the contract plan, would not make any further payments to the Fund, and was going to institute the health plan it proposed during negotiations. In response to a telephone inquiry by a Fund representative in early January 1987, a representative of the Respondent confirmed the Respondent was not going to send any report to the Fund concerning the number of shifts unit employees worked during any part of December 1986 nor tender any payments to the Fund based thereon. In further conversations (there were two telephone conversations), the Fund representative, in response to inquiries, informed the Respondent's representative the contract plan would not provide January 1987 coverage for any unit employee on whose behalf it did not receive payments for 12 or more shifts worked during December 1986.

The Respondent placed its plan in effect in January 1987; for January and February 1987, it made special arrangements to cover its part-time or on-call employees, but ceased to cover them thereafter.

The parties stipulated unit employees covered by the contract plan in December 1986 worked a substantial number of shifts between December 1 and 22, 1986, and further stipulated all unit employees were covered in January 1987 either by the contract plan (by virtue of shifts worked for participating employers other than the Respondent) or by the Respondent's plan.

On January 29, 1987, following receipt of advice from counsel that the Fund was egally entitled to payments on behalf of unit employees for shifts worked through the date of impasse, the Fund wrote a letter so advising the Respondent and requesting transmission to the Fund of a report reflecting the number of shifts unit employees worked between December 1 and 22 and payment therefor.

[2] Though the Fund needed payments for at least 22 shifts to fund its payouts (I credit the Fund administrator's undisputed testimony to that effect).

[3] The Respondent's plan covered only its employees, limited coverage to full-time employees (excluding part-time or on-call employees), and contained a $100 deductible feature; the contract plan covered full-and part-time or on-call employees, was portable (i.e., it credited payments for work performed by all participating employers), and had no deductible feature.

At all times since, the Respondent has refused to tender the requested report and payments.

B. Analysis and Conclusions

The Board, with court approval, has consistently held an employer violates the Act by failing or refusing to make deferred payments based on work performed prior to a bargaining impasse, and on the premise the purposes of the Act are best served by requiring an employer to maintain its employees' wage components (including payments to provide health and pension coverage) provided under an expired collective-bargaining agreement, unchanged, while the parties negotiate over terms for a possible successor agreement.[4]

In this case the Respondent refused to pay to the Fund $2 for each shift worked by unit employees between December 1 and 22, 1986, the day the Respondent and the Union reached impasse in their negotiations over the terms for a successor to an expired contract requiring such payments. On these facts, the line of cases just recited support the conclusion the Respondent thereby violated the Act.

The Respondent contends O'Malley Lumber Co., 234 NLRB 1171 (1978), dictates a contrary conclusion. While that case holds the employer did not violate the Act by discontinuing payments to a health fund established under an expired collective-bargaining agreement with the union representing its employees following the expiration of the agreement, the case is readily distinguishable from this one; the major issue litigated in O'Malley was whether the parties to the expired agreement ever reached a bargaining impasse prior to the employer's implementation of the health plan it proposed during negotiations, with the General Counsel contending no such impasse was reached and the employer contending a bargaining impasse was reached 16 days after the agreement expiration. The employer's contention was sustained and on the basis: (1) prior to the expiration of the O'Malley-union agreement, the fund adopted the policy of not accepting payments for any hours worked after the expiration of a collective-bargaining agreement requiring them[5] (a policy known by the employer by virtue of the service of one of its representatives as a fund trustee); (2) the employer nevertheless placed payments in an escrow account covering the 15 days its union-represented employees worked between the date the agreement expired and the date of impasse; (3) no evidence was developed that the fund ever requested the employer to tender the escrowed funds or the employer refused to remit them; (4) the fund provided extended coverage to the affected employees for a minimum of 4 and a maximum of 7 months after the agreement expired; (5) the employer did not institute the health plan it proposed during negotiations until the expiration of each affected employee's health coverage by the fund; (6) it was held the General Counsel failed to establish employer conduct violative of the Act.

In this case the Fund followed the policy of accepting payments from employers for all shifts worked between the date of contract expiration and date of impasse, based on an opinion by legal counsel it was legally entitled to. The General Counsel proved the Fund requested payment for shifts worked by unit employees between those dates and the Respondent refused to comply with that request. The Respondent could have tendered the requisite payments and placed its plan in effect and assured unit employee coverage under the contract plan for January 1987 but, instead unilaterally announced it was refusing to do so and placed its plan in effect that month. The Respondent's plan materially differed from the contract plan in that it excluded part-time or on-call employees from coverage,[6] and contained a deductible feature (which may have forced some unit employees to pay the amount of the deductible under the Respondent's plan for any treatment in January 1987, that would not have occurred had they been covered for that month by the contract plan).

On the basis of the foregoing, I find and conclude by its refusal to comply with the Fund's request for a report reflecting the number of shifts unit employees worked between December 1 and 22, 1986, and by its refusal to remit to the Fund $2 for each such shift, the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) and (5) of the Act.

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. At all pertinent times the Respondent was an employer engaged in commerce and in a business affecting commerce and the Union was a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2 of the Act.

2. At all pertinent times the following unit of the Respondent's employees was appropriate for collective-bargaining purposes within the meaning of Section 9 of the Act:

> All kitchen and stockroom employees, lunch and dining room employees, bartenders and cocktail lounge employees, special occasion bartenders, housekeeping and service department employees, and cafeteria employees employed by the Employer; excluding all other employees, office clerical employees, professional employees, guards, and supervisors as defined in the Act.

[5] Based on an opinion by the fund counsel, the fund was not legally entitled to such payments.

[6] As noted above, however, the Respondent arranged for coverage of those employees under its plan for January 1987. This resulted in double coverage of unit employees who worked a sufficient number of shifts for employers participating in the contract plan other than the Respondent during December 1986, the result the Respondent now complains about. That result could have been avoided by the Respondent's compliance with the Fund's request and placing its plan in effect following expiration of coverage by the contract plan.

3. At all pertinent times the Union was the exclusive representative of the employees within the aforesaid unit for the purpose of bargaining collectively with the Respondent with respect to their wages, rates of pay, hours, and working conditions.

4. By refusing to comply with the Fund's request for a report reflecting the number of shifts its employees within the above unit worked between December 1 and 22, 1986, and for tender to the Fund of $2 for each such shift, the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) and (5) of the Act.

5. The above unfair labor practice affected commerce as defined in the Act.

THE REMEDY

The normal remedy in cases of this type is a direction the employer file with the entity designated in the expired contract the requisite report and payments, to make employees whole for losses they suffered by virtue of the nonpayment, and any interest, penalties, or other sums due affected employees and the entity.

Citing Hassett Maintenance Co., 260 NLRB 1211 (1982), the Respondent argues directing such a remedy in this case would "unjustly enrich" the Fund and constitute a "windfall," noting either the Fund or the Respondent or both provided health plan coverage to all unit employees for January 1987.

The argument ignores the fact the Respondent unilaterally and without union or Fund concurrence failed in early January 1987 to file a report reflecting the number of shifts unit employees worked between December 1 and 22, 1986, accompanied by the requisite payments, refused in late January 1987, following its reaching of delinquency status, to comply with the Fund's request for such report and payments, and unilaterally, without Fund or union concurrence, instituted its health plan for all unit employees[7] in January 1987, rather than dovetailing coverage by its plan as contract plan coverage expired.

It also ignores the fact that payments to the Fund represent a pool designed to cover a broad spectrum of employees, which is why the contract plan contains a portability feature and provides coverage even though a particular employee has worked 12 and not 22 shifts during the covered period. As the Ninth Circuit stated in Stone Boat Yard, supra:

> The company is merely required to repay what it has unlawfully withheld. As in [Antonino's Restaurant, supra] it was the company that unlawfully chose to incur the additional expense of a private insurance program. Even if Stone's substitute fringe benefit program met the present needs of its employees, the diversion of contributions from the union funds undercut the ability of those funds to provide for future needs. 715 F.2d 441, at 446.[8]

I shall therefore recommend the Respondent be ordered to file with the Fund a report reflecting the number of shifts each unit employee worked between December 1 and 22, 1986, to tender $2 to the Fund for each such shift, to make whole any unit employees who suffered any losses due to the Respondent's failure to timely tender to the Fund the payments just set forth, and to pay to those employees and to the Fund such interest, penalties, etc., as may appear warranted in the compliance phase of this proceeding.[9]

On these findings of fact and conclusions of law and on the entire record, I issue the following recommended[10]

DECISION AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN STEPHENS AND MEMBERS BABSON AND CRACRAFT

On December 16, 1987, Administrative Law Judge George Christensen issued the attached decision. The Respondent and the General Counsel filed exceptions and supporting briefs.[1]

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the decision and the record in light of the exceptions and briefs and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings,[2] and conclusions and to adopt the recommended Order as modified.

ORDER

The National Labor Relations Board adopts the recommended Order of the administrative law judge as modified below and orders that the Respondent, San Diego Princess, San Diego, California, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall take the action set forth in the Order as modified.

1. Substitute the following for paragraph 1(b).

"(b) Refusing to pay to the Trust Fund the amounts owed for each such shift."

2. Substitute the attached notice for that of the administrative law judge.

MEMBER CRACRAFT, dissenting.

For the reasons stated in my dissent in Shelter Island, Inc., 290 NLRB 246 (1988) I would find that the Respondent did not violate Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act by failing to make payments to the San Diego Bartenders and Culinary Workers Insurance Trust Fund for shifts worked by its employees between December 1 and December 18, 1986, and by failing to submit a report indicating which shifts were worked during this period.

APPENDIX

NOTICE TO EMPLOYEES
POSTED BY ORDER OF THE
NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS BOARD
An Agency of the United States Government

The National Labor Relations Board has found that we violated the National Labor Relations Act and has ordered us to post and abide by this notice.

WE WILL NOT continue to refuse to file with the San Diego Bartenders and Culinary Workers Insurance Trust Fund a report reflecting the number of shifts each of our employees in the following unit worked between December 1 and December 18, 1986:

> All kitchen and stockroom employees, lunch and dining room employees, bartenders and cocktail lounge employees, special occasion bartenders, housekeeping and service department employees and cafeteria employees employed by the Employer; excluding all other employees, office clerical employees, professional employees, guards, and supervisors as defined in the Act.

WE WILL NOT continue to refuse to pay to the Trust Fund the amount owed for each shift worked by each employee within that unit between December 1 and December 18, 1986.

WE WILL file the report and pay the amount or amounts described above.

WE WILL make whole any employees within the unit who suffered losses because of our nonpayment of the amount or amounts described above.

WE WILL pay to such employees and to the Trust Fund any interest, penalties, or other sums adjudged payable in the compliance phase of this proceeding before the Board.

SAN DIEGO PRINCESS

Theodore R. Scott, Esq., for the General Counsel.
Dennis Childs and John D. Collins, Esq. (Sheppard, Mullin, Richter & Hampton), of San Diego, California, for the Respondent.

DECISION

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

GEORGE CHRISTENSEN, Administrative Law Judge. On July 30, 1987, I conducted a hearing at San Diego, California, to try issues raised by a complaint issued on April 10, 1987, based on a charge filed by San Diego

[1] In Shelter Island, Inc., 290 NLRB 246 (1988), a companion case to this one, the General Counsel filed exceptions and a brief addressing Judge Christensen's proposed order in both cases concerning the rate at which the Respondent in each case should be required to make the Fund whole. As in Shelter Island, supra, we find merit to the General Counsel's exception and shall, accordingly, modify the judge's recommended Order to provide for a general make-whole remedy. We leave it to the compliance stage of this proceeding to determine the correct rate and amount owed to the Fund pursuant to this decision.

[2] For the reasons stated in Shelter Island, supra, we find no merit to the Respondent's contention that it was under no obligation to submit payments to the Fund for shifts worked by its employees from December 1 to 18, 1986, because an impasse in bargaining was reached on December 19, 1986, and payment for the preimpasse shifts worked by employees was not due, and coverage would not begin, until January 1987, after impasse had been reached.

Bartenders and Culinary Workers Insurance Trust Fund (the Fund) on March 2, 1987.

The complaint alleged that San Diego Princess (the Employer) violated Section 8(a)(1) and (5) of the National Labor Relations Act (the Act) by refusing to make payments to the Fund for shifts worked between December 1 and 18, 1986, by its employees represented by Local 30, Hotel & Restaurant Employees Union, AFL–CIO (the Union).

The Employer conceded it refused to make the payments in question but denied it thereby violated the Act.

The issue is whether the Employer violated the Act by refusing to make the payments in question.

The General Counsel and the Employer appeared by counsel and were afforded full opportunity to adduce evidence, examine and cross-examine witnesses, argue, and file briefs. Both filed briefs.

Based on my review of the entire record, observation of the witnesses, perusal of the briefs, and research, I enter the following

FINDINGS OF FACT

I. JURISDICTION AND LABOR ORGANIZATION

The complaint alleged, the answer admitted, and I find at all pertinent times the Employer was an employer engaged in commerce in a business affecting commerce and the Union was a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2 of the Act.

II. THE ALLEGED UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICE

A. Facts

The Employer operates a resort hotel in San Diego. At least since 1980, the Union has represented and has been recognized by the Employer as the exclusive collective-bargaining representative of a unit consisting of the following:

> All kitchen and stockroom employees, lunch and dining room employees, bartenders and cocktail lounge employees, special occasion bartenders, housekeeping and service department employees and cafeteria employees employed by the Employer; excluding all other employees, office clerical employees, professional employees, guards, and supervisors as defined in the Act.[1]

On October 26, 1980, by its designated collective-bargaining representative, Restaurant Hotel Employers Council of San Diego, Inc. (Council), the Employer entered into a collective-bargaining agreement with the Union in which the Employer recognized the Union as the exclusive collective-bargaining representative of the unit employees, and specified their wages, rates of pay, hours, and working conditions for a term commencing April 7, 1980.

The agreement, inter alia, contained the following provisions:

SECTION 19—HEALTH AND WELFARE PLAN:

(a) The San Diego Bartenders and Culinary Workers Insurance Fund Trust Indenture executed on the Seventh (7th) day of January, 1952, and any amendments as may be made from time to time thereto, are hereby incorporated by reference and made a part of this Agreement. The Employer, by signing this Agreement, agrees to be bound by all the terms and provisions of said Trust Indenture.

(b) The Employer shall pay the sum of two dollars ($2.00) per day for each shift worked by each employee covered by the terms of the contract to the San Diego Bartenders and Culinary Workers Insurance Fund. The Employer shall forward to the Trustees (on forms approved by, and at a time and place designated by them) a report of the names and number of days of employment of all employees covered by this contract. Said payments are to be made by the Employer directly to the Trustees of the San Diego Bartenders and Culinary Workers' Health & Welfare Trust Fund. The Employer signatory hereto hereby accepts the present Council appointed Trustees and their duly selected successors and alternates as his representatives on said Trust Fund.

(d) The Employer, upon demand of either the Trustees of the San Diego Bartenders and Culinary Workers Insurance Fund or of the Local Joint Board, shall submit such reasonable information, employment and payroll records as may be relevant and necessary for the ascertainment by the Trustees or the Union, of the amount of monies due and owing by the Employer of the Trust.

. . . .

(g) The Trustees of the Fund, in the event payments have not been received by the Trust by the twentieth of the month succeeding the month for which payments are due, may sue said Employer for one or more of the following: An accounting, injunction, recovery of the delinquent payments, reasonable costs of suit and any other relief that may be appropriate under the circumstances.

Payments and reports tendered to the Fund assured coverage under the agreement's plan for the month in which the tender was received, provided the employee completed 12 shifts for participating employers during the preceding month.[2]

After timely Employer withdrawal from council membership, and timely notice to the Union, the Employer terminated the agreement, effective October 31, 1986. Negotiations between the Employer and the Union over terms for a new or successor agreement reached an impasse on December 19, 1986. In the course of the negotiations, the Employer proposed the substitution of a health plan of its choosing for the agreement's health plan. The Employer's health plan limited coverage to [1] I find this unit is appropriate for collective-bargaining purposes within the meaning of Sec. 9(b) of the Act.

[2] Though it required payment for at least 22 shifts ($44) to fund the Fund's monthly payouts for monthly benefits and administrative costs.

"key employees" and excluded "on-call employees,"[3] it also required an employee work at least 25 hours each week during a month to qualify for coverage during that month. The Union resisted any change from the health plan provisions of the agreement.

Between the date the agreement was terminated (October 31, 1986) and the date the impasse occurred (December 19, 1986), the Employer continued to participate in the agreement's health plan, sending a report to the Fund in early November 1986 reporting the number of shifts worked by covered employees during October 1986, and tendering the requisite payment (assuring coverage for eligible employees during November 1986), and sending a similar report to the Fund in early December 1986 reporting the number of shifts worked by covered employees during November 1986, and tendering the requisite payment (assuring eligible employees coverage during December 1986).

Following the December 19, 1986 impasse, the Employer notified the Union and the Fund it was withdrawing from any further participation in the agreement's health plan, and that it was going to institute the health plan it proposed during negotiations. In a subsequent conversation between representatives of the Employer and the Fund, in response to Employer inquiries, a fund representative stated the Fund's rules and regulations prevented its acceptance of payments from the Employer for any shifts unit employees worked on and after December 19, 1986 (the impasse date), and the Fund "probably" would not demand payments from the Employer for shifts unit employees worked between December 1 and 18, 1986, in the event the Employer provided those employees coverage under its plan for January 1987.[4]

The Employer instituted the health plan it proposed during negotiations in January 1987. The plan provided benefits equal or superior to benefits provided under the agreement's plan and was more costly to the Employer than the plan but, as noted above, was more limited in coverage of unit employees because it excluded "on-call" employees.

The fund representative received an opinion from counsel that the Fund was entitled to payments from the Employer for all shifts unit employees worked between December 1 and 18, 1986. She addressed a letter to the Employer following nonreceipt by January 20, 1987 (the date any December 1986 report and payments became delinquent), of any report or payments for the December 1–18, 1986 period, stating counsel advised her such report and payments were due and payable, and requested their tender.

At all times thereafter, the Employer refused to tender the requested report and payments.

It was established (by stipulation) several unit employees worked a substantial number of shifts for the Employer between December 1 and 18, 1986: Carlos Bernal, 3; Maria Conriguez, 16; Jose Diaz, 14; Brad Fox, 14; Alberto Jimenez, 10; Gumereindo Jimenez, 14; Daniel Lopez, 14; and John Medina, 2.[5]

Conriguez, Diaz, Fox, A. Jimenez, G. Jimenez, and Lopez were classified as "key employees" under the employer health plan and worked a sufficient number of hours in January 1987 to qualify for coverage; Bernal and Medina were classified as "on-call" employees under the employer health plan and were not covered.[6]

B. Analysis and Conclusions

The Board, with court approval, has consistently held an employer violates the Act by failing or refusing to make deferred payments based on work performed prior to a bargaining impasse, on the premise the purposes of the Act are best served by requiring an employer to maintain its employees' wage components (including payments to provide health and pension coverage) provided under an expired collective-bargaining agreement, unchanged, while the parties negotiate over terms for a possible successor agreement.[7]

In this case, the Employer refused to pay to the Fund $2 for each shift worked by unit employees between December 1 and 18, 1986, the day before the Employer and the Union reached an impasse in their negotiations over the terms for a possible successor to an expired agreement requiring such payment. On these facts, the line of cases just recited support the conclusion the Employer thereby violated the Act.

The Employer contends O'Malley Lumber Co., 234 NLRB 1171 (1978), dictates a contrary conclusion. Although that case holds the employer did not violate the Act by discontinuing payments to a health fund established under an expired collective-bargaining agreement with the union representing its employees following the expiration of the agreement, the case is readily distinguishable from this one; the major issue litigated in O'Malley was whether the parties to the expired agreement ever reached a bargaining impasse prior to the employer's implementation of the health plan it proposed during negotiations, with the General Counsel contending no such impasse was reached, and the employer contending a bargaining impasse was reached 16 days after the agreement expiration. The employer's contention was sustained and on the basis: (1) prior to the expiration of [3] Employees classified as "on-call employees" under the employer plan were covered by the agreement's plan.

[4] The fund representative explained she so commented because she was unsure at the time whether the Fund was legally entitled to payments for shifts worked by unit employees between December 1 and 18, 1986, and was awaiting an opinion on the question from counsel.

[5] Although the underlying charge alleges there were approximately 297 employees in the unit, no evidence was offered to identify additional unit employees eligible for the fund coverage and the number of shifts they worked for the Employer during the December 1–18, 1986 period.

[6] By virtue of their work during the entire month for employer-parties to agreements requiring the fund payments other than the Employer, Bernal and Medina were covered by the agreement's health plan for the month of January 1987.

the O'Malley-union agreement, the fund adopted the policy of not accepting payments for any hours worked after the expiration of a collective-bargaining agreement requiring them[8] (a policy known by the employer by virtue of the service of one of its representatives as a fund trustee); (2) the employer nevertheless placed payments in an escrow account covering the 15 days its union-represented employees worked between the date the agreement expired and the date of impasse; (3) no evidence was developed that the fund ever requested the employer tender the escrowed funds or that the employer refused to remit them; (4) the fund provided extended coverage to the affected employees for a minimum of 4 and a maximum of 7 months after the agreement expired; (5) the employer did not institute the health plan it proposed during negotiations until the expiration of each affected employee's health coverage by the fund; (6) it was held that the General Counsel failed to establish employer conduct violative of the Act.

In this case, the Fund followed the policy of accepting payments from employers for all shifts worked between the date of agreement expiration and date of impasse, based on an opinion by its counsel it was legally entitled to such payments; the General Counsel proved the Fund requested payment for the shifts worked by the unit employees between those dates, and the Employer refused to comply with the request; the Employer failed to dovetail his plan to the agreement plan (implementation of employer plan coverage following the expiration of agreement plan coverage); the Employer plan differed in health plan coverage from the agreement's plan, and only by operation of the portability principle embodied in the agreement plan[9] did Bernal and Medina (and any other unit employees fortunate enough to be similarly situated) receive health coverage under the agreement plan for January 1987.[10]

Although the Employer did not argue the Fund waived (or was estopped from asserting) any right to receive the December 1–18, 1986 payments, by virtue of the fund representative's statement, the Fund probably would not seek those payments if the Employer placed its plan in effect in January 1987, it did cite that statement as one of its grounds for requesting dismissal of the complaint. A waiver (or estoppel) defense requires proof the waiving party knowingly, clearly, and unmistakably waived the right in question,[11] and that was not true here. Additionally, it is clear the fund representative had no authority to waive the right of the Union (and the affected employees on whose behalf the Union was bargaining) to the preservation of an economic status quo although the Union pursued continuation of their health benefits to impasse. I therefore reject any employer waiver or estoppel contention based on the fund representative's statement, and find and conclude by its refusal to comply with the Fund's request for a report of the number of shifts each unit employee worked between December 1 and 18, 1986, and by its refusal to pay $2 to the Fund for each of those shifts, the Employer violated Section 8(a)(1) and (5) of the Act.

[8] Based on an opinion by fund counsel, the Fund was not legally entitled to such payments.

[9] A provision crediting work for all and any participating employers—a valuable benefit within industries where it is common for employees to work for several employers within each month.

[10] It is further noted that although those payments qualified the two for health coverage by the Fund for January, the payments were insufficient to cover costs ($44 or 22 shifts worked).

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. At all pertinent times, the Employer was an employer engaged in commerce in a business affecting commerce, and the Union was a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2 of the Act.

2. At all pertinent times, the following was an appropriate unit for collective-bargaining purposes within the meaning of Section 9 of the Act:

> All kitchen and stockroom employees, lunch and dining room employees, bartenders and cocktail lounge employees, special occasion bartenders, housekeeping and service department employees and cafeteria employees employed by the Employer; excluding all other employees, office clerical employees, professional employees, guards, and supervisors as defined in the Act.

3. At all pertinent times the Union was the exclusive representative of the employees within the aforesaid unit for the purpose of bargaining collectively with the Employer with respect to their wages, rates of pay, hours and working conditions.

4. By refusing to comply with the Fund's request for a report showing the number of shifts the employees within the aforesaid unit worked between December 1 and 18, 1986, and for tender to the Fund of $2 for each such shift, the Employer violated Section 8(a)(1) and (5) of the Act.

5. The aforesaid unfair labor practices affected commerce as defined in the Act.

THE REMEDY

The normal remedy in cases of this type is a direction that the employer file with the entity designated by the expired agreement, the requisite report and payments, to make whole any losses its employees suffered by virtue of the nonpayment, and any interest, penalties, or other sums due affected employees and/or the entity.

Citing Hassett Maintenance Co., 260 NLRB 1211 (1982), the Employer argues directing such a remedy in this case would "unjustly enrich" the Fund, and constitute a "windfall," citing the fact it provided health coverage in January 1987 to those unit employees classified as "key employees" under its plan who worked in excess of 25 hours each week of that month, thus its payment to the Fund for shifts worked by those employees between December 1 and 18, 1986, would provide those employees double health coverage for January at double cost to the Employer.

That contention fails to address the fact unit employees classified as "on-call" employees under its plan would have no health coverage whatsoever for January 1987, failing their working a sufficient number of shifts in December 1986 for other employers and payment therefor, ignores the fact it required payment not for 12, but for 22 shifts to meet fund costs per employee, and ignores a basic purpose of the Fund is to provide portability, i.e., payments from each and every employer participating in the Fund for shifts worked by each and every covered employee, so the total receipts by the Fund are sufficient to meet the cost of providing health benefits to those qualified to receive them.

Due to these factors, the Fund neither would be "unjustly enriched" nor receive a "windfall" by receipt of payment for the shifts the Employer's unit employees worked between December 1 and 18, 1986. As the Ninth Circuit Court stated in Stone Boat Yard, supra:

> Even if Stone's substitute fringe benefit program met the present needs of its employees, the diversion of contributions from the union funds undercut the ability of the funds to provide for future needs. [715 F.2d 441, 446.][12]

I shall therefore recommend the Employer be ordered to file with the Fund a report reflecting the number of shifts each unit employee worked between December 1 and 18, 1986, to tender $2 to the Fund for each such shift, to make whole any unit employees who suffered any losses in health benefits due to the Employer's failure to timely tender to the Fund the payments just set forth, and to pay to those employees and to the Fund such interest, penalties, etc., as may appear warranted in the compliance phase of this proceeding.[13]

On these findings of fact and conclusions of law and on the entire record, I issue the following recommended[14]

DECISION AND ORDER

BY MEMBERS JOHANSEN, BABSON, AND CRACRAFT

On October 19, 1987, Administrative Law Judge J. Pargen Robertson issued the attached decision. The Respondent filed exceptions and a supporting brief.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the decision and the record in light of the exceptions and brief and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings,[2] findings, and conclusions and to adopt the recommended Order.

We agree with the judge's finding that the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) by interrogating its employees about union activity, threatening its employees with discharge for supporting the Union, informing its employees that benefits were lost in the past because of the Union, asking its employees to remove their names from the union petition, and informing its employees that wages would be frozen for up to a year if the Respondent negotiated with the Union.[3] However, we find it unnecessary to pass on whether these statements are also violative of Section 8(a)(5), as found by the judge.

ORDER

The National Labor Relations Board adopts the recommended Order of the administrative law judge and orders that the Respondent, Hillhaven Corporation, Memphis, Tennessee, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall take the action set forth in the Order, except that the attached notice is substituted for that of the administrative law judge.

[1] On November 1, 1987, the Teamsters International Union was readmitted to the AFL–CIO. Accordingly, the caption has been amended to reflect that change.

[2] The Respondent has excepted to some of the judge's credibility findings. The Board's established policy is not to overrule an administrative law judge's credibility resolutions unless the clear preponderance of all the relevant evidence convinces us that they are incorrect. Standard Dry Wall Products, 91 NLRB 544 (1950), enfd. 188 F.2d 362 (3d Cir. 1951). We have carefully examined the record and find no basis for reversing the findings.

[3] The following case law supports the judge's finding that each of the above-described activities violates Sec. 8(a)(1). See, e.g., Sunnyvale Medical Clinic, 277 NLRB 1217 (1985); Rossmore House, 269 NLRB 1176 (1984), enfd. sub nom. Hotel & Restaurant Employees Local 11 v. NLRB, 760 F.2d 1006 (9th Cir. 1985) (totality of circumstances may indicate interrogations are coercive, e.g., where the interrogations, as here, were directed at employees not shown to be known union adherents, and involved another employee's union activity or were accompanied by a threat). See Dutch Boy, Inc., 262 NLRB 4, 6–7 (1982), enfd. sub nom. Artra Group, Inc. v. NLRB, 730 F.2d 580 (10th Cir. 1984), and Russell Stover Candies, 221 NLRB 441, 443 (1975) (statements about adverse effects of unionization at other facilities found to amount to implied threats). See Kut Rate Kid & Shop Kwik, 246 NLRB 106, 119 (1979), and L'Eggs Products, 236 NLRB 354, 410–411 (1978), enfd. in pertinent part 619 F.2d 1337 (9th Cir. 1980) (violations found where employers' requests, as that made by Administrator Judy Ullery, to withdraw authorization for union representation exceeded mere information about procedure and amounted to appeals for the employees to undertake that action). See Alpha Cellulose Corp., 265 NLRB 177, 177–178 (1982), enfd. mem. 718 F.2d 1088 (4th Cir. 1983), and Gould, Inc., 260 NLRB 54, 59 (1982) (statements that negotiations would be protracted and wages frozen were found unlawful in context, as here, of regularly provided wage increases).

Member Cracraft agrees with the judge that under all the circumstances, the questioning of employees Annie Gray and Barbara McClure by Supervisor William Bunton was illegal interrogation in violation of Sec. 8(a)(1) of the Act. In so finding, however, she does not rely on Sunnyvale Medical Clinic, supra.

DECISION

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

J. PARGEN ROBERTSON, Administrative Law Judge. This case was heard in Memphis, Tennessee, on 11 March and 27 May 1987. The charge in Case 26-CA-1873 was filed on 31 October 1986. The complaint in that case issued on 16 December 1986. The charge in Case 26-CA-12045 was filed on 20 March 1987 and amended on 20 April 1987. Complaint issued in Case 26-CA-12045 on 21 April 1987. On 29 April 1987 an order issued consolidating the captioned cases and reopening the hearing.

The General Counsel alleges that Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) and (5) by refusing to recognize and bargain with the Charging Party (Union) since 26 August 1986, by refusing to consider and discuss grievances since 22 October 1986, and by various statements by supervisors on 11 and 13 March 1987.

The Respondent in its answer to the complaint, admitted all the commerce allegations, that it is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act, and that the Charging Party is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

I. THE WITHDRAWAL OF RECOGNITION

Through admissions and stipulations the General Counsel proved that Respondent has refused to recognize and bargain with the Union since August 1987. The Union was certified as the exclusive bargaining representative on 28 December 1982. A collective-bargaining agreement was in effect between the Union and the predecessor employer when Respondent purchased its Raleigh, Tennessee nursing home on 1 August 1986. That contract was to run from 15 July 1983 through 15 January 1987.

Respondent admitted that it is a successor employer to Care Inn Raleigh, and the record fully supports that admission.

The General Counsel also proved that the Union filed a grievance on behalf of employee Paula Gaither on 22 October 1986. By a 29 October 1986 letter Respondent advised the Union:

> As you were informed on August 26, 1986, Care Inn Raleigh had a good faith doubt that you continued to represent our employees in an appropriate bargaining unit. Therefore, we decline to accept or process this grievance.

Respondent, in its brief, defended the allegation on the grounds that it had a "reasonably grounded doubt, based upon objective considerations, for believing that its employees no longer desired to be represented by the Union." Respondent argues that its defense was proven by record evidence showing a "lack of union membership," a lack of contact with the union stewards from January through August 1986, and by expressions from employees during the period January through August 1986.

Regarding the lack of union membership, Judy Ullery, Respondent's and the predecessor Employer's administrator during 1986, testified that 14 or 15 employees were on union dues checkoff in 1986. From January to August 1986 no additional employees authorized checkoff deductions. Ullery testified that there were 140 to 150 employees in the bargaining unit.

Ullery also testified that she had no discussions with the union steward regarding grievances from January to August 1986. According to Ullery, she had only one such discussion before January 1986.

Regarding the expressions by employees, Ullery testified that in monthly staff meetings during the January through August 1986 period, employees "would ask how did I get rid of the Union." Ullery could not identify any of those employees.

Susan Morganeli, who was administrator in training in 1986, testified that questions were raised by employees concerning the Union during in-service training meetings. Morganeli recalled three employees by name. Employee Trudy Calhoun asked Morganeli what could be done to get rid of the Union, and employees Carol Pinner and Meg Hutchins stayed after the meeting "to reinforce the question as far as what could be done."

Housekeeping and Laundry Supervisor William Bunton testified that employee Tom Rivers asked him "how can we get rid of the Union." Employees Gregory Becton and Kenny Young asked Bunton how they could stop union dues from being deducted from their pay. Bunton testified that two or three other people asked him how to get rid of the Union, but Bunton could not recall the names of those employees. Bunton recalled that employees Inez Blance and Clarence Macklin were part of conversations involving getting rid of the Union.

Judy Ullery and Respondent's district director, Jimmy Crowe, testified about a meeting conducted at the nursing home by Respondent's regional vice president, Dick Ebersol, on 11 August 1986. Crowe recalled that over 100 employees attended the 11 August meeting. Ebersol explained to the employees that Respondent had purchased the nursing home. According to Crowe, an employee asked Ebersol, "Does this mean that we no longer have a union" and Ebersol replied, "to my knowledge, we don't." Ullery and Crowe testified that the employees applauded following Ebersol's response.

II. ANALYSIS OF EVIDENCE

A. Union Membership

Although Respondent argued that one of the objective factors they considered was a showing that union membership did not increase from January to August 1986, the evidence did not support that contention. What the testimony did illustrate was that no additional employees authorized Respondent to deduct union dues from their pay during the January to August period. Prior to January 1986 only 14 or 15 of the 140 to 150 employees in the unit had authorized Respondent to deduct union dues.

The collective-bargaining agreement contains the following language regarding deduction of union dues:

> The Company shall deduct monthly Union dues from the pay of all employees who are members of the Union and who hereafter voluntarily authorize such deductions in writing on a form approved by the Company and supplied by the Union to the Company. (Article I-C)

As shown above, the contract provides two conditions for dues deductions, (1) the employee must be a union member, and (2) the employee must authorize such deduction in writing. Because of that provision, it is apparent that union members that had not authorized such deductions in writing would not be included on Respondent's checkoff list. Therefore, showing of the number of employees that participated in deduction of dues may not accurately reflect the number of employees who were members of the Union.

The fact that no additional employees signed dues-checkoff authorizations from January through August 1986 is not illustrative of objective considerations. Dues checkoff does not discretely reflect union membership. In fact, testimony shows that before 1986 only 14 or 15 of the 140 to 150 employees in the unit were on dues checkoff.

Moreover, even if Respondent had successfully shown that all union members were on dues checkoff, the Board has consistently distinguished union membership from employee support of the Union:

> It has been clearly established that a distinction exists between union membership and union support, foreclosing relying upon one as evidence of the other. Here, union membership being voluntary in this right-to-work State emphasizes that distinction. Many employees while approving of the Union may not choose to give it financial support or participate as members. [Wald Transfer & Storage Co., 218 NLRB 592 (1975).]

B. Lack of Contact with the Union

Administrator Judy Ullery testified that she had no contact with a union steward regarding grievances during the January to August 1986 period. However, in rebuttal the General Counsel offered evidence that a grievance was filed with the Respondent's predecessor by the Union regarding the discharge of employee Artricia Smith on 3 April 1986. Union Business Representative Jesse Sykes testified without rebuttal that he resolved Artricia Smith's grievance through discussions with Administrator Judy Ullery. Those discussions occurred between 3 and 8 April 1986.

On 1 June 1986 an arbitrator issued his decision regarding the Union's grievance over the discharge of 11 of Respondent's predecessor's employees. By letter from Administrator Judy Ullery dated 10 June 1986, Respondent's predecessor notified the Union of its compliance with the arbitrator's decision.

On 14 July 1986, the attorney for Respondent's predecessor wrote the Union advising of their agreement with the Union to resolve a dispute regarding the discharge of one of the bargaining unit employees.

On 17 July 1986 Respondent's predecessor advised the Union of its pending sale to Respondent and offering to bargain regarding the effects of the sale.

On 26 August 1986 the predecessor employer mailed the Union its settlement proposal in Case 26–CA–11199.

The General Counsel argues that the above evidence, which was unrebutted, clearly establishes that the Union remained active during the period alleged by Respondent. In fact, that evidence shows that despite Administrator Judy Ullery's testimony regarding her lack of contact with the Union's agent, she had several contacts with the Union during the January to August time period.

In view of the entire record, I find that the Union was not inactive. Nor did Respondent have a reasonable basis to believe that the Union was inactive, or that the Union had abandoned its role as bargaining representative. See Cowles Publishing Co., 280 NLRB 903 (1986).

C. Employee Expressions

The General Counsel offered testimony from employees Belinda Young, Jessie Jackson, Clementine Posey, and Marjorie Fulton, and former employee Sharon Nash to rebut Respondent's argument that employees expressed a desire not to be represented by the Union.

Additionally, Judy Ullery testified that she could not identify any of the employees who allegedly stated they wanted to get rid of the Union in meetings before August 1986. Moreover, Supervisor William Bunton was unable to identify the two or three people, in addition to Tom Rivers, who allegedly asked him how to get rid of the Union.

As to the evidence regarding unidentified persons asking how the employees could get rid of the Union, that evidence cannot form the basis for objective considerations. In the first place that testimony is not credible. I cannot credit that Administrator Ullery would be unable to identify a single complaining employee, if employees were regularly voicing the same request in meetings from January through July 1986. Employees that testified disputed that those questions were asked.

Secondly, such testimony, if credited, would not show that unit employees or employees in addition to those named in other testimony, were asking to get rid of the Union. Only 140 to 150 of the total employee complement of 200 employees are in the bargaining unit. By her being unable to identify questioning employees, Administrator Ullery could not establish that the employee or employees were in the bargaining unit. Additionally, Ullery could not establish that the employee was not always the same person, and that that person was not one of the employees identified as complaining about the Union to Susan Morganeli or William Bunton. Additionally, that type of testimony provides insurance against full cross-examination and rebuttal. The alleged complaining employee cannot be identified and questioned. If that type of testimony was routinely accepted as probative, it would open an avenue for false testimony.

Respondent's evidence was unrebutted and is credited in the following respects.

Susan Morganeli testified that she was questioned by employee Trudy Calhoun during an in-service meeting in the spring of 1986. Calhoun asked what could be done to get rid of the Union. Morganeli testified that some of the nursing assistants stayed over "to reinforce the question as far as what cold be done." Morganeli identified two of those employees as being Carol Pinner and Meg Hutchins.

Supervisor William Bunton testified that employee Tom Rivers asked him how to get rid of the Union. Bunton also testified that employees Gregory Becton and Kenny Young asked him how they could stop their union dues deductions from being taken out of their paycheck every 2 weeks.[1] Bunton testified that he overheard other employees talking about getting rid of the Union. Bunton testified that he recalled the names of two employees who were involved in those conversations as being Inez Blance and Clarence Macklin.

[1] Neither Becton nor Young indicated a desire to get rid of the Union.

Additionally, Judy Ullery and Jimmy Crowe testified about an employee meeting on 11 August 1986. At that meeting Respondent announced to the employees that it had purchased the Raleigh, Tennessee nursing home. According to Crowe someone[2] asked Respondent's regional vice president, Dick Ebersol, "Does this mean we no longer have a union." Crowe testified that Ebersol replied, "to my knowledge, we don't." According to both Crowe and Ullery, the employees applauded Elbersol's reply.

In rebuttal the General Counsel called Brenda Young, Sharon Nash, Jessie Jackson, Clementine Posey, and Marjorie Fulton. All those employees agreed with Crowe and Ullery that someone did ask Ebersol about the Union. However, those employees testified that other statements were made in support of the Union, and all testified that no one applauded Ebersol's remarks.

Regarding the 11 August meeting, Brenda Young, who has been an employee at the Raleigh Nursing Home for 6 years, agreed with Crowe and Ullery that an employee asked Dick Ebersol if there was still a union in the facility. Young also agreed with Crowe's recollection of Ebersol's response. However, Young testified that the employees did not applaud. According to Young the meeting broke up because state inspectors arrived to inspect the nursing home.

Sharon Nash, a former employee,[3] testified that she heard an employee ask if union dues were "going to still be taken out of their checks." However, in disagreement with Crowe and Ullery, Nash testified that employees did not applaud.

Jesse Jackson recalled an employee asking Ebersol "was there a union in the facility." Jackson testified that after Ebersol replied the "building was union free," employee Marjorie Fulton asked "why are you still taking union dues if there is not a union." Ebersol replied that would be taken care of. Jackson testified that she spoke up and said there was a Union in the facility. Jackson testified that the employees did not applaud.

Clementine Posey, who has been employed at Respondent's nursing home for 3 years, testified in accord with the testimony of Jessie Jackson except Posey recalled it was Marjorie Fulton who said there is a union in the building. Posey testified that the employees did not applaud, rather they "looked at each other in shock because everybody thought there was a union."

Majorie Fulton, who has worked at Respondent's nursing home for 2 years, testified in accord with the testimony of Clementine Posey. Fulton testified that there was not a clapping of hands.

I am convinced from the testimony of Fulton, Posey, Jackson, Nash, and Young that there was not applause from a noticeable number of employees following Eber-

[2] As in earlier testimony, Respondent's witnesses were unable to identify the questioning employee. However, in this one instance the testimony was corroborated by several witnesses called by the General Counsel.

[3] Respondent argues that Nash and Jessie Jackson should be discredited since both were discharged by Respondent and were therefore biased. However, the General Counsel introduced an affidavit from Sharon Nash showing that she gave similar testimony before her discharge (see FRE 801 (d)(1)). I find that neither Nash nor Jackson was impeached. Their testimony is in accord with other evidence that I credit.

sol's comments that there was no union. Respondent produced no nonsupervisory employees to support the contention that the employees applauded. The above-mentioned witnesses called by the General Counsel, and especially employees Posey and Jackson, impressed me with their demeanor. Posey and Jackson demonstrated a better recollection of the details of the 11 August meeting than either Judy Ullery or Jimmy Crowe.

III. CONCLUSIONS

In situations when a union is the certified bargaining representative there exists a presumption of continuing majority status. Similarly, when a union has a collective-bargaining agreement, there is a presumption of continuing majority status even after the contract expires. Wilder Construction, 276 NLRB 977 (1985).

When a successorship is established, there is a presumption of continuing majority support. NLRB v. Burns Security Services, 406 U.S. 272 (1972); Redok Enterprises, 277 NLRB 1010 (1985); Royal Vending Services, 275 NLRB 1222 (1985).

In all the above-mentioned situations, an employer may overcome the presumptions by showing that either (1) the union has lost its majority support or (2) the employer has a reasonable doubt, based on objective considerations, that the union has majority support. In this case, there was no evidence showing that the Union had actually lost majority support.

Respondent offered evidence that it withdrew recognition on the basis of a reasonably based doubt of the Union's continued majority support. To pervail in its defense Respondent has the burden of proving that its doubt was reasonably based, by establishing that the doubt was grounded in objective considerations. Wilder Construction, supra.

Those objective considerations must rely, in the final analysis, on facts showing that the unit employees rejected the Union (Wilder Construction, supra), or alternatively, that the Union has abandoned the unit. As shown above, the credited evidence shows that the Union did not abandon the unit by inactivity.

Here, the outstanding query must deal with whether Respondent was led to believe that the employees rejected the Union.

By taking the credited evidence in the light most favorable to Respondent, the record shows the following: Three employees, Trudy Calhoun, Carol Pinner, and Meg Hutchins, may have demonstrated to Susan Morganeli that they wanted to withdraw from the Union. At most, five other employees expressed to William Bunton that they wanted to withdraw from the Union.[4] The above facts show that only 8 employees, at the most, in a unit of 140 or more, wanted to get rid of the Union.

Regarding the 11 August 1986 meeting, the credited evidence shows only that an employee asked if the Union continued to represent the unit employees. Jimmy Crowe's testimony shows that an unidentified employee asked, "Does this mean that we no longer have a Union."

As shown above, I reject Crowe's testimony that 60 to 70 percent of the employees applauded. Even if credited, however, that testimony would not establish a reasonable basis for believing that the Union did not maintain majority support. Testimony from Administrator Judy Ullery established that about 50 to 60 of Respondent's employees were not in the bargaining unit. The evidence did not show how many of the employees at the 11 August meeting were members of the bargaining unit. Therefore, Respondent failed to show that any 60 percent of the employees at the meeting necessarily constituted over 50 percent of the unit employees. Ullery testified there were about 140 to 150 employees in the unit. Respondent's evidence shows that there were at least 100 employees at the 11 August meeting. If 60 of those were nonunion employees, it is apparent that a possibility existed that only nonunit employees applauded.

Although the above analysis results in what may be an unlikely scenario, it is important to keep several thoughts in mind. It is Respondent's burden to show that it had an objective belief that the unit employees in substantial numbers expressed a desire to get rid of the Union. That belief must be shown to be based on objective factors. With that burden in mind, it is necessary to analyze the evidence in a critical light in order to consider the objectivity of the evidence. I cannot conclude, for example, that a question of whether the Union continues to represent the employees shows that the questioning employee is opposed to the Union. Moreover, I cannot conclude, for example, that applause in a room that included unit and nonunit employees represents the desires of unit employees, absent some proof that applauding unit employees constituted a substantial portion of the total bargaining unit. The record contains no such proof. See Thomas Industries, supra.

The credited evidence shows that, at most, only 8 employees out of a unit exceeding 140 expressed a desire to get rid of the Union. At least one other employee questioned whether they were still represented by the Union after Respondent purchased the nursing home. However, that employee did not express a desire to get rid of the Union. On the basis of that evidence it is clear, and I find, that Respondent did not have a reasonable basis to doubt the Union's majority status in August 1986.

A. Refusal to Consider the Gaither Grievance

As shown above, Respondent advised the Union on 29 October 1986 that it would not accept the Union's grievance regarding Paula Gaither. Respondent based that action on its "good-faith doubt that (the Union continued) to represent our employees."

Because of my findings that Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) and (5) by refusing to recognize the Union in August 1986, it follows that Respondent had a continuing duty to bargain in good faith in October 1986.

Before August 1986 Respondent and the Union had an established procedure to process grievances. That procedure is outlined in the collective-bargaining agreement, which is in evidence. After Respondent took over the nursing home on 1 August 1986 it made only two changes in the employees' terms and conditions of employment. Those changes involved insurance and meals for employees. No change was ever announced, and the evidence does not show that Respondent instituted any changes in the grievance procedure.

[4] As shown above, however, two of the five only requested of Bunton information on how to rescind their dues deduction.

Since Respondent did not change the grievance procedure at a time before it began operations with a full complement of employees, its subsequent refusal to process the grievance because it had illegally withdrawn recognition also constitutes a violation of Section 8(a)(1) and (5). Turnbull Enterprises, 259 NLRB 934 (1982).

1. The March 11, 1987 speech

After the first day of hearing, Administrator Judy Ullery returned to the nursing home and addressed the employees. Ullery admittedly spoke to the employees regarding their efforts to organize for the Union. The General Counsel alleges that that speech violated the Act as follows:

> Informed its employees that the Union caused employees benefits to be eliminated and threatened to eliminate its employees benefits.

The General Counsel called five witnesses, all of whom were employed by Respondent on 11 March 1987 to testify regarding Judy Ullery's speech.

Former employee Deloris Woods testified that Ullery told the employees some of the disadvantages of having the Union, that "some of our benefits would be taken away from us." Annie Gray and Anita Parnell testified about the March 11 speech, but Gray's and Parnell's testimonies did not include anything about benefits being taken away. Betty McClure recalled that Ullery asked the employees if they could recall "when the benefits [were] taken away." McClure said Ullery told them the benefits were taken away because of the Union. Barbara Walker recalled that Ullery told the employees that the Union they had before had taken away "some of our vacation benefits and insurance benefits."

Judy Ullery testified as follows regarding her comments about loss of benefits:

> Q. Now, at the meeting you said you told the employees about benefits being lost in the past. Isn't it a fact that you told them that benefits could be lost again if the Union comes back in?
> A. I did not say that. All I said—because I knew that I would have to answer for what I said—was that my experience has been in the past, that this is what has happened. I did not say this is what would happen in the future, no.
> Q. Your experience had been in the past, that employees would lose benefits if the Union came in?
>
> A. My experience had been in the past, from the Union negotiations that I had been in at the Germantown facility, and I always used the Germantown facility, because I was in on every negotiation at that time—I said that, yes, indeed, they did lose benefits, and they did.

Respondent also called Assistant Director of Nursing Ruth Landers regarding Ullery's speech:

> Q. Do you have any recall of any statements that employees had lost benefits at Germantown?
>
> A. No, sir, I do not. We did have the statement that they did lose their insurance benefits.

2. Analysis

The bulk of the testimony illustrates that Ullery's remarks included comments that employees had lost benefits in the past because of the Union. I am convinced that Ullery did not specifically threaten that benefits would be taken away. Only Deloris Woods recalls such a threat. The General Counsel's witnesses, McClure and Walker, agreed with Ullery and Landers that Ullery mentioned only that benefits had been lost in the past.

a. Solicited employees to repudiate their union membership and support

Deloris Woods testified:

> A. Well, [Ullery] said that if anybody had signed forms, that she suggests that we get them, and tear them up, and if we had a friend, or knowed of anyone that had signed, to talk to them.
> Q. Okay. Did she say what kind of a form?
> A. Well, she was talking about the Union slip, the form for the Union.

Annie Gray testified:

> Q. Would you tell us what Ms. Ullery—what you recall Ms. Ullery saying at this meeting?
> A. That she knew about some employees passing around some slips of paper concerning the Union, and that they need to think twice before joining the Union.

Betty McClure recalled:

> Q. Would you tell us what you remember Ms. Ullery saying at this meeting?
> A. Well, she started out saying that the reason we wasn't getting—wasn't getting any nickel raises was because of the Union. Then she said, for those of us that had friends, that we ought to talk to them about the Union. Tell them that the Union, you know, wasn't no good, and that we'd better get out.

Barbara Walker testified:

> Q. Now, would you tell us what you remember Ms. Ullery saying during that meeting?
> A. She said that it was okay, for her lawyer—her lawyer said it was okay for her to give that meeting, and she said that she had heard that there was a Petition going around, that somebody had signed up for the Union, and if we had signed up, she would like for us to take our name off of the Petition.

Anita Parnell stated:

> Q. Would you tell us what you remember Ms. Ullery saying during that meeting?

A. I don't remember much, but I know—I know that she said that whoever was in the Union, it was best for them to get out of the Union, stuff. It wasn't very much that I remember though, because I really wasn't paying no attention.

Assistant Administrator Brenda Howell testified that Judy Ullery did not tell the employees that she would like them to get out of the Union. However, Judy Ullery admitted that she did ask the employees to take their names off the petition:

Q. Did you tell the employees not to—tell the employees to take their names off the Petition, or any card if they had signed?

A. I did. They asked me if they had signed it, and if they did not mean to sign it, and my suggestion was for them to call the Union, and see if there's any way they could have their name removed. That's the ones that called me and asked me about it.

3. Analysis

Although it is not absolutely clear from Ullery's testimony whether she asked employees to remove their names from the union petition while speaking to the employees on 11 March, I am convinced from her testimony and from the testimony mentioned above that Ullery did make that request during her 11 March speech. Ullery's testimony was in the context of a chain of questions regarding her 11 March speech and she did not say that those comments were not included in that meeting.

Informed employees that wage increases would be frozen and that the employees had not received a wage increase because of unfair labor practices filed with the board.

Regarding wage increases, Deloris Woods testified:

Q. Do you remember anything being said about raises?

A. Oh, yes. She said that the reason why we haven't gotten our nickel raise was because some girl had filed charges against the company.

Q. And was any question ask about the raise?

A. Yeah. It was some girl there, and she asked about, you know, was that the reason why we wasn't getting our nickel raise, because of this girl who had filed charges against the company. She really didn't answer her, you know, didn't give her an answer to the question.

Annie Gray:

Q. Did she say anything else?

A. Yes. She stated that the last time the Union was in, that they put a freeze on the wages, and whatever else that was concerning the Union, and it put a stop on things for about a year, and that if the Union came into force, that it would put a freeze on the raise you're supposed to get annually, for your year to year.

Q. Did she say how long the freeze would be?

A. She said it would take approximately a year, like it did last time.

Regarding the unfair labor practices and raises, Gray testified:

Q. Did she say anything about the unfair labor practice charge, and the raises?

A. I can't remember, because I wasn't paying too much attention to her.

Betty McClure recalled:

Q. Do you remember anything else she said?

A. And she said that the reason we wasn't getting the nickel raises was because of the Union, because they had, you know, had everything at a standstill.

Barbara Walker:

Q. Did she say anything else about a wage increase?

A. She said that we wouldn't get a increase in pay, because of the lawsuit that they had going, and that it would take a whole year before—if the Union came in, it would be a whole year, and then they had to sit down, and decide the benefits and everything. It would be a whole year before we'd get any benefits and raises.

Anita Parnell:

Q. Did she say anything else about the Union?

A. No. She said that if they did get a Union up in there, it would be on a freeze for a whole year.

Q. Did she say what would be on a freeze?

A. No, she didn't say. She just said everything would be on a freeze, but I don't remember if she said nothing.

Respondent's Administrator Judy Ullery testified:

Q. By Mr. Nadworny: Did you make any statements to employees that they would lose any wage increases, that they presently had?

A. Absolutely not.

Q. Did you say anything to employees, concerning what would happen during negotiations for a contract?

A. I don't remember.

Later, on cross-examination, Ullery testified:

Q. Now, you testified that you told the employees that the unfair labor practices—Well, I'm sorry, let me ask you again. What did you say about the unfair labor practices?

A. I told them, when they asked about the money, that at this point we were following the contract, because an employee from the kitchen had filed a grievance, and the Union—we had refused to hear the grievance, and the Union had filed the unfair labor practice.

Q. And I believe, you testified you told the employees you were following the contract with regard to the raises?

A. That's right.

However, Assistant Administrator Brenda Howell testified regarding Ullery's 11 March address:

Q. Did she say anything to them about wages being frozen?

A. There were some questions from the floor, about 90 day increases, and she addressed it, that everything had been frozen, and would remain under the contract until the NLRB hearing was settled—the charges were settled.

Q. Did employees ask about the five cent increase?

A. No. They asked about a 90 day increase, which was not in their present contract.

Q. Did she ask them or tell them, that it could be a year without increases, or changes?

A. She told them if there was another Union election, elections could go on or the negotiations could go on for a period of a year, which she had seen that happen.

Q. Did she say that that had happened in the past?

A. Yes.

Assistant Director of Nursing Landers testified:

Q. Now, when Ms. Ullery talked aobut the Germantown facility, and what happened at that facility, exactly what did she say happened at that facility?

A. She only referred to the length of negotiations, that wages were frozen during that period, and that if anyone—she also encouraged anyone if they had any questions, they might talk to some of the employees that were at Germantown, at that time. Some that joined, and some that did not join.

4. Analysis

Although the above-mentioned testimony illustrates confusion, I am convinced that Judy Ullery did warn the employees that dealing with the Union would result in protracted negotiations, which in the past had lasted for a year, and that wages would be frozen during that time. I find the evidence unconvincing that Ullery threatened the employees that they had lost a wage increase because of unfair labor practice charges.

William Bunton: Two former employees testified about conversations with William Bunton. Bunton, like Judy Ullery, had testified in the 11 March hearing.

Annie Gray testified that a day or so after the 11 March hearing she talked with Supervisor Bunton in the dining room. Only the two of them were involved in that conversation:

Q. And would you tell us what Mr. Bunton said to you during that meeting?

A. He came to me, and said that Martha Ryan, he had asked Martha Ryan if she was going to join the Union, and she said that, no, she wasn't going to join it, and he asked me if I was going to join the Union, and I told him, No.

Q. Now, before Mr. Bunton asked you that question, had you ever told him anything about your feelings toward the Union?

A. No.

Barbara McClure recalled talking with Bunton in the breakroom on 13 March. Only McClure and Bunton were present:

Q. Tell us what Mr. Bunton said to you?

A. Well, he came in while I was smoking a cigarette, he lit up him a cigarette, and he asked me, you know, did I join the Union, so I told him, No. So, then he said, have I thought about it, or have I been thinking about it, so I told him, you know, I didn't tell him nothing. So then he said, well, I would join myself, but because, you know, I couldn't, because of his job. So, then he asked—then he said, well—So then I told him that I had, you know, I had thought about it, so then he said, you know that if Ms. Ullery finds out, you know, about those that join the Union, that she was going to get rid of them. So, then I told him, I said, well, I feel she shouldn't fire nobody beccause they join some Union, and if she's going, you know, to fire me, she'd better fire me for a reason, and not because, you know, I joined some Union. So then he said, well, she'll find out, and then he also said, and that's not hard for her to do.

Bunton denied talking with either Gray or McClure about the Union.

Bunton's testimony regarding the alleged conversations with Gray and McClure appears to conflict with testimony he gave on 11 March. On 27 May when Bunton was trying to minimize his contacts with employees to show that he did not make violative comments he testified:

Q. But I mean, you do sit in the breakroom from time to time?

A. No, I always sit in the dining room

Q. You never sit in the breakroom?

A. No, not really. Sometimes I'll go in there to eat my lunch, but there would be, you know, a room full of employees, or I might eat it in the dining room.

Q. But you do go in and talk to the employees in the breakroom, don't you?

A. I go inside, but I really don't talk to many employees there, unless they're working under my supervision.

Q. You've never talked to an employee in the breakroom?

A. Yeah, I've talked to employees.

Q. You've talked to employees about the Union, haven't you?

A. No, I have not.

Q. Employees have asked you questions about the Union, haven't they?

A. No, sir. They have not.

Q. Employees have never asked you a question about the Union?

A. No, sir. Excuse me, yes, one of my housekeepers did, but I told him that I couldn't—you know, that he would have to talk to Ms. Ullery about the Union. Any questions regarding the Union, they would have to go talk to her.

Q. And that was the only time?

A. That was the only time that anyone ever asked me concerning the Union.

Q. That one single time?

A. That I recall, sir.

On 11 March, however, when Bunton was trying to establish that he had contacts with employees to show that he had knowledge about employee efforts to get rid of the Union, Bunton testified that he would be in the breakroom "taking my break or smoking a cigarette" when he would overhear employees, in and out of his department, discussing getting rid of the Union. Additionally, on that occasion Bunton recalled several conversations with employees about the Union. On 27 May he testified he never had but one conversation with an employee about the Union. Bunton's conflicting testimony convinces me that he cannot be believed. I was impressed with the demeanor of Annie Gray and Betty McClure. Both appeared to testify truthfully. I credit their testimony. I find that their testimony establishes illegal interrogation and a threat of discharge.

5. Conclusions

As shown above, on or before March 1987 Respondent had an obligation to recognize the Union as bargaining representative for its unit employees. Once the Union becomes exclusive bargaining representative it is incumbent on an employer to avoid acting to undermine the Union. Obviously, an atmosphere of good-faith collective bargaining is impossible when the employer is working to undermine the Union.

In the instant situation Respondent obviously hoped to prevail in the allegation that it illegally withdrew recognition from the Union. If Respondent had been successful then the Ullery address on 11 March to employees would be considered in light of Section 8(a)(1) alone. However, as found on 11 March Respondent was obligated to recognize the Union and to avoid taking actions to undermine the Union in violation of Section 8(a)(1) and (5).

Against that background it is apparent that Respondent, by Bunton threatening its employees with discharge for supporting the Union and by interrogating employees about union activity (Baton Rouge General Hospital, 283 NLRB 192 (1987), and by Judy Ullery informing its employees that benefits were lost in the past because of the Union, asking its employees to remove their names from the union petition, and informing its employees that wage increases would be frozen for up to a year if Respondent negotiated with the Union, attempted to undermine the Union in violation of Section 8(a)(1) and (5) of the Act. Bay Area-Los Angeles Express, 275 NLRB 1063 (1985); Marriott Corp., 258 NLRB 755 (1981); Hedaya Bros., Inc., 277 NLRB 309 (1985).

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. Respondent Hillhaven Corporation is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act.

2. General Drivers, Salesmen, Warehousemen's Local 984, AFL–CIO, an affiliate of International Brotherhood of Teamsters, Chauffeurs, Warehousemen and Helpers of America is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

Respondent, by refusing to recognize and bargain with the Union since 26 August 1986, by refusing to consider and discuss grievances since 22 October 1986, by asking its employees to remove their names from the Union's petition, by telling its employees that benefits were lost in the past because of the Union, by threatening its employees with discharge for supporting the Union, by interrogating its employees about the Union, and by informing its employees that wage increases would be frozen for up to a year if Respondent negotiated with the Union violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act.

5. The aforesaid unfair labor practices are unfair labor practices affecting commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

THE REMEDY

Having found that the Respondent has engaged in unfair labor practices in violation of Section 8(a)(1) and (5) of the Act, I shall recommend that Respondent be ordered to cease and desist therefrom, and to take certain affirmative action designed to effectuate the policies of the Act.

On these findings of fact and conclusions of law and on the entire record, I issue the following recommended[5]

July 29, 1988

DECISION AND CERTIFICATION OF REPRESENTATIVE

BY MEMBERS JOHANSEN, BABSON, AND CRACRAFT

The National Labor Relations Board, by a three-member panel, has considered objections to an election held January 28, 1988, and the Regional Director's report recommending disposition of them. The election was conducted pursuant to a Stipulated Election Agreement. The tally of ballots shows 22 for and 19 against the Petitioner, with 2 challenged ballots, an insufficient number to affect the results.

The Board has reviewed the record in light of the exceptions[1] and briefs, has adopted the Regional Director's findings and recommendations,[2] and finds that a certification of representative should be issued.

CERTIFICATION OF REPRESENTATIVE

IT IS CERTIFIED that a majority of the valid ballots have been cast for Local 1475, Service Employees International Union, AFL–CIO–CLC, and that it is the exclusive collective-bargaining representative of the employees in the following appropriate unit:

> All full time and regular part time service and maintenance employees including nurses aides, housekeepers, laundry workers, kitchen workers, maintenance workers, activity aides, cooks and licensed practical nurses employed by the Employer at its Newton, Massachusetts location, but excluding all registered nurses, professional employees, confidential employees, department heads, business office clericals, guards and supervisors as defined in the Act.

MEMBER JOHANSEN, dissenting.

I would sustain the Employer's Objection B(2), set aside the election, and direct that a second election be held.[3] Objection B(2) alleges that "[t]he Region did not adequately guard the secrecy of the election because it failed to provide an adequate voting booth." I am not persuaded by the Employer's argument that the Haitian employees were peculiarly susceptible to apprehension regarding ballot secrecy, nor am I basing my dissent alone on the failure of the Region to furnish a booth when the Region had apparently promised that one would be used. Whether the Region promised that a booth would be available is not of primary concern, but it does weigh in here as the Employer had briefed its employees that a booth would be used. I am persuaded that the manner in which the election was conducted does not foster public trust in the Board's processes. All the circumstances present here just do not measure up to the standards the Board ought to require of itself in conducting elections.[4]

[1] We adopt, pro forma, those recommendations to which there were no exceptions. In adopting the Regional Director's recommendations that the objections be overruled in their entirety, we find that the alleged objectionable conduct, considered individually or cumulatively, does not warrant setting aside the election.

[2] Unlike our dissenting colleague, we find that the Employer's Objection B(2) does not justify setting aside the election. Objection B(2) alleges that "[t]he Region did not adequately guard the secrecy of the election because it failed to provide an adequate voting booth." In support of this objection, the Employer argues that its Haitian employees (roughly one-half of the electorate) were suspicious of the ballot secrecy when the Board agent conducting the morning election session did not provide an official voting booth. The Employer's contention falls short of articulating objective (as opposed to subjective) proof from which it can be concluded that the failure to provide an official voting booth interfered with the laboratory conditions of the election. See, e.g., Newport News Shipbuilding & Dry Dock Co., 243 NLRB 99 (1979). Indeed, there is neither evidence nor a contention that the secrecy of the ballot was, in fact, violated.

[3] Accordingly, I need not consider the remaining exceptions raised by the Employer.

[4] The morning session of voting was done on a card table, with a sheet used to cover the voter at the table. The parties' endeavor to make use of available resources in the face of difficulties is commendable, but this does not relieve the Board of its responsibility to conduct elections properly.

DECISION AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN STEPHENS AND MEMBERS JOHANSEN AND BABSON

On February 8, 1984, Administrative Law Judge Richard J. Linton issued the attached decision. The Respondent filed exceptions and a supporting brief. The General Counsel filed an answering brief.[1]

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the decision and the record in light of the exceptions and briefs and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings,[2] and conclusions, as modified below, and to adopt the recommended Order as modified.[3]

The judge found, inter alia, that the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(3) and (1) of the Act by laying off two teams of sheetrock employees on February 11, 1983:[4] Thomas Gallegos Jr. and Cuahtemoc Anguiano; and Salvador Machuca and Anastacio Dominguez Jr.[5] We agree with the judge as to the Machuca-Dominguez team, but we disagree as to the Gallegos-Anguiano team.

The Respondent undisputedly knew that Gallegos and Machuca had been leaders of, and that Anguiano had participated in, the January 25, 1983 protected strike protesting the Respondent's wage policies. It also demonstrated strong animus against these and other strikers by the various unfair labor practices described in the judge's decision, including the temporary firing of all strikers on January 25 and the demotion on rehiring of Machuca after the strike.

On the other hand, the Respondent laid off employees on February 11 for undisputedly legitimate economic reasons and contends that it selected employees for layoff based on poor productivity, rather than seniority, a legitimate factor that had been consistently relied on in past economic layoffs. The General Counsel has not excepted to the judge's finding that no inference of unlawful discriminatory motive can be drawn merely from the percentage of former strikers among those laid off.[6] Consequently, as found by the judge, a critical factor both in the evaluation of the General Counsel's prima facie case and in subsequent consideration of whether the Respondent would have taken the same action in the absence of union activities is whether the Respondent's reasons for selecting the individual employees for layoff withstand scrutiny and, if not, whether an unlawful motive can be inferred.

The judge's drawing of an inference of unlawful motive from rejection of the Respondent's poor productivity allegations regarding the Gallegos-Anguiano team directly contradicts his own revised finding that: (1) this team was unacceptably slow in taking 3 days to complete a furrdown assignment on February 8 to 10; and (2) a representative of the Respondent's chief customer had specifically complained about this situation. Even assuming a prima facie case of unlawful motivation and the validity of the judge's rejection of the Respondent's three other criticisms of this employee team's poststrike work, we find that the foregoing evidence of legitimate criticism and lack of evidence of disparate treatment negates the inference of unlawful motive. We, therefore, find that the Respondent has shown that it would have selected Gallegos and Anguiano for layoff even in the absence of their union activities.[7] The complaint regarding these two employees is dismissed.

On the other hand, relying particularly on Machuca's prior unlawful demotion, we agree with the judge's credibility-based rejection of the Respondent's criticism of work by Machuca and Dominguez and with his conclusion that their layoff was unlawful. The Respondent has argued that this team took too much time on a poststrike assignment of framing and sheetrocking a ClayDesta Bank elevator penthouse compared to the time spent prior to the strike by another sheetrock team

[1] In light of the General Counsel's withdrawal from consideration of certain portions of the answering brief, we deny the Respondent's motion to strike the brief in its entirety.

[2] The Respondent has excepted to some of the judge's credibility findings. The Board's established policy is not to overrule an administrative law judge's credibility resolutions unless the clear preponderance of all the relevant evidence convinces us that they are incorrect. Standard Dry Wall Products, 91 NLRB 544 (1950), enfd. 188 F.2d 362 (3d Cir. 1951). We have carefully examined the record and find no basis for reversing the findings.

[3] In accordance with our decision in New Horizons for the Retarded, 283 NLRB 1173 (1987), interest on and after January 1, 1987, shall be computed at the "short-term Federal rate" for the underpayment of taxes as set out in the 1986 amendment to 26 U.S.C. § 6621. Interest on amounts accrued prior to January 1, 1987 (the effective date of the 1986 amendment to 26 U.S.C. § 6621), shall be computed in accordance with Florida Steel Corp., 231 NLRB 651 (1977).

We shall modify the recommended Order to conform to the violations found and to include a general cease-and-desist provision.

[4] All dates are in 1983 unless otherwise indicated.

[5] The judge dismissed the complaint allegations regarding the other 12 employees laid off that day.

[6] Twelve of the sixteen laid-off employees participated in the January 25 strike.

[7] See Wright Line, 251 NLRB 1083 (1980), enfd. 662 F.2d 899 (1st Cir. 1981), cert. denied 455 U.S. 989 (1982), approved in NLRB v. Transportation Management Corp., 462 U.S. 393 (1983).

working on another identical penthouse. The judge, however, discredited the testimony of the Respondent's Foreman Brown and found that Machuca-Dominguez worked 6 days (rather than 9, as alleged by Brown) and that the other team worked 7-1/2 days (rather than 5, as alleged by Brown). Furthermore, the judge credited Machuca's testimony that Brown had said that the Machuca-Dominguez team's work on the penthouse was "looking real good." Finally, it is undisputed that Machuca was regarded by the Respondent as a good worker prior to the strike, and the judge again credited Machuca's testimony that he worked even harder after the strike. In light of the above and the absence of any credible evidence in support of the Respondent's criticism of the penthouse work, we agree with the judge that the General Counsel has proved the 8(a)(3) and (1) complaint allegations regarding the February 11 layoff of Machuca and Dominguez.

ORDER

2. Delete the names of Thomas B. Gallegos Jr. and Cuahtemoc Anguiano from paragraph 2(b).

DECISION

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

RICHARD J. LINTON, Administrative Law Judge. This case was tried before me in Midland, Texas, on eight dates beginning June 6 and closing July 27, 1983, pursuant to the April 6, 1983 consolidated complaint (complaint) issued by the General Counsel of the National Labor Relations Board through the Regional Director for Region 16 of the Board. The complaint is based on charges filed January 31 and March 2, 1983, in Cases 16–CA–10895 and 16–CA–10938, respectively, by United Brotherhood of Carpenters and Joiners of America, Local Union 1428 (the Union or Local 1428) against Midessa Construction Company (Respondent or Midessa).[1]

Did Midessa Construction Company discriminate against its former striking employees by selecting 12 of them for layoff on February 11, 1983, because of their protected strike and union activities (as the General Counsel alleges), or was Midessa motivated by a desire to correct work deficiencies and eliminate its least productive workers as it struggled to survive an economic crisis (as the Company contends)? That general question, plus subsidiary issues, is presented for resolution here.

In the complaint the General Counsel alleges that Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act by interrogating employees, harassing them, threatening them with discharge, and disparately enforcing work rules relating to production, breaks, and lunch periods, and Section 8(a)(3) of the Act by terminating certain employees on January 25, 1983, requiring them to fill out new applications when recalled, and terminating certain employees on February 11, 1983.

By its answer Respondent admits certain factual matters but denies violating the Act.

On the entire record, including my observation of the demeanor of the witnesses, and after consideration of the briefs filed by the General Counsel and Respondent, I make the following

FINDINGS OF FACT

I. JURISDICTION

Midessa Construction Company, a Texas corporation with its principal office and place of business in Midland, Texas, does acoustical and drywall work as a subcontractor in the building and construction industry. During the past 12 months Midessa purchased and received, at its Texas facility, goods and materials valued in excess of $50,000 directly from points outside the State of Texas. Respondent admits, and I find, that it is an employer within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act.

II. LABOR ORGANIZATION INVOLVED

Respondent admits, and I find, that United Brotherhood of Carpenters and Joiners of America, Local Union 1428 is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

III. THE ALLEGED UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

A. Overview

On the morning of January 25, 1983, some 25 to 30 employees of Respondent gathered at the gate to one of Midessa's jobsites and refused to go to work. They wanted higher pay. Timing of the strike was unfortunate, for Midessa was experiencing a double whammy of (1) cost overruns and (2) customer dissatisfaction with quality and progress on Midessa's construction jobs. Whether Respondent fired the strikers on January 25 is one of our first issues. In any event, Midessa rehired them a few days later to lay off 16 employees 12 of whom were recalled strikers) on February 11, assertedly for economic reasons.

Although the General Counsel does not allege that the layoff itself was illegal, he does contend, through his trial attorneys, that Respondent was unlawfully motivated in the selection it made for the layoff. Of the 16 employees so terminated, 12 had been strikers. Moreover, the General Counsel's argument continues, Respondent demonstrated animus against the strikers after they returned to work by, among other conduct, burdening them with higher production standards and disparately enforcing work rules against them.

Countering the General Counsel's animus and harassment contentions, Midessa argues that its tighter enforcement of preexisting work rules and imposition of increased productivity standards were steps adopted to help save the Company from economic disaster. Respondent defends its layoff selection on the ground that the employees were picked in the usual fashion—the least productive were elected for separation. In this selection process, a point Midessa considered was the (disputed) fact that some of the strikers selected had engaged in a slowdown after their return to work.

B. Background

1. Midessa and its construction jobs

Respondent is a commercial drywall and acoustical subcontractor. Max H. DeVilbiss, president of Midessa, established the firm in June 1978 (Tr. 274, 932). DeVilbiss explained that drywall work consists of installing the metal stud framing, plus any insulation, and hanging the sheetrock on the metal studs. The acoustical work involves installing ceiling frames in the form of metal grids, placing the insulation above that, and applying the acoustical pads (Tr. 275). Assisting DeVilbiss in the management of his firm are General Superintendent Joe Beasley, Office Manager Warren Brown, and a job foreman in charge of each job (Tr. 294, 933).

Around January-February 1983 Respondent had about a dozen jobs under construction in the Midland-Odessa, Texas area. Nearly all the jobs were in Midland, with one being in Odessa, and another job (First State Bank) being in Abilene, Texas. There were about 100 drywall employees on Respondent's payroll at this time. The names of some of the Midland jobs appear frequently in the record. The more prominent ones are: Gulf Building, Dinero Plaza, Petroleum Center North (Petro North), and ClayDesta Bank Building (Tr. 277–278, 281, 938).

2. Unfavorable conditions develop

Around mid-January 1983 Respondent became aware of two developments. First, the financial condition of Midessa was starting to deteriorate "rapidly," and second, Area Builders Inc., Midessa's chief customer, wrote DeVilbiss a strongly worded letter complaining of poor quality (Tr. 933, 943). Although DeVilbiss never specified which of the two conditions came to his attention first, it appears that the letter, dated (Wednesday) January 12, probably did, for DeVilbiss testified it was about the third week of January that he began preparing a list of the jobs he was concerned about (Tr. 934, 990, 994).

The letter of January 12, 1983, if from Ray Dunlap, Area Builders' general superintendent, to Midessa regarding the Dinero Plaza job (R. Exh. 13).[2] The text reads:

> Dear Max,
>
> Attached hereto are 5 invoices from T & M Paint Co. for corrective work done due to your work not being done correctly.
> I suggest you get with Ralph Madry and resolve this directly with him and advise me accordingly.
> Max, I know personally that Kenneth Key has many times complained about your quality of work and lack of supervision. My personal contact with the job verifies that this condition has existed. You cannot afford this kind of operation and cannot tolerate it. The workmanship and supervision on this job is the worst I have seen in all your work done for us; however your quality has been poor in other instances.
>
> As you know, several proposed lease areas are now being considered. If you are not prepared to correct the problems above described, there is no need to start. We absolutely and positively will not accept or tolerate continuation of this situation.
> I was also at the Parker Building yesterday and instructed Kevan Amonett to refuse to let you install sheetrock on this job until you have straightened the walls. By copy of this letter, I am also advising him to check all your future walls before they are sheetrocked, bedded and taped.
> I do not see how you can keep from insisting and demanding that your people provide a straight wall, but if you can't—I can!
> There are times on various jobs where work is required to be done on Saturday. This sometimes occurs due to your lack of progress, ours, nature of the job or other conditions. In the past you have refused to do so. Certainly I want you to know that I honor and respect your belief and in no way would I discriminate against it; however there are just simply times that work must be performed on Saturday. My personal belief is Sunday as being the Lord's Day, however if necessity demands, I personally will work on Sunday and will ask others to do so. I am not asking you to do anything that I myself would not do.
> I regret the necessity of having to write a letter of this nature of criticism. I hope you will accept it as being constructive—for your benefit and for ours.
> Sincerely yours,
> AREA BUILDERS, INC.
> Ray Dunlap
> General Superintendent

After receiving this letter, DeVilbiss, I find, compiled his job list.[3] The list contains the names of 20 jobs (R. Exh. 9). DeVilbiss discovered that labor costs were a major problem, for Midessa was spending about $1.50 to get $1 worth of production (Tr. 933). Midessa lost about $100,000 on the Dinero Plaza job. Expressing the obvious, DeVilbiss testified that Respondent would be bankrupt if all its jobs ended as Dinero (Tr. 939).

DeVilbiss testified that of the 20 jobs shown on the list he compiled, 17 were either complete or substantially so (Tr. 934, 979). The jobs with significant work left were the Gulf Building, ClayDesta, and Petro North (Tr. 978, 1000). Although Dinero was not completed until late May, and not accepted by the owner until July, that was because Midessa had to do a lot of corrective work on the job (Tr. 939, 992, 999). DeVilbiss testified that a subcontractor has to absorb the cost of his own mistakes (Tr. 996).

[2] DeVilbiss testified that Area Builders is Midessa's biggest customer. In addition to the Dinero Plaza project, Area Builders was the general contractor on the Petroleum North and ClayDesta Plaza jobs, plus others, where Midessa was working (Tr. 944)

[3] It is clear that Dunlap's letter set off alarm bells at Midessa. Respondent could not afford to lose its position as a subcontractor for Area Builders.

The job list contains five columns of data: name of each job, the budgeted cost figure, the amount of budget dollars remaining (or exceeding budget), and the cost as a percentage of the budgeted figure.[4] Thus, DeVilbiss testified, 100 percent means that the job, if complete, is right on line with the budget target (Tr. 935). However, the list does not reflect the stage of each job (Tr. 991). The percentage figure of ClayDesta at 68, being 32 percent under the budget target, would be reason to celebrate if the job were 98 percent complete, but cause for gloom if the job were at only the 25-percent completion stage. In fact, testified ClayDesta Job Foreman Marvin Brown, the ClayDesta job was about 50-percent complete, yet 68 percent of the budgeted cost had been used (Tr. 1034).[5] DeVilbiss testified that ClayDesta was a little behind, "but not so much that we, couldn't catch up." His concern was that if the job exceeded budget, as Northwest Elementary or Dinero Plaza had done, then Midessa was "in a heap of trouble." (Tr. 992.) Dinero, basically complete (Tr. 992), is listed at 155 percent of budget; Northwest Elementary, complete or substantially so, at 311 percent.

Perhaps it should be noted that the last four jobs on the list, Dinero, Gulf, ClayDesta, and Petro North, were also Midessa's biggest in terms of budget dollars.[6] Gulf is the largest, at over $313,000, ClayDesta second, at over $196,000, Dinero third, at just over $100,000, and Petro North fourth, at over $69,000. Ten of the other sixteen weigh in at less than $5500 each. The remaining six average about $30,000 each. Excluding Gulf, ClayDesta, and Petro North only three of the other jobs finished within the budgeted labor cost. The largest of those three was for $17,486, the smallest was for $291, and the third was for $1064.

Because of DeVilbiss' testimony that Midessa keeps a running total for its labor costs on these jobs (Tr. 942, 993), his assertion that the Company's financial condition began to "deteriorate rapidly" in January 1983 is not to be understood as something that happened over a weekend. Rather, it seems clear that DeVilbiss suddenly realized, on compiling his running totals into a chart, that Midessa's financial condition was on a downhill slide. This financial analysis by DeVilbiss was preceded, I have found, by the letter from Ray Dunlap, the general superintendent of Area Builders, Inc.

DeVilbiss, faced with the economic threat to Respondent inherent in both Dunlap's letter and the job cost figures, addressed his own letter, dated January 24, to Midessa's employees. He personally posted a copy at ClayDesta and Petro North on that same day, and at the other jobsites the next morning. He showed the job foremen the job cost tabulations, told the foremen to read the letter to the employees, and to get more productivity and quality from the (Tr. 944a–945). The January 24 letter (with two typographical misspellings corrected) reads (R. Exh. 8):

> To All Employees of Midessa Construction Co.
> We have been receiving in the office many complaints about a lack of quality workmanship on our various jobs. I have personally inspected many jobs and found poor quality. I have also noticed in many cases there was hardly any forward production because most of the crew was fixing walls, ceilings and other components that should have been done right the first time.
>
> The poor quality mentioned above has been showing up in the production figures. In the past six months there has been no job, save one, that did not go over the budget for labor. I believe this is due to a bad work attitude for a lot of you plus the fact that we are doing the same job over and over because of poor workmanship.
>
> The sum of the matter is that neither of these conditions can be tolerated any more as this can lead to the death of the company and/or your jobs.
>
> Take responsibility for your work and put out a finished product that you can be proud of. Remember, if you don't have time to do a job right you certainly do not have time to do it over.
> I regret the necessity of having to write a letter of this nature. I hope you all will accept it as being constructive for your benefit and for the company.
>
> Sincerely
> Max H. DeVilbiss

The memo from DeVilbiss sparked a reaction he did not expect.

C. The January 1983 Strike

1. Strikers terminated, then reinstated

There is no dispute that the morning of January 25, the day after DeVilbiss posted his memo to employees, some 25 to 60 employees gathered in a parking lot at the gate to the ClayDesta jobsite and declined to go to work.[7] Most of the ClayDesta employees were so gathered, and some employees from the Petro North jobsite joined them. Drywaller Thomas B. "Tommy" Gallegos Jr. was among the employees present.

Gallegos is very experienced in the work of commercial drywalling. At this time both he and Salvador Machuca (a disputed issue is whether Machuca was a leadman at this time) were working at ClayDesta. The testi-

[4] DeVilbiss testified that the budget figure does not include profit or overhead (Tr. 935). It appears that the figures are in terms of direct labor costs only (Tr. 934–935, 942).

[5] Foreman Brown confirmed that his estimate of the completion stage of the job came from his knowledge of the job, and not from anything on the tabulated list (Tr. 1094).

[6] As earlier noted, the budget figures relate only to direct labor costs, or, as DeVilbiss phrased it, "raw" labor costs (Tr. 934, 935, 942). The listed budget is not an accounting budget. DeVilbiss testified that he bids a job by first listing the "raw" cost of labor and material (the list here apparently does not include the cost of material), and then adds "taxes, insurance, overhead, profit, and that gives us our total for us to bid the job at." (Tr. 942.)

[7] Estimates of the numbers vary. One explanation for the difference may be that other employees, not present at the beginning, arrived later.

mony of Gallegos and Machuca, key witnesses for the General Counsel, disclose that employees became upset over the memo from DeVilbiss in light of the fact that they had been expecting a pay increase since January 1, 1983. Gallegos testified that the pay increase expectation was based on the fact that area unions had received a pay increase then, and that Midessa's practice, when Gallegos previously worked for the Company, was to follow the pattern set by the union contracts in the area (Tr. 437, 598). Either Gallegos (Tr. 344, 432–440, 566–568) or Machuca (Tr. 604–606, 655–664), or both (each describes doing so himself), told Marvin Brown on January 24 that the employees wanted to meet with Superintendent Joe Beasley, or President Max DeVilbiss, about getting a raise for the employees. They testified that Brown called the office to arrange the meeting. Brown confirms that he was requested and that he did call the office and arrange for a meeting (Tr. 1035). After his call, Brown told Gallegos and the whole crew, which had gathered, that both DeVilbiss and Beasley would be at the job shack (located on the second floor of ClayDesta Bank) at 8 a.m. the next day to talk with them (Tr. 1036).

Around 8 a.m. on January 25, 1983, DeVilbiss, Beasley, and Brown went to the gate to talk to the employees. It seems that Gallegos served as the spokesman for the employees. DeVilbiss spoke with Gallegos, to the group, and with some individual employees. Gallegos told DeVilbiss that the employees were on a walkout, and that they wanted to discuss wages (Tr. 444). It is clear that they were striking for a pay increase. DeVilbiss offered to meet with four or five of the employees if the others would return to work, but that was rejected. DeVilbiss showed Gallegos the chart of labor cost tabulations for the various jobs. They also discussed the memo from DeVilbiss about poor quality and low productivity. The end result was a standoff. DeVilbiss declined to grant a pay increase, and the employees declined to go to work without one.

The parties stipulated that when the employees told DeVilbiss that they were leaving to go to the union hall, DeVilbiss told the group that if they were not back (at work) by 10 a.m. they no longer had jobs with Midessa (Tr. 9–11). At trial DeVilbiss confirmed that those employees who had not returned to work by 10 a.m. no longer had jobs with Midessa (Tr. 326–327).[8] It seems clear that he also told the group that if they were not back by 10 a.m. they could pick up their checks at 2 p.m. Indeed, DeVilbiss testified that he paid the people later that day who had not returned by 10 a.m., and that he had prepared a list of their names (Tr. 953–954). This list, containing 25 names, is in evidence as Respondent's Exhibit 14 (Tr. 975). Paragraph 8 of the complaint alleges that on or about January 25 Respondent terminated 24 named employees. The complaint also contains an allegation that Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act by terminating the employees named in paragraph 8. Most of the individuals named in paragraph 8 and the paycheck list (R. Exh. 14) are the same employees, but there are a few differences.[9]

Returning for a moment to the remarks DeVilbiss made to the group on January 25, I note that at one point in his testimony he asserted that his reference to returning by 10 a.m. included the additional statement that he would hire people to put on the job because he had to man the job (Tr. 330). He later testified that he set a 10 a.m. deadline because he had to man the job (Tr. 947). I observed DeVilbiss closely as he testified and, on the basis of demeanor, I find that he attempted to embellish his 10 a.m. deadline statement. I do not believe him regarding his add-on clause about manning the job. He may very well have intended to man the job. It is just that I find he did not say anything about manning the job in his remarks to the group.

It was apparently shortly after 9 a.m. on January 25 that the strikers went to the union hall of Carpenters Local 1428 at the invitation of Dick Sampson, president of Local 1428, who was present at the scene (Tr. 576, 780).[10]

About 30 of Midessa's employees went to the union hall that morning where they conferred with representatives of the Union. DeVilbiss testified that around 10 a.m. Union Representative Al Spring telephone him and said he had approximately 30 of Midessa's employees there (Tr. 282, 952). DeVilbiss replied that if it was after 10 a.m. Spring did not have any employees of Midessa (Tr. 282). Spring replied that the NLRB might take a different view. He then informed DeVilbiss that he had advised the employees to return to work, and that the employees had elected a negotiating committee of about seven employees plus two union representatives to meet with DeVilbiss to negotiate. DeVilbiss at first rejected the request to meet, but then told Spring that he would think about it and call him back (Tr. 283, 953). Later that day, around 1 to 1:30 p.m., DeVilbiss called Spring back and told him that there would be no meeting, but that the men could pick up their paychecks at 2 p.m. (Tr. 283).

Still later on January 25 DeVilbiss, as he testified (Tr. 284, 953), received the following mailgram from Spring (G.C. Exh. 3):

> PER OUR TELEPHONE CONVERSATION 10:15 AM TUESDAY, JANUARY 25, 1983, BE ADVISED THAT A MAJORITY OF YOUR EMPLOYEES HAVE DESIGNED [DESIGNATED] CARPENTERS LOCAL UNION 1428, UNITED BROTHERHOOD OF CARPENTERS AND JOINERS OF AMERICA AFL–CIO AS THEIR BARGAINING REPRESENTATIVE IN MATTERS CONCERNING THEIR WAGES, HOURS OF WORK, AND WORKING CONDITIONS WHICH IS IN ACCORDANCE WITH THEIR

[8] At trial DeVilbiss, although declining to say that the strikers had been fired, stated that as of 10 a.m. the strikers no longer had jobs with Midessa, and that they were no longer his employees after 10 a.m. (Tr. 326, 327, 331–332).

[9] Ernesto Armendariz and Eliseo Ibarbo are named in par. 8, but not in the paycheck list. on the other hand, paychecks were issued to Abraham Hermiz, Tony Hermiz, and Thomas Donica, but their names are not included in par. 8.

[10] Gallegos testified that he saw Jim Purcell, business representative of Local 1428, as Purcell sat in his automobile in front of ClayDesta bank that morning (Tr. 576). The night before Gallegos had called the Union for advice (Tr. 576).

RIGHTS UNDER THE NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS ACT AS AMENDED.

THE UNION HAS ADVISED YOUR EMPLOYEES TO RETURN TO WORK IMMEDIATELY AT THE RATE OF WAGES THEY WERE RECEIVING PRIOR TO THE STOPPAGE AND THEY HAVE AGREED; PROVIDED THE COMPANY WILL AGREE TO MEET AND NEGOTIATE A COLLECTIVE BARGAINING AGREEMENT WITH THE UNION REPRESENTATIVES AND A COMMITTEE COMPRISED OF THE FOLLOWING MIDESSA CONSTRUCTION CO EMPLOYEES: TOM GALLEGOS, JIM POPE, SALVADOR MACHUCA, JOE GAITON, AND DAVID WILLIAMS.

THIS OFFER STANDS.

THE UNION CAN ADVISE ALL EMPLOYEES TO RETURN TO WORK BY 8 AM THURSDAY, JANUARY 27, 1983, PROVIDED YOU CAN AGREE TO MEET.

THE UNION AND COMMITTEE CAN MEET WEDNESDAY, JANUARY 26, 1983, on a two hour notice. your immediate reply is urgently requested.

Midessa did not respond to the mailgram. Respondent prepared the list of those to whom checks were issued (Tr. 954). The list contains the names of 25 individuals (R. Exh. 14). DeVilbiss testified that most of the group came to Midessa's office around 3 p.m. and picked up their paychecks (Tr. 954). As already noted, these 25 are substantially the same as the 24 employees the General Counsel names in complaint paragraph 8 as having been terminated by Respondent on January 25, 1983.[11]

Although the strikers were at the union hall they worked with Union Representative Al Spring in preparing an offer to return to work. On Thursday, January 27, 1983, four members of the committee (Joe Gaiton, Thomas Gallegos, Salvador Machuca, and David Williams) hand delivered the written offer to Midessa by Gallegos, presenting it to Superintendent Beasley (Tr. 287, 352, 459, 672, 958). The handwritten offer, addressed to DeVilbiss and signed by 15 of the strikers, reads (G.C. Exh. 4):

> We the undersigned employees of Midessa Construction Co. unconditionally agree to return to work at the same classification and rate of pay we were receiving prior to the current dispute on January 25, 1983.

DeVilbiss testified that he was telephonically notified about the delivery of the offer and he gave instructions (to Beasley, apparently) that the strikers should fill out new employment applications. This was a means, DeVilbiss admits, of stalling for time until he could obtain legal counsel (Tr. 958–959).

Paragraph 7(d) of the complaint asserts that on or about January 27, 1983, Respondent, through Beasley, "orally stated that employees who were to be rehired had to fill out new applications and be reevaluated following their engaging in protected activity." The complaint alleges that Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act by such conduct. The parties stipulated to the factual accuracy of paragraph 7(d) of the complaint (Tr. 9–10). Midessa, noting that such conduct occurred before it obtained legal counsel, expressly declines to contest the allegation of a violation in this respect (Br. 9). Journeymen drywallers Tommy Gallegos and Ezequiel Mata confirmed the facts. Gallegos testified that when he presented the return-to-work offer to Beasley on January 27 Beasley informed him that he would have to reapply and he gave Gallegos a stack of applications. Beasley said that Midessa would reevaluate them and notify them at a later date whether they would return (Tr. 353). When Gallegos returned to the union hall, Union Representative Al Spring advised him to complete the application and submit it to Midessa. Gallegos and some others did so that very day. Mata credibly testified that when he returned around February 1, Beasley required him to fill out a new application (Tr. 163).

On Friday, January 28, 1983, DeVilbliss met with an attorney (Tr. 959). That meeting resulted in DeVilbiss sending the following letter, dated January 28, 1983, to all the individuals for whom checks had been issued on January 25 (Tr. 289, 959–960). The text of the letter reads (G.C. Exh. 5):

> On Tuesday, January 25, 1983, you were among the employees who engaged in a strike against the Company and failed to return to work when requested to do so. The newspaper accounts of this incident reported you were "fired" by the Company for engaging in such activity.
> I have reviewed this entire matter and understand that the National Labor Relations Act prohibits an employer from discharging employees who go on strike for higher wages or because of complaints over wage increases. In such cases, an employer can lawfully hire permanent replacements for the strikers but cannot "fire" them.
>
> The Company did hire replacements for many of the employees who failed to return to work last Tuesday. However, because of some of the things that were said, it may appear to you that you were actually fired for going on strike against us. That would be unlawful.
> It is not my intention to violate the law. I likewise do not want to give you or anyone the impression that you were "fired" for engaging in such activities. Accordingly, and to remove any doubt you or anyone else may have concerning this matter, we are offering you immediate and unconditional reinstatement to the job and pay rate you held on Tuesday, January 25, 1983. You should report to the foreman on the project where you were working at the normal starting time on the day following receipt of this letter.
> The issues that prompted this strike have been turned over to our lawyers. However, we want you to know that neither you nor any other employee will be disciplined or discharged for engaging in any conduct protected by the National Labor Rela> tions Act. We will comply with the law as we know you will.

[11] Complaint par. 8 does not list the names of Thomas Donica, Abraham Hermiz, or Tony Hermiz, but they are included among the names on R. Exh. 14. On the other hand, par. 8 also includes Ernesto Armendariz and Eliseo Ibarbo, but they are not named on R. Exh. 14. The reason for the difference regarding Armendariz and Ibarbo will be discussed shortly.

Midessa also notified as many of the strikers as it could to attend a meeting held at the company office on January 30 so that copies of the letters could be hand delivered. Gallegos testified that about 16 employees attended the meeting (Tr. 354). DeVilbiss testified that about one-half the group of 25 reported to work Monday, January 31, that most of the others returned Tuesday, February 1, and that there were a couple of others who came in a day or two later. All but five returned, he testified (Tr. 290). Although DeVilbiss testified that all the replacements who had been hired were laid off to accommodate the reinstatement of the strikers (Tr. 961), Job Foreman Marvin Brown, as we shall see later, identified at least three that he retained (Tr. 1049).

2. Other events during the strike

a. DeVilbiss' conversation with James Pope

James Pope was one of the strikers gathered outside the fence the morning of January 25. Pope recently had been demoted from his position as job foreman of the Dinero Plaza job, and he was displeased with that action. After DeVilbiss arrived, Pope asked how DeVilbiss was doing (Tr. 718). The latter, apparently surprised at the presence of Pope, concedes that he asked what Pope was doing there involved "in this." (Tr. 318.) Pope replied that he was upset over his demotion and the fact that his brother, striker Derrill Pope, had not received a pay raise. Counsel for the General Counsel argues that the question by DeVilbiss tends to be coercive and constitutes a violation of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act, as alleged in paragraph 7(a) of the complaint. I find that DeVilbiss' question was more in the nature of a surprise reaction on seeing his former job foreman. Pope initiated the conversation, DeVilbiss' question was not followed by any other remarks alleged to be coercive, and the circumstances fall short of showing that the bare question was violative of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.

On the other hand, the question by DeVilbiss will be considered and weighed when the issue of motivation is discussed later. This is so chiefly because there is other conduct by DeVilbiss, as discussed below.

b. Conduct by Max DeVilbiss and Joe Beasley

There remains other conduct to be considered in relation to complaint paragraph 7(a). On the morning of January 25 a few of the employees were concerned about the safety of their automobiles if they did not participate in the strike. These employees included Ernesto Armendariz, Eliseo Ibarbo, and Ezequiel Mata. There is a dispute in the record over whether they asked for or were given the day off. I resolve that particular point of contention later. The fact is that all three were among those going to the union hall on January 25. Each of the three returned to work the next day.

Before the strikers left for the union hall on January 25, Mata walked over to DeVilbiss, apparently to express concern about damage to his car if he remained. When Mata approached, DeVilbiss asked, "Mata, who started all this?" (Tr. 160.) Mata said he did not know. He expressed fear about the safety of his vehicle. DeVilbiss said that Mata could park it inside the fence, but Mata declined the offer on the basis that DeVilbiss could not guarantee the car's safety after work. As a witness, DeVilbiss did not deny that he had so questioned Mata. I find that such question, asking for the identity of the person or persons responsible for leading the walkout, tends to be coercive and violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act, as alleged in complaint paragraph 7(a).

The following day, January 26, Mata reported to DeVilbiss at the ClayDesta jobsite for the purpose of going to work or getting his job back.[12] Mata testified that on this occasion DeVilbiss asked whether Mata had gone to the union hall. When Mata replied in the affirmative, DeVilbiss stated (Tr. 163):

> Well I can't put you back to work Mata.

On cross-examination Mata repeated his testimony (Tr. 186, 188). Mata's pretrial affidavit apparently has no description of this conversation. Indeed, the affidavit apparently contains the following statement (Tr. 191):

> No supervisor ever talked to me personally about the walkout or about the union.

Mata testified that he did not think he had made such a statement to the Board agent, that he had reported the conversation to the Board agent and that, as he does not read much English, the Board agent read the affidavit to him (Tr. 191–192). The affidavit (R. Exh. 2) was not offered in evidence, and DeVilbiss did not address this subject in his testimony. Counsel for the General Counsel does not rely on this conversation in the brief. Nevertheless, the testimony is before me.

I observed the demeanor of Mata as he testified, and I observed that he testified in a persuasive fashion. Although Mata can read enough English to get by, such as with a job application, he is far from fluent in the language. Whatever the actual explanation for the mixup between Mata and the Board agent taking his pretrial statement, I credit the testimony given by Mata before me. Because there is no complaint allegation covering DeVilbiss' coercive statement, because Respondent did not seek to litigate the matter in its own case-in-chief, and as the General Counsel does not seek a finding of a violation on the fully litigated theory, I shall not find that Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) or (3) of the Act by the refusal of DeVilbiss to allow Mata to return to work on January 26, 1983. However, I shall consider this conduct when I evaluate the motivation issue discussed later.

In paragraph 7(b) of the complaint, the General Counsel alleges that Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act when Superintendent Joe Beasley "On or about January 26 . . . orally interrogated its employees regarding their union activities and threatened them with discharge should they be found to have engaged in such activities." The parties stipulated to the facts of this allegation (Tr. 9–10). The testimony of Ernesto Armendariz and Eliseo Ibarbo[13] reflects that this occurred when they returned to the jobsite on January 26. Armendariz testified that he asked Beasley about getting their (Armendariz and Ibarbo) jobs back. Beasley asked whether he had gone to the union hall the day before, and Armendariz replied that he had not (Tr. 92, 93). He was untruthful because he feared he would not get the job, which he needed to support his family (Tr. 116). Armendariz acted as the interpreter for Ibarbo, and it appears that Beasley either asked about both or Armendariz conveyed Ibarbo's statement that he also did not go to the union hall (Tr. 130, 146). Ibarbo was untruthful because, he testified, he has eight children to support (Tr. 146). DeVilbiss testified that Respondent regularly communicates with its employees, who cannot converse in English, by utilizing the services of their bilingual coworkers (Tr. 319–320). Job Foreman Marvin Brown confirmed that such was the standard method of communication (Tr. 1097–1098). In that situation, Respondent made the employee-interpreter its agent for such communication. Ibarbo's testimony, therefore, concerning what Superintendent Beasley conveyed to him through interpreter Armendariz, is not hearsay. Armendariz and Ibarbo were put to work and continued working until laid off on February 11, 1983. Mata was not given work until reinstated with the others on February 1, 1983.

[12] I need not decide whether Mata considered himself as returning to work after being granted a day off, or whether he was seeking to get his job back after deeming himself fired the day before.

Beasley was not a witness, and in light of the stipulation regarding the accuracy of paragraph 7(b) of the complaint (Tr. 9–10), Respondent does not contest that allegation. I therefore find that Respondent, by Beasley's conduct, violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act as alleged.

3. Conclusions regarding termination of the strikers

The General Counsel contends that Respondent fired the strikers, in fact, on January 25, 1983, and that Midessa violated Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act in so doing. Respondent argues that the total circumstances reflect that there is no violation because the strikers would have understood that DeVilbiss was simply informing them that they could be replaced if they did not return to work by 10 a.m. on January 25.[14] Indeed, Respondent points to elements of the testimony by which various strikers assert that they considered themselves as being on strike for 2 or 3 days. Others, however, testified that they considered themselves fired as of 10 a.m. on January 25.

I find that DeVilbiss in fact fired the strikers effective at 10 a.m. Tuesday, January 25, 1983, and that his words and actions reasonably conveyed such a message. As Respondent admittedly knew that the concerted walkout was to protest wages, it is clear that Respondent's threat to terminate the strikers violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act as did the actual discharge.[15]

But complaint paragraph 8 alleges that Respondent violated Section 8(a)(3) of the Act as well by terminating the strikers on January 25. That is a much closer question. So far as the record reflects, DeVilbiss became aware of the union aspect only when the employees stated they were going to the union hall. But this was only a moment before DeVilbiss set his 10 a.m. deadline. It is not clear that the deadline was related to the union issue rather than solely to the matter of setting a 10 a.m. deadline for a return to work or be terminated.

As any remedial order under Section 8(a)(3) would be cumulative, I shall dismiss the complaint to the extent it alleges a violation of Section 8(a)(3) of the Act by the January 25 termination of the strikers.

In citing and discussing Abilities & Goodwill, Inc., 241 NLRB 27 (1979), brief at 20, the General Counsel apparently seeks backpay for the discharged strikers from January 25 to 28, 1983. My recommended Order will include a provision to that effect.

D. Events Leading to Layoff of February 11, 1983

1. Allegation that Salvador Machuca was demoted

Paragraph 7(c) of the complaint alleges that Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act on or about January 27 when it, through Superintendent Beasley, "rehired an employee following his engaging in protected activity in a reduced classification."[16] Salvador Machuca is the subject of this allegation.

The General Counsel's allegation is grounded on the contention that Machuca was a leadman prior to the strike. Whether Machuca was in fact a leadman immediately before the strike commenced is a contested issue. Machuca testified that he was (Tr. 605, 649, 682), and Marvin Brown, job foreman at the ClayDesta Bank job, testified that Machuca was not.

According to Brown, Machuca had been a leadman until a layoff in December 1982. Before the layoff Brown had promoted Machuca to a leadman position when Brown had 44 men on the ClayDesta job.[17] Machuca joined Carlos Carrillo, already a leadman, in giving Brown a total of two leadmen on the job (Tr. 1043). As the layoff, shortly before Christmas 1982, reduced Brown's need for leadmen, he cut back by one. The one he reduced to journeyman status was Machuca (Tr. 1043, 1076). He apparently made this reduction, however, without informing Machuca.

The practical distinction between a leadman and a journeyman at Midessa is not great. Machuca testified that he received no extra pay as a leadman (Tr. 648).[18]

[13] Because Ibarbo does not speak English, he could only corroborate regarding events and what Armendariz said to him as interpreter.

[14] DeVilbiss admits that he "may have" told a newspaper reporter at the jobsite on January 25 that as far as he was concerned the striking employees were fired (Tr. 997).

[15] The threat to terminate, although not alleged, was litigated.

[16] The complaint does not allege that the demotion violated Section 8(a)(3) of the Act.

[17] Machuca testified that he was hired in late September 1982 (Tr. 601, 643), and promoted to leadman status in November, 2 months later (Tr. 603, 648).

[18] This may well be because Machuca already was receiving a foreman's rate of $13.63 per hour. Machuca was hired on that basis, but because there was no opening for a foreman he was assigned to work as a journeyman (Tr. 601, 643–645). Former foreman James Pope testified that his hourly rate as a foreman was $13.63, and that the journeyman's rate was $12.88 (Tr. 724, 746, 778).

Foreman Brown testified that a leadman works about 80 percent of the time with his tools and the other 20 percent conferring with his crew and with Brown (Tr. 1097). It also is clear that normally a leadman, unlike a journeyman, carries a 2-way radio so Brown can reach him from a distance.

Machuca testified that in the last days before the strike he had a radio and was functioning as a leadman (Tr. 604–605, 654–655).[19] I observed Machuca's demeanor. He testified in a convincing fashion, and I credit him. By contrast, Brown's demeanor was unconvincing, and I generally do not credit him.[20] I therefore find that when the strike began Machuca was functioning as a leadman and that Brown was aware of that fact.

It is undisputed that from his return on January 31 to his layoff on February 11, Machuca worked as a journeyman. Regardless of whether Brown needed a second leadman when the strikers returned, as Machuca was a leadman at the time of his discharge on January 25, Respondent had no choice but to reinstate him to that position if the position existed. Respondent failed to establish that conditions were changed on the return of the strikers. Brown testified that at the layoff of February 11 he was left with 18 hands after laying off 10 (Tr. 1090–1091), and that around February 1 leadman Carillo had a crew of 10 to 15 employees. Thus, essentially the same employee work force existed when the strikers returned as before they were fired. In these circumstances, Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act, as alleged in complaint paragraph 7(c), by demoting Machuca.[21]

There is no monetary remedy to be ordered. Moreover, it seems clear that Machuca would have been reduced to journeyman (although apparently retaining his $13.63 pay rate) even if the Respondent had retained him on February 11. The ClayDesta staff was cut way back, and it appears that Respondent's jobs overall were at a reduced level. A preferential return to leadman position would appear to be the only remedy, plus the usual notice, if it is found, that Machuca was improperly terminated on February 11, 1983.

2. Work rule allegations

a. Introduction

We recall from the discussion earlier that shortly before the walkout DeVilbiss had launched what may be described as a "lean" and "mean" program designed to avoid bankruptcy. The "lean" portion relates to layoffs, and that subject is discussed later. The other half pertains to a tighter enforcement of work rules.

Previously we saw that in late January 1983 DeVilbiss posted a letter at the jobsites complaining of poor quality and low productivity (R. Exh. 8). DeVilbiss directed his job foremen to turn things around. As we have seen, the walkout occurred the next morning.

Foreman Brown testified that DeVilbiss told him to get more quality, more production, and to cut dead weight (Tr. 1032). When the strikers returned, Superintendent Beasley told Brown to treat the strikers the same as the nonstrikers (Tr. 1041). According to Brown, some of the returning strikers exhibited an attitude suggesting that they felt they could not be laid off and did not have to produce (Tr. 1041). Brown concedes that he told each employee to pick up the pace, and to hurry up (Tr. 1041). He asserts, however, that he had said as much before the strike (Tr. 1061), and other witnesses attest to that.

Cecil Patterson was the foreman at Petro North. Patterson testified that in order to protect his own job he tightened up to stop employees taking more time than was permissible at breaks and lunch (Tr. 1006, 1015). The Petro North job was winding down in February 1983 and was close to completion (Tr. 1006).

b. Prohibition against union talk

Paragraph 7(f) of the complaint alleges that on or about February 1, Respondent, by Foreman Brown, "intimidated and threatened its employees by denying their right to discuss the Union upon threat of discharge." At 33–34 of their brief, the General Counsel moved to withdraw the allegation for lack of supporting evidence.

Tommy Gallegos testified that on February 1 Foreman Brown read a set of rules. He recalled that Brown said that if any employees were caught talking about the Union other than during breaks and at lunch that such employees would be terminated on the spot (Tr. 363, 491). Brown denies referring to this subject when he read the rules, but concedes that later that week he was told to tell the men, and did tell them, not to discuss the Union on worktime, but to carry on any such discussion before work, during breaks, at lunch, or after work (Tr. 1053–1054). Brown testified that during this period he observed people stopping work and congregating to have a discussion (Tr. 1054).

Gallegos testified that he was not aware that after the strikers returned employees stood around talking about the strike and union matters (Tr. 491). He also testified, on cross-examination, that Brown did not want employees "congregating around talking about the union or anything else" during worktime (Tr. 490).[22]

A rule that restricts only conversation related to unions is discriminatory and therefore unlawful. Olympia Plastics Corp., 266 NLRB 519 (1983); Liberty Nursing Homes, 245 NLRB 1194 (1979). None of Respondent's written work rules received in evidence seeks to govern the topics of employees' conversations during worktime (G.C. Exhs. 6, 7; R. Exhs. 1, 7), and no such unwritten [19] For over a week in early January Machuca worked on a job in Odessa, Texas. It is unclear whether on that job he functioned as a leadman, but that is a point I need not reach.

[20] This is not to overlook that regarding some matters, mostly when he is supported by documents or other credited testimony, I do credit Brown.

[21] The complaint does not allege that the demotion violated Sec. 8(a)(3).

[22] It appears that at this point Gallegos was describing his understanding of what Brown meant rather than what Brown expressly said, for moments later when Gallegos quoted Brown there was nothing about employees congregating and nothing about a prohibition on subjects other than the Union.

rule is described in the evidence.[23] As noted above, I interpret Gallegos' testimony that "Brown did not want" people congregating to be a description of Gallegos' understanding of what Brown meant. But Brown's actual words amounted to a gag rule on union talk at any time during worktime. That is far more extensive than a "no congregating" rule.

However, the complaint allegation goes beyond what Brown did say. In the absence of any evidence that Respondent sought to enforce the gag rule on the Union as a topic of worktime conversation, and because of the pending motion, I shall grant the General Counsel's motion to withdraw complaint paragraph 7(f).

c. Rules on productivity and breaks

(1) Production speed

Complaint paragraph 7(g) alleges that on or about February 1, 1983, Respondent, by Foreman Marvin Brown, "announced and thereafter disparately enforced its work rules relating to the amount of work to be performed and the length of break and lunch periods."

By February 1 most of the discharged strikers had returned to work. The General Counsel contends that from that point until the layoff of February 11 the former strikers were harassed about their production speed. The General Counsel, in its brief, points to testimony of certain strikers that before the strike there were no production quotas, but after the strike quotas were set. For example, Ernesto Armedariz testified that before the strike he normally would hang 50 to 60 sections of sheetrock a day when working on straight walls[24] and that he considers that number to be a good day's work (Tr. 81–82, 104). But after the strikers returned, Armendariz testified, he was told by Foreman Brown that he had to hang 75 sheets a day (Tr. 27–28). He did so by pushing himself under Brown's pressuring "hurry up" (Tr. 104). On achieving an output of 86 sheets the final day he hung straight walls, Armendariz proudly reported that fact to Brown. Foreman Brown responded (Tr. 38), "It is nothing now. You need to hang more."

Brown testified that he had crews hanging from 75 to 120 sheets a day (Tr. 1072, 1114). No employee from such crews testified. However, David Williams, who joined the strike and is named among those on the Union's proposed negotiating committee, testified that a two-man team could hang from 80 to 110 sheets a day (Tr. 887). Tommy Gallegos testified that 65 to 80 sheets would be a good day, and that while it is possible to hang 100, that achievement could not be sustained over any period of time (Tr. 413).

The General Counsel called C. J. Clifton as a rebuttal witness. At the time of his testimony on July 27, 1983, Clifton was the superintendent for Rose and Sons, Inc., the general contractor for the First State Tower[25] in Abilene, Texas. He testified that the job began in the late fall of 1982, that Midessa is the drywall subcontractor on the job, and that in the January-February 1983 period Midessa had about 15 employees on the job (Tr. 1128–1129). He further testified that in the Abilene area a good two-man drywall crew should hang 50 sheets a day on straight walls and that area firms find that pace to be economically feasible (Tr. 1131, 1137). Midessa's drywall crew on that job, Clifton testified, hangs about 30 to 40 sheets a day on straight walls, and about 20 sheets a day on core work (Tr. 1131, 1138). Clifton testified with a very convincing and impressive demeanor, and I credit him completely.

Of course, while crediting Clifton may assist in resolving credibility here, it does not necessarily establish that Midessa was unlawfully motivated in pushing for higher productivity after the strikers returned. It must be remembered that DeVilbiss posted his letter of January 24 before the strike. Indeed, so far as the record shows, it was DeVilbiss' letter that sparked the strike. The General Counsel makes no contention that Midessa's economic plight was an illusion. Therefore, DeVilbiss still had to address the factors of quality and speed of production when the strikers returned. The strike changed none of that.

(2) Reading of the rules

Midessa gives a set of company rules to each of its foremen. A copy of such rules and work policies, in evidence as General Exhibit 7, consists of six double-spaced pages. The document covers such matters as starting times, breaks, timesheets, hiring policies, terminations, equipment, material, safety, and change orders. Although many of the provisions would be of direct interest to the employees a few provisions might be of interest only to a foreman. DeVilbiss credibly testified that such rules and policies have been in effect at all times since their formulation in 1979 or 1980 (Tr. 303, 963). Section 2 pertains to breaks. Section 2.1 provides for a 10-minute break in the morning and another in the afternoon. "In no case will they be longer than 10 minutes." Section 2.2 allows 30 minutes for lunch, and it states that each employee should be back at his work station "at the end of the 30 minutes." Section 4.2 announces that Midessa hires on a "merit shop" basis and "employs both union and non-union members."

Under section 5.B1 foremen are to warn employees of rules infractions "in order to give the employee a chance to correct themselves." On repeated infractions, the foreman is to warn the employee that he is subject to dismissal. Section 5.B2 provides that if an employee is "not producing the quantity or quality of work required," the foreman will warn that employee that he is subject to dismissal or a drop in pay scale. Employees frequently tardy are to be warned, under section 5.B3, that they are "subject to dismissal."

[23] It can be presumed that employees at work occasionally are able to discuss the weather, sports, and other topics without stopping work and congregating.

[24] There is no dispute that a drywaller can hang more sheets working straight walls than when he must hang sheets in a stairwell or a bathroom ("core" work), which have frequent turns and cuts. Bathrooms particularly are slower because of the cuts a worker must make to accommodate the various fixtures.

[25] Clifton seemingly meant the First State Bank Tower, which DeVilbiss had earlier identified (Tr. 278). DeVilbiss himself served as the superintendent on that job (Tr. 298).

Until about late May Joe Alvarado worked for Midessa, sometimes as a foreman. The last period he worked as a foreman for Midessa was in August 1982. He testified that he read the rules to the employees about once or twice a month, whenever they became a little lazy or began taking advantage of the breaks (Tr. 1025).[26]

DeVilbiss testified that the rules were not enforced as they should have been or he would not have been required to issue a rules notice on August 10, 1982 (Tr. 303). There is very little question that around that date Midessa posted on its jobs, and distributed to all employees, a memo from DeVilbiss to all employees (Tr. 292, 963, 1030–1031):

TO ALL EMPLOYEES

It has come to my attention that many employees and foremen have been taking advantage of the morning and afternoon breaks. Due to this the following schedule for breaks and lunch will be strictly adhered to.

Morning Break—10:00 A.M. to 10:10 10 Minutes

Lunch Break—12:00 Noon to 12:30 P.M. 30 Minutes

Afternoon Break—2:30 P.M. to 2:40 P.M. 10 Minutes

Any person or crew taking a break or lunch at other times will be docked on their pay one hour. If the infraction continues then morning and afternoon breaks will be eliminated altogether.

To those who have adhered to the 10 minute break & 30 minute lunch I wish to thank you for your honesty, dedication and concern for the company. To those that have been abusing this privilege I admonish to get with the program.

Another practice which must stop is sending a man to a store to buy cokes and candy. This is all right if the store is close and the man is not gone for more than 10 minutes, otherwise bring what you want for break with you in the morning.

Max H. DeVilbiss

DeVilbiss testified that most of the prestrike job application also carried on the reverse side a summary of some of the rules (Tr. 291). The application of striker Jesse Dominguez is in evidence and it reflects this summary (G.C. Exh. 6). The same is true for striker Tommy Gallegos. Gallegos testified that he only filled out the front side and did not look at the reverse side and did not see the written rules (Tr. 421–423). However, to the left of Gallegos' signature on the obverse side of his June 2, 1981 application appears the following statement (R. Exh. 7):

I have read the rules and conditions on the back of this application and promise to abide by these and all other company rules.

Gallegos' protestation of ignorance of the presence of the rules on the reverse side of his application was singularly unconvincing, and I do not credit him on this point. Lest his surname mislead the reader to wonder whether Gallegos is not fully capable in English, I should note that Gallegos is quite the contrary. The son of an El Paso, Texas contractor, Gallegos made a very personable, intelligent, and articulate witness. In many respects, his demeanor seemed persuasive on the surface. But Gallegos can also be crafty. Thus, he was the General Counsel's source of a copy of the six-page set of company rules (G.C. Exh. 7). Although Gallegos, in a pretrial affidavit of February 14, 1983, told the investigating Board agent that he had obtained the set of rules by removing the copy posted on the toolroom shack (R. Exh. 10 at 4), he admitted on cross-examination that he had obtained the set from Anastacio Dominguez Jr., who told Gallegos he had stolen the copy (Tr. 483). He testified that he gave the incorrect version in his affidavit in order to protect Dominguez (Tr. 597). In effect, Gallegos concedes that he misrepresented the facts in his sworn pretrial statement given to a Board agent in order to protect another employee, but, he testified, he would not make a misrepresentation to protect his own interests (Tr. 599).

It might be said that the source of a set of the rules is not really a material point in the case, and that a lie by Gallegos concerning the process by which he obtained the set is a misrepresentation regarding an ancillary matter on which we should not dwell. What makes the matter important is not the relationship of the source to the allegations of the complaint, but the impact Gallegos' conduct has on his credibility. If Gallegos would lie in a statement sworn before a Board agent, even on an immaterial point, can I really trust him on the significant issues? Can I believe him when, in answer to Respondent's question, he testified that he would not misrepresent the facts to advance his own cause? Although Gallegos' pretrial prevarication may not rise to the level of an abuse of the Board's processes calling for some sanction, such as a denial of any remedial relief for him, it is a matter that adversely affects his general credibility.

Returning now to the rules contained on the reverse side of Gallegos' job application, I observe that they include, "If you do not turn out the quantity or quality of work expected of you, you may be dismissed, or your pay scale lowered." They also contain an underscored warning that any infraction "is cause for dismissal." Finally, and bearing on the expectation of the employees concerning a pay increase on January 1, 1983, the rules also include, "All employees are eligible for a raise on the 1st of January and the 1st of July. Raises are given on an individual basis and do not necessarily correspond to union scale."

Around November 1982 Midessa eliminated the breaks at Dinero Plaza because employees, in order to go to the first floor, were taking breaks of 20 minutes rather than 10. James Pope, who was the job foreman there at the time, testified that he eliminated the breaks on instruction from Superintendent Beasley (Tr. 752–753).

As the testimony reflects, before the strike, Foreman Brown was not strictly enforcing the rules pertaining to [26] I do not believe Alvarado read the entire six pages to his employees on these occasions. It is far more probable that he selected the rules pertaining to breaks and productivity and read them. Despite Alvarado's exaggeration on this point, I find him to be a generally credible witness.

breaks. On February 1 Brown read the Company's work rules and policies to the assembled employees at the ClayDesta job. Both strikers and nonstrikers were present. Although DeVilbiss testified that he did not tell Brown to read the rules (Tr. 962), Brown testified that he was told, by someone unnamed in the record, to read the rules (Tr. 1047). As DeVilbiss did not so instruct Brown, presumably it was Beasley. In any event, Brown read the rules.[27] Some of the employees became upset. Brown testified without contradiction that former striker Jesse Dominguez looked straight at him and stated, "We're going to make some rules of our own." (Tr. 1049, 1051) Brown wrote the comment on the timecard (R. Exh. 19) of Dominquez in order to alert the office of the matter (Tr. 1051, 1098).

(3) Conclusions

As DeVilbiss' crackdown letter of January 24 predated the strike, it is largely irrelevant to compare practices before and after the strike, for the General Counsel does not allege or contend that the tightening up policy was unlawfully motivated. It is alleged, however, that the rules were disparately enforced by Foreman Brown at ClayDesta against the returned strikers.[28]

Disparity is the key point. In support of the disparity allegation, the General Counsel points to the testimony of Ernesto Armendariz and Ezequiel Mata. Armendariz testified that on one occasion after the strike, when he had occasion to go to where some nonstrikers and replacements were working, he observed that Brown was not pushing them (Tr. 36–37). The testimony is rather vague, and the record unfortunately has an "inaudible" at a material point (Tr. 36).[29]

Mata described an occasion when nonstrikers Rick Daugherty,[30] David McKinney,[31] and two strike replacements took a break of over 15 minutes, and that Brown passed by and observed the fact but said nothing (Tr. 166–167, 207). Breaks are not staggered (Tr. 208). Although not specifically addressing the long break mentioned by Mata, Brown testified, without contradiction, that he did not discipline anyone during this period for exceeding the allowed time for breaks or lunch and that everyone "pretty well" complied with the rules (Tr. 1061).

On the other hand, Gallegos and his apprentice, Cuahtemoc "Temo" Anguiano, were docked 30 minutes' pay (by not being permitted to start working until a half-hour waiting period expired) because they were late for work by 1 minute 1 day after returning from the strike. It appears, however, that Respondent also docked employees before the strike for being late. Foreman Brown testified that it was his practice to require the tardy employee to wait until the nearest hour or half hour before they could clock in or begin work (Tr. 1056). David Williams, a member of the Union's proposed negotiating committee, but called as a witness by Respondent, testified that he was docked both before and after the strike for arriving for work 2 minutes' tardy (Tr. 896, 909–910). I do not credit Williams. His demeanor was such as to convey the distinct impression that he was seeking to advance his own cause with Respondent by testifying favorably to Midessa. He approached being hostile to the General Counsel, and he generally exhibited a highly unfavorable demeanor. I do not believe Williams on this or any disputed point. Moreover, it seems strange that Respondent did not offer any documentary payroll evidence to support Williams' story, yet it offered prestrike timecards of other employees on this general topic.

The General Counsel also observed that Respondent offered no evidence that it, too, read the rules to the nonstrikers and strike replacements during the days intervening between the beginning of the strike and the return of the strikers. Of course, not many workdays are involved. Discounting the Tuesday the strike began, there were only 3 workdays left before the discharged strikers began returning on Monday January 31, 1983. Brown testified that he had been told "several days" before February 1 that he would get a copy of the rules and to read them to the entire crew and answer any questions (Tr. 1047). Even if this instruction came to Brown on January 27 or 28, the record does not reflect when he received a copy of the rules.[32] In short, the timeframe here is too compressed to draw inferences regarding a failure to read the rules during the first 3 days after January 25.

In its brief Respondent does not address the testimony of C. J. Clifton, the general contractor's superintendent of the Abilene bank job. Why would Midessa be pushing employees at ClayDesta, even to the point of a callous rejection of Armendariz' prideful announcement that he had achieved 86 sheets, when DeVilbiss himself, as Midessa's job superintendent at Abilene, was content with his Abilene crew hanging a mere 30 to 40 sheets a day? Moreover, why would Beasley (if not DeVilbiss) instruct only the ClayDesta foreman to read the rules? Why were the rules not read at the other jobsites? These are interesting questions, but apparently they are immaterial.

The complaint alleges disparity by Respondent, through Brown. Foreman Brown was in charge of the ClayDesta project. There is some evidence to support an argument that Midessa aimed its resentment at ClayDesta [27] That evening Business Representative Jim Purcell of the Union sent Midessa a mailgram protesting Brown's reading of the rules as a coercive action violative of Sec. 8(a)(1) of the Act (R. Exh. 16).

[28] The allegation, quoted earlier, also attacks the announcement of the rules on February 1, 1983. This portion of the allegation appears to be based on the contention that the rules were read to the returned strikers only. As others besides strikers were present, I shall dismiss the announcement portion of complaint par. 7(g).

[29] Armendariz testified that "these people [inaudible] all the time, so Marvin and that tells them nothing, and they—so—but I never saw him push the others, you know, the few guys." Arguably Armendariz testified that the others were loafing, or some similar word, in the presence of Brown, but that is not certain. On cross-examination, he testified that he did not know whether Brown was pushing the other (nonstrikers and replacements) employees (Tr. 109).

[30] Foreman Brown testified that Rick Daugherty and Ron Daugherty are two names for the same person (Tr. 1039).

[31] Although Mata said "McKenzie," it appears he was referring to McKinney, who apparently worked with Daugherty. Brown, for example, describing working with both the day the strike began (Tr. 1039).

[32] Although Brown ostensibly received a set when he became a foreman, that does not necessarily mean he still had the copy in late January.

because most of the leaders of the January walkout and the union movement worked at ClayDesta. However, the weight of the evidence favors a finding, which I make, that Foreman Brown acted in accordance with his understanding of the instructions to read the rules to his crew and to turn things around on the matters of quality and productivity. Evidence of disparity regarding more leniency on breaks favoring nonstrikers is only slight. As discussed later, the General Counsel failed to show any disparity regarding the new productivity standards, such as hanging at least 75 sheets of sheetrock a day. I therefore shall dismiss complaint paragraph 7g.

E. The February 11, 1983 Layoff

1. Introduction

As amended at trial, paragraph 10, in conjunction with paragraph 11 of the complaint, alleges that Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act by terminating the following 12 named employees on February 11, 1983, because they participated in the January 25 strike or because they assisted the Union:

Cuahtemoc Anguiano	Victor Leija
Ernesto Armendariz	Salvador Machuca
Anastacio Dominguez Jr.	Ezequiel Mata
Alvaro Fuentes	James Pope
Tommy Gallegos	Louis Rodriguez
Eliseo Ibarbo	Mike Tapia

The names of Armendariz and Ibarbo were added the first day of the hearing (Tr. 5–8). On resting their case-in-chief, the General Counsel moved to delete Tapia's name for lack of supporting evidence, and I granted the motion (Tr. 796–797). After Respondent opened its case-in-chief with three witnesses on Friday, June 10, the hearing was adjourned and resumed on Monday, July 28. On July 20 the General Counsel mailed her motion to reopen the General Counsel's case in order to adduce additional evidence regarding Dominguez, Fuentes, Leija, and Rodriguez and their inclusion in the layoff/-termination of February 11, 1983 (G.C. Exh. 8). Counsel expressed her intention to call three witnesses for about an hour or so of testimony (Tr. 862–863). Respondent opposed the motion on various grounds. As Respondent's counsel had not learned of the motion until the day before the resumption, and because Respondent's witnesses were present and ready to testify, and to avoid further delay, I denied the motion to reopen. However, the General Counsel was permitted to offer certain timecards in evidence, and to make an offer of proof regarding the testimony she expected to elicit regarding Dominguez, Fuentes, and Rodriguez (Tr. 871–878).[33] Finally, I denied Respondent's motion to dismiss paragraph 10 regarding certain individuals.

2. The jobs and employees affected

President DeVilbiss testified that Midessa had about 12 jobs operating in the Midland area in January–February 1983, employing about 100 drywallers. (Tr. 277, 281.)[34] He further testified that those jobs were "winding down," with the exception of Gulf and ClayDesta, during the period (Tr. 967, 100). Respondent laid off employees on February 11, 1983, because, DeVilbiss testified, (1) Midessa was experiencing a cash flow problem with attendant economic problems, and (2) Midessa was overstaffed by 15 to 20 employees (Tr. 339, 967, 1000). Foreman Brown testified that a layoff had been planned for Friday, January 28, but the strike intervened (Tr. 1083), and DeVilbiss testified that a layoff had been planned (Tr. 945, 951).

As the record reflects, it was normal for Respondent to have a layoff every few months. Salvador Machuca (Tr. 704, 706) and former Foreman James Pope (Tr. 771) testified that Midessa did not lay off by seniority. DeVilbiss testified that in a layoff Midessa seeks to release its "worst" work performers, and only if all else is equal will the senior person be retained (Tr. 305–306).[35] Leadman Salvador Machuca confirmed that in prior layoffs Foreman Marvin Brown had selected the employees who were not producing (the "worst" workers) for layoff (Tr. 633, 703–704). Former Foreman James Pope testified that the Company sought to retain the employees it felt were doing the best job (Tr. 770).

DeVilbiss described the procedure Midessa utilizes in selecting employees for layoff. First, each foreman makes a list of his worst producers. These lists go to Superintendent Beasley, who confers with each foreman before adding his approval, and then the lists come to DeVilbiss, who makes the final decision on the selection. Although DeVilbiss reserves the right to delete or add names to a list, he usually approves the list as submitted because Beasley and the foremen are the ones who have observed the performance of the workers (Tr. 333, 965, 1000).

DeVilbiss testified that Midessa compares and selects from its overall pool of employees, in layoffs rather than from each jobsite crew independently. If Respondent did not follow that procedure, it could end up retaining some hands who are not as productive as others being laid off from different jobs (Tr. 280–281). Presumably Superintendent Beasley coordinates the layoff selection to achieve the goal DeVilbiss described. When one job is winding down, but vacancies exist on other jobs, employees will be transferred to fill the vacancies, DeVilbiss testified. When there are no vacancies to accommodate transfers, then a layoff must occur (Tr. 280).

Respondent laid off 16 employees on February 11, 1983 (Tr. 281, 968). The General Counsel does not contend that the layoff itself was unlawfully motivated. Rather, the General Counsel argues that Respondent, in selecting the 16 to be laid off, acted unlawfully by select-[33] Earlier, counsel advised that her proposed evidence would not include the testimony of Leija because she could not locate him (Tr. 863).

[34] It appears from the record that DeVilbiss included laborers in the count of 100. Respondent was about finished with the one job it had in Odessa and had no employees there (Tr. 278, 280). Discussed earlier was the fact that Respondent was working on the First State Bank job in Abilene (Tr. 278, 298). C. J. Clifton, superintendent for the general contractor, testified that Midessa had about 15 employees on the job with, apparently, about 2 of that number hanging sheetrock (Tr. 1129, 1131).

[35] DeVilbiss testified that Midessa looks only to the last-hire date in determining seniority (Tr. 308).

ing from those who participated in the strike of January 25 or assisted the Union (Tr. 1143; Br. 39). Thus, the evidence does not develop how DeVilbiss determined that 16 employees had to be laid off.

Of the 16, 10 worked at ClayDesta (Tr. 282, 969, 973, 1090), and 2 each were laid off from Dinero Plaza (Tr. 282, 969), Petro North (Tr. 282, 979), and 401 Illinois (Tr. 969). Although the evidence reflects how Foreman Brown made his selections from ClayDesta, and Foreman Cecil Patterson at Petro North, there is no testimonial overview by DeVilbiss or Beasley[36] concerning comparisons, if any were made, between those laid off and those retained on all jobs. For that matter, the bulk of the evidence focuses on the individuals laid off, and there is but slight comparison with others retained on the same job, such as at ClayDesta. In this connection, the thrust of the General Counsel's case is that an unlawful motive is revealed by the high percentage of strikers among those laid off. That is, of 16 laid off, 12, or 75 percent, participated in the strike. An ancillary argument relies on the theory that as Respondent's reasons for selecting the individual employees do not withstand scrutiny, an unlawful motive may be inferred.

At this point it may be helpful to look at Respondent's jobs affected by the layoff. All the jobs were in Midland, Texas. The following chart is based on the description given by DeVilbiss.[37]

Job	Stage	Employees	Laid off
Griffin-Burnett	SC[38]	4	0
Clayjon	SC	2	0
401 Illinois	SC	10	2
Dinero Plaza	SC	20	2
Petro North	SC	20	2
Gulf Building		25	0
ClayDesta Bank		25	10
		106	16

As previously discussed, DeVilbiss testified that all the jobs were winding down with the exception of Gulf and ClayDesta (Tr. 967, 1000). Foreman Marvin Brown testified that after the strike he was seriously overstaffed at ClayDesta. According to Brown, this situation developed because (1) Midessa was catching up with the general contractor (Area Builders) and (2) several employees had been transferred to ClayDesta from other jobs (Tr. 1062). Brown testified that he therefore asked Superintendent Beasley when there was going to be a layoff because he could not keep his hands busy (Tr. 1062).

The evidence is conflicting. The record evidence reflects, and Brown concedes, that after the strike Brown continued pushing employees to "hurry up." Some employees dispute that Brown did much pushing before the strike. Witnesses from Area Builders, rather than testifying that Midessa was "catching up," described their concern with the slow progress of Midessa's employees. For example, Rod Black, the carpenter foreman for Area Builders, testified that after the strike he complained to Brown that the slow progress of Midessa's workers was starting to hold up Area Builders and that Brown said he was doing the best he could (Tr. 834–835, 840). DeVilbiss includes ClayDesta as one of his two jobs with a substantial amount of work remaining. Indeed, DeVilbiss testified that during the strike, employees were transferred from their jobs to bring ClayDesta "up to the previous strength to show the general contractor that we were doing what we needed to do" (Tr. 951). Yet Brown describes the ClayDesta job as needing a layoff of employees, and most of those laid off February 11 came from the ClayDesta job.

This brings us to the point of listing the names of the 16 employees actually laid off. The following chart may be helpful. Of the 16 employees named below, 4 are not named on the list of strikers DeVilbiss made checks for on January 25 (R. Exh. 14). The four are: Jorge Lozoya, Ramon Lozoya, Miguel Mendoza, and Jaime Lopez. The other 12 are named on Respondent's list of strikers. Actually, all or nearly all the 16 waited outside the gate the morning of January 25. For considering Respondent's motives, it is appropriate at this point to observe who, in Respondent's view, were strikers. Essentially they are those who failed to return to work at 10 a.m. on January 25. With the exception of Ernesto Armendariz and Eliseo Ibarbo, the General Counsel's list is the same. In the chart below, I therefore have labeled the 16 laid off as striker (S), nonstriker (NS), and status in question (Q). As we will soon see, I find below that Respondent in fact did not consider Armendariz and Ibarbo as strikers who went to the union hall and did not return to work at 10 a.m. on January 25. In Respondent's view, therefore, 62.5 percent, not 75 percent, of those laid off were strikers who had gone to the union hall and, I have found, were fired at 10 a.m. on January 25.

[36] Superintendent Beasley did not appear as a witness.

[37] DeVilbiss testified twice. He first was called as an adverse witness by the General Counsel, and he also testified during Respondent's case.

[38] Substantially complete. Foreman Cecil Patterson testified that Petro North was winding down at the time of the layoff (Tr. 1006). DeVilbiss intimated that there was still some work to be done there, but that Midessa had to hold off until certain other work, including windows, could be finished by other contractors (Tr. 992-993, 1000).

As we can see, the 16 constituted about 15 percent of Midessa's 106-man work force. Between February 11 and the time of the instant hearing, Midessa's business apparently languished in the doldrums. DeVilbiss testified that Midessa has not started many projects since February 11, and it employs very few men on the ones it has commenced (Tr. 976). When DeVilbiss testified on July 26, he explained that Midessa then had about 20 to 25 workers on its Midland jobs, with about half being drywallers and the other half laborers (Tr. 977). These 20 to 25 were working at Gulf and ClayDesta, with about 8 employees plus the foreman at ClayDesta and the balance at the Gulf Building.[43]

3. Selection of the 16

a. Petro North, Dinero Plaza, and 401 Illinois

DeVilbiss testified that he personally added James Pope's name to the layoff list (Tr. 333, 967–968, 1000). Not because of anything Pope did or failed to do as a journeyman but, DeVilbiss testified, because of the poor quality of work done on Dinero Plaza when Pope was foreman (Tr. 968). DeVilbiss testified that he had just received a severe "chewing-out" by Kenneth Key, the general contractor's foreman at Dinero, that very day over the mistakes at Dinero, that he therefore was angry, and on returning to his office he added Pope's name to the list. Although DeVilbiss no doubt did not then know that his loss on the Dinero job would reach the $100,000 he testimonially described (Tr. 939),[44] by February 11 it seems clear that he was reasonably aware that his loss would be very substantial.

Pope disputes the extent of his responsibility for the losses at Dinero. Although it is true that he was only one of four different foremen at Dinero, there is no dispute that Pope was demoted to journeyman before the strike. This apparently occurred in early January, for he testified that he was assigned to Petro North about 3 weeks before the strike (Tr. 746).

Prior to the meeting with Kenneth Key, DeVilbiss had received the letter from Ray Dunlap of Area Builders in which, as quoted earlier, the general contractor criticized Midessa's quality of work "and supervision" as being the "worst" Dunlap had ever seen by Midessa (R. Exh. 13).

I shall dismiss the complaint regarding James Pope.

Cecil Patterson, the foreman at Petro North at the February 11 layoff, testified that he placed the name of Louis Rodriguez on the layoff list because Rodriguez did work of poor quality (Tr. 1007–1010).[45] Former Foreman James Pope testified that apprentice Rodriguez, before the strike, was a good follower but would have to improve his skills to become a journeyman (Tr. 732). Such faint praise is a bit beside the point. Rodriguez did not testify. As discussed earlier, I denied counsel for the General Counsel's motion to reopen her case-in-chief so that Rodriguez and two others could testify.

In passing it should be recalled that the timecards and Midessa's list of strikers reflect that a least four strikers were from Petro North: Bill Leasure, Mario Matta, Kevin Nichols, and Dale Smith. Presumably they returned to Petro North on being recalled. They were not [39] As we have seen, Marvin Brown was the foreman at ClayDesta and Cecil Patterson at Petro North, and both testified. Timesheets in evidence reflect that in mid-February Tony Warrick was the foreman at 401 Illinois. The foreman for Dinero Plaza on February 11 apparently was Homer Gonzalez (Tr. 295, 986). Neither Warrick nor Gonzales testified.

[41] Although Mendoza's timesheet is not marked as to classification, his hourly pay rate of $8 is that of an apprentice (R. Exh. 17a).

[42] Although Ibarbo's last assignment was helping Ernesto Armendariz, Brown testified that Ibarbo is a journeyman (Tr. 1110).

[43] Foreman Brown's figure is a total 10 for ClayDesta (Tr. 1091).

[44] The final retainer check for the Dinero job was not released to Midessa until July 1983 (Tr. 999).

[45] Patterson testified that he also included the name of Mike Tapia, shown elsewhere in the record as having been laid off from Dinero Plaza. In any event, Tapia's name was deleted from the complaint (Tr. 797). Patterson gave specific examples of poor quality work by Rodriguez.

laid off on February 11.[46] I shall dismiss the complaint as to Louis Rodriguez.

There are no names to discuss regarding Dinero Plaza, for of the two laid off from there, Tapia's name has been deleted from the complaint and Miguel Mendoza was not a striker.

From 401 Illinois the Lozoya brothers, Jorge and Ramon, were laid off. As with Mendoza, they did not strike and are not named in the complaint.

b. ClayDesta Bank

(1) Preliminary

The ClayDesta Bank job bore the weight of the layoff (10 of 16). It also was the center of the strike activity, and 70 to 90 percent of the 10 laid off from ClayDesta had participated in the strike.[47]

Foreman Brown testified that he made a layoff list on which he placed the names of 10 employees, and that such layoff reduced his crew to about 18 (Tr. 1062, 1090–1091). According to Brown, he selected his lowest producers, and he retained those he felt wanted to work (Tr. 1090, 1092). He testified that about 5 of the 18 retained were laborers (Tr. 1122). Of the 18 retained, the evidence identifies only the following 10:

Name	Classification	Strike
Carlos Carrillo	Leadman[48] SR	[49]NS
Ron "Rick" Daugherty	J-SR	NS
Abraham Hermiz	L	S
Tony Hermiz	L	S
David McKinney	A-SR	NS
Norman McNeese	J-SR	R
Matt Richardson	SR	R
Jose Louis Sotelo	SR	NS
David Williams	J-S	S
Paul Young	A-SR	R

Although the testimony of Foreman Brown clearly suggests that he retained Thomas "Butch" Donica and Bill Gleason at ClayDesta (Tr. 1123), DeVilbiss identified their timecards showing that they were working at 401 Illinois the week of the layoff and reflecting that they were retained (Tr. 974). Gleason, a journeyman sheetrocker, and Donica, an apprentice sheetrocker who assisted Gleason, were both strikers. Apparently they were transferred to 401 Illinois the week of the layoff, for the preceding week they, according to Brown, returned to ClayDesta from the strike and worked slower than before. Brown testified that when he told Gleason and Donica that he needed at least 75 sheets, and preferably 100 sheets a day from them, they told him they were not paid enough money to produce that much work (Tr. 1087). Brown testified that after they observed that the teams of Ron Daugherty-Matt Richardson and Norman McNeese-Paul Young were installing between 100 and 115 sheets to their 45 to 65, Gleason and Donica began hanging 75 to 80 sheets a day (Tr. 1087–1088). Brown testified that Gleason and Donica were not laid off on February 11 (Tr. 1086).

The implication is that Gleason and Donica were retained because they increased their output to the 75 to 100 sheets Brown told them he needed. If Brown "retained" Gleason and Donica by transferring them before the layoff, he failed to express that in clear terms.

(2) Ernesto Armendariz and Eliseo Ibarbo

Ernesto Armendariz and Eliseo Ibarbo apparently tried to straddle the fence on January 25. Although desiring to uphold the strike, they needed to work. They, in fact, went with the group to the union hall on January 25. However, they returned to work on January 26.

I credit DeVilbiss and find that he gave Armendariz and Ibarbo the day of January 25 off from work. Just how this came about is immaterial, for I find that it was the understanding of DeVilbiss that the two wanted to work but were afraid their automobile would be damaged if they did. Neither Armendariz nor Ibarbo is named on the list of 25 strikers DeVilbiss issued checks to the afternoon of January 25 (R. Exh. 14). I therefore find that Respondent did not consider them to be strikers, and that it treated them as having been granted permission to take off work January 25, 1983.

Brown testified that he included Armendariz and Ibarbo on the layoff list because they were slow, hanging only 60 to 65 sheets a day even though both were journeymen (Tr. 1085).

Because of his superior demeanor, I credit Armendariz that he and Ibarbo improved under Brown's pushing so that they began hanging 75 sheets a day and even reached 86 sheets the last day they did such work (Tr. 28, 38). When Brown laid them off he told them, as he did the others, that work was slow. Those laid off were not told they were slow or that their work was otherwise unsatisfactory.

In contrast to Armendariz and Ibarbo, Bill Gleason and Thomas "Butch" Donica, whom Respondent named on its list of strikers (R. Exh. 14), were retained. Brown testified that they increased their productivity to 75 or 80 sheets a day (Tr. 1088). There is no evidence that any nonstrikers or replacements who were retained did less work than Armendariz and Ibarbo. And even if there were such disparity evidence, knowledge by Respondent of the visit by Armendariz and Ibarbo to the union hall on January 25 would have to be inferred, for there is no direct evidence that Midessa was aware of their visit there.

On these facts I shall dismiss the complaint allegations that Respondent unlawfully terminated Ernesto Armendariz and Eliseo Ibarbo on February 11, 1983.

[46] Of these four, only Nichols testified. Called as a witness by Respondent, apprentice Nichols testified that he was treated no differently after being recalled to Petro North (Tr. 921–922).

[47] There is a dispute concerning whether Ernesto Armendariz and Eliseo Ibarbo should be considered strikers or whether they asked for and received permission to take off work January 25. If they are counted as strikers, then 9 of the 10 laid off were strikers.

[48] SR: sheetrocker; J-SR: journeyman sheetrocker; A-SR: apprentice sheetrocker; L: laborer.

[49] S: striker; NS: nonstriker; R: strike replacement.

(3) Alvaro Fuentes and Victor Leija

Neither Alvaro Fuentes nor Victor Leija testified, and the General Counsel's evidence does not cover them. As earlier mentioned, I denied the General Counsel's motion to reopen her case to allow these two to testify.

Brown testified that he included the names of Alvaro Fuentes (Tr. 1083) and Victor Leija (Tr. 1081) on his layoff list. He testified that both worked slowly, and that he had planned to lay off Fuentes on Friday, January 28, but the strike intervened.

Fuentes is the fifth name on the list of strikers to whom Respondent issued checks on January 25. Leija is the 11th name on the list. The presence of their names on the list, however, does not demonstrate that they were unlawfully terminated on February 11, for there are about 10 others named on the list who also returned to work and who were not laid off on February 11.

I therefore shall dismiss the complaint allegations that Respondent unlawfully terminated Alvaro Fuentes and Victor Leija on February 11, 1983.

(4) Ezequiel Mata

Ezequiel Mata is the 25th and last name on Midessa's list of strikers (R. Exh. 14). Testifying at the trial, Mata acknowledged that he had been laid off by Midessa on three occasions prior to February 11, 1983 (Tr. 174–175). He testified that on February 11 Brown gave him two checks and told him work was slow and that he was being laid off because there was not enough work (Tr. 172). He also testified that he was never told that his work was too slow, and that he worked as fast after the strike as he had done before it (Tr. 172). He concedes, however, that after the strike Brown told him he wanted Mata and the others to hang 90 sheets a day (Tr. 166, 172, 206, 210). Mata said nothing because he considered this an impossible goal. He testified that on a good day he can hang 60 to 65 sheets on straight walls (Tr. 196). Former Foreman James Pope testified that Mata worked for him at one time at Dinero Plaza and that Mata is a "good worker" who "knows his job," and that Mata hustled (Tr. 731–732).

In its brief Respondent does not take issue with Mata's testimony that he worked as fast after the strike as before. It contends that Mata is a "plodder" who, when the job is running full, can be used as "filler" help, but when work gets slow he will be among the first to be laid off. Indeed, Respondent points to the fact that Meta admittedly had been laid off three times before this layoff in his 3 years of off and on work with Midessa. Respondent relies on the testimony of Foremen Cecil Patterson (Tr. 1011) and Marvin Brown (Tr. 1082) that Mata was not fast enough. Brown testified that Mata was neither fast nor slow, and that he "filled space" when Midessa needed to show (a general contractor) that it had a sufficient number of employees on the job (Tr. 1082–1083).[50] Patterson concedes that he and Mata, when Mata worked at Petro North, got into an argument and Mata called him some names (Tr. 1010, 1011). Based on that concession, particular care must be taken to weigh his testimony in light of the other evidence.

Actually, very little of Mata's time after the strike was spent hanging sheetrock on straight walls. Much of his time was spent on framing. The difficulty with evaluating Mata's case, as with most of the others, is that there is very little evidence for comparison. That is, who was retained and how did Mata compare with them? It is true that there is some evidence to support the General Counsel's argument that Respondent sought to punish the strikers and therefore imposed artifically high work standards in order to use their inability to meet them as an excuse to terminate the strikers. Statements by DeVilbiss and Beasley on January 26 that employees who went to the union hall on January 25 could not return to work certainly reflect animus. And Midessa's toleration of 30 or 40 sheets a day at the bank job in Abilene, Texas, arguably tends to reflect disparity.

Foreman Brown testified that there were nonstrikers and replacements hanging 100 or more sheets a day. Brown's demeanor generally was unpersuasive, and I do not believe him to the extent he suggests that such was being done as a daily average even on straight walls.

David Williams testified that he considered a good day's work to be 80 to 110 sheets a day (Tr. 887).[51] On the other hand, Williams testified with an unfavorable and unpersuasive demeanor. He also tended not to cooperate when being questioned by the General Counsel, even approaching the point of exhibiting hostility. Moreover, his testimony that installing sheetrock on RACO would take no longer than hanging sheetrock on the usual framing conflicts with the credible evidence (Tr. 888). It appears that much of the sheetrocking to be done in the lease area (tenant space) of the ClayDesta Bank building involved RACO.

Other witnesses credibly testified that RACO slows down the hanging process. Thus, Tommy Gallegos described it as a "drown out" process that he does not consider the same as sheetrocking straight walls (Tr. 411–412, 521). C. J. Clifton, job superintendent for Rose and Sons, Inc., in Abilene, Texas, so testified (Tr. 1130, 1136). DeVilbiss explained that RACO, an abbreviation for a Houston firm named Ragland Industries, consists of a suspended grid ceiling with metal tracks into which the sheetrock is slipped (Tr. 275–276). Clifton gave a similar explanation (Tr. 1137). Salvador Machuca explained that precut metal studs are inserted into the top and bottom tracks and screwed off (Tr. 612).[52] That constitutes the metal framing to which the sheetrock is screwed.

Machuca best described why sheetrocking on RACO slows one when he explained that the worker must measure each sheet and adjust its height to the RACO fram-

[50] Patterson explained that a general contractor sometimes wants to see more employees working on a job (Tr. 1019).

[51] Williams had not been at work for several days before January 25, and DeVilbiss considered him as having quit. Williams is not named on Respondent's list of strikers (R. Exh. 14). However, Williams did go to the union hall, was named to the Union's negotiating committee, and is named on the Union's telegram of January 25 to Midessa (G.C. Exh. 3). He was not laid off on February 11 and he testified he worked until being laid off around late May 1983 (Tr. 881).

[52] Photographs are in evidence of the RACO system (R. Exhs. 26, 27).

ing because the floor may be uneven (Tr. 614). If there is a high spot in the floor, and a sheet, cut the same size as the others, is installed over that high spot, that sheet will lift up the grid ceiling. Finally, to facilitate sliding the sheets into the RACO tracks, the drywaller must bevel the tops at a 45 degree angle (Tr. 614). By contrast, as Clifton testified, when the sheetrocking is installed on regular straight walls, the worker merely slaps the sheet to the wall and screws it tight (Tr. 1137). Williams did not mention the measuring process, and on cross-examination he conceded that he must bevel the sheetrock before installing it in the RACO system (Tr. 904).

Even though I find Brown and Williams to be generally unpersuasive based mainly on demeanor,[53] there still is some evidence, as Respondent observes at 41 of its brief, that a good day's work can consist of hanging at least 75 sheets a day. Thus, Salvador Machuca, a witness called by the General Counsel, testified that he and a good journeyman would average 80 sheets a day even though they might reach 100 on occasion (Tr. 611).[54] However, DeVilbiss testified that Midessa normally tries to team a journeyman with an apprentice (Tr. 316). Former Foreman James Pope appears to have testified that in hanging on straight walls only, a responsible figure would be at least 75 sheets for a journeyman with a helper (Tr. 775–777). The last sentence of his mid-February pretrial affidavit (R. Exh. 12) states, "75 would be a real good average."

Tommy Gallegos testified that although a figure of 100 sheets a day could be reached, it could not be sustained, and 65 to 80 sheets would constitute a good day's work (Tr. 413). This is in line with one of his pretrial affidavits, described shortly, in which Gallegos, apparently describing RACO, asserts that on a "good day" he could hang 100 to 110 sheets with a helper (R. Exh. 11 at 5). At another point Gallegos testified that 35 sheets would be a good half-day's work on RACO (Tr. 426). That computes to 70 sheets on RACO for a full day.

I also have considered the rebuttal testimony of C. J. Clifton that 50 sheets a day is a good day's work for a 2-man crew (Tr. 1131). Although Clifton testified with a very persuasive demeanor, it must not be overlooked that ostensibly Midessa needed to increase its productivity.[55] I note that DeVilbiss acknowledged telling the investigating Board agent that 50 sheets would be the standard average for a team (Tr. 338). Unfortunately, the testimony is uncertain concerning whether DeVilbiss was speaking of straight walls or an average for all types of work. His testimony can be interpreted in different ways. If he meant it as an average of all, both straight walls and core work (bathrooms and stairwells), then that would be consistent with Respondent's seeking an average of 75 or more sheets on straight walls on RACO. On the face of this record, an effort to push employees from an average of 50 to an average of 75 sheets on straight walls of RACO would be within the realm of the reasonably possible. However, the strikers, such as Ernesto Armendariz, when pushed hard by Brown, were hanging 75 to 85 sheets of RACO a day. As we see below in the discussion of Gallegos' work in the lease area, 75 sheets a day on RACO, as an average, apparently is not a number beyond the reasonably possible.

I find that the figure for a "good day's work," "that is, one of substantially high production, for a journeyman-apprentice team would be 75 to 80 sheets a day as a consistent average hanging on straight walls of RACO.[56] To the extent the testimony of Brown and Williams is inconsistent with this, I do not credit them. It is to be noted that with the possible exception of David Williams, none of the employees Brown referred to as hanging 100 to 115 sheets a day testified.

In light of all the record, it cannot be said that the General Counsel has demonstrated that Respondent discriminatorily selected Mata for layoff on February 11, 1983. I therefore shall dismiss that allegation regarding Ezequiel Mata.

(5) Thomas Gallegos and Cuahtemoc Anguiano

(a) Introduction

Journeyman Thomas B. Gallegos Jr.[57] and apprentices Cuahtemoc "Temo" Anguiano worked as a team. Both were strikers. Anguiano returned to work on January 31 and Gallegos returned on February 1. On February 11 Foreman Brown told them that they were being laid off because work was slow and that he would call them back later (Tr. 240–241, 410). Gallegos testified that he thought Brown's reason was a lie (Tr. 563). Although Brown said nothing to them on that occasion about their work being slow, poor, or otherwise unsatisfactory, Anguiano testified that on that February 11 he heard from someone, he could not recall from whom, that he was being laid off because he was working slowly, an accusation he rejected at the trial (Tr. 241). Gallegos testified that although there were rumors of an impending layoff, the rumors said nothing about poor productivity as the basis (Tr. 411). Indeed, Gallegos testified that it was mainly the identity of those selected for the layoff that surprised him; although he testified, the job had not peaked so as to call for a layoff at that time (Tr. 418–419).

Foreman Brown, while not addressing the subject of what reason he gave Gallegos or any of the employees on February 11, testified that he named Gallegos and Anguiano to the layoff list (Tr. 10630):

[53] This is not to overlook Williams' incredible testimony regarding the RACO, nor the fact that Brown's testimony is inconsistent with that of DeVilbiss in certain respects as previously noted.

[54] His testimony that two journeymen might possibly hang 200 sheets in 1 day is not of much value because he qualified that by saying it could only be for 1 day and would involve using fewer screws than normally required for proper installation (Tr. 637).

[55] Respondent did not offer any surrebuttal evidence showing why DeVilbiss would have Midessa pushing for at least 75 sheets a day in Midland while tolerating 30 to 40 a day in Abilene.

[56] There seems to be a clear difference between a "good day's" work and work done on a "good day" within the meaning of the testimony. With the first term the witnesses seemed to be referring to a good average, whereas with the latter they appear to have been describing days when they approached their highest production figures.

[57] Also referred to in the record as Tommy Gallegos.

> Because they did not work. What work they did was in bad shape. I had to send people to redo the work—take it down and start over.

As a witness, Brown principally criticized three specific projects Gallegos and Anguiano worked on (Tr. 1063–1075, 1020–1021):

> 1. Poor productivity in hanging sheetrock, and incorrectly cutting holes in the sheets for the electrical boxes, in a lease (tenant) area one morning.
> 2. Poor productivity in building two furrdowns 30 feet long on the east side of the bank building the week of the layoff.
> 3. Incorrectly installing some CH studs in the stairwell on the north side of the bank building on February 9, 10, and 11.

In addition to these principal items, Brown also testified that when Gallegos returned from the strike he assigned him back to the south side restrooms where Gallegos had been working before the strike. Brown testimonially complained that Gallegos seemed to take "forever" to sheetrock one of the restrooms after the strike (Tr. 1071).

(b) The restrooms

Before we begin a discussion of the principal work projects Brown criticized, a look at the initial assignment Brown made is in order. When Gallegos returned from the strike on Tuesday, February 1, 1983, Brown returned him to the south side restrooms. Returning on Tuesday, February 1, Gallegos was back 9 working days before being laid off at the end of the day on Friday, February 11.[58] Four days his first week back, and 5 days his second and final week. In his testimony on direct and cross-examination, Gallegos covered these 9 days in extensive detail. That recitation, a remarkable feat in itself, not only provides support for Gallegos' credibility, but also in conjunction with his two pretrial affidavits, contains certain discrepancies that Respondent argues destroy Gallegos' credibility.

Resolving credibility in this case is quite difficult. As earlier observed, Gallegos, personable, intelligent, and articulate, testified with a demeanor that had surface appeal. Anguiano testified through an interpreter and seemed sincere. The demeanor of Foreman Brown was very unfavorable and unpersuasive. On the other hand, although there are some discrepancies in Brown's testimony, there are numerous inconsistencies between Gallegos' testimony and his pretrial statements or the balance of the record. These include, as we have seen, the misrepresentation made by Gallegos to the investigating Board agent.[59] Naturally a witness must be granted a certain margin for minor errors in attempting to describe past events. The question to be resolved is whether the several discrepancies of Gallegos go beyond a reasonable margin as to number or significance.

Turning now to Tuesday, February 1, see that Gallegos agrees that he was assigned to the south side restrooms. Specifically, it was a fourth floor restroom. He worked there all day with Anguiano without finishing it (Tr. 360, 362, 475). Gallegos testified that the framing there was out of plumb and he pointed this out to Brown, who said he was going to fire the person responsible for it (Tr. 361, 489). Gallegos Anguiano had to reframe some of the area before they could begin sheetrocking.

On Wednesday, February 2, Anguiano had car trouble and did not arrive until noon (Tr. 234, 362, 494). Brown had Gallegos on assignments with Salvador Machuca other than the restrooms that morning.[60] After lunch Gallegos and Anguiano teamed up and again were assigned to the fourth floor restrooms (Tr. 377, 516). Gallegos testified in some detail concerning their having to go to the north end of the building to obtain the green liner board to be used, which they worked on installing the rest of the day (Tr. 378, 517–519).

The next morning, Thursday, February 3, Gallegos and Anguiano were assigned to install sheetrock in the lease area of the fifth floor. Their work there is discussed below in a separate section. After lunch, however, they were reassigned to the fourth floor restroom again (Tr. 382, 531–532).

On the morning of Friday, February 4, Gallegos-Anguiano were assigned to the same fourth floor restroom, where they worked until lunchtime (Tr. 382, 532). Around 1 p.m. Brown and Carrillo pulled Gallegos-Anguiano from their work in the restroom and assigned them to sheetrock a furrdown on the fifth floor (Tr. 383, 532–533). It developed that there was a construction misalignment between the bottom of the furrdown and the top of a window, so after about 30 minutes Gallegos and Anguiano were reassigned back to the fourth floor restroom where they worked the rest of the day (Tr. 385, 536).[61] At no time, Gallegos testified, did Brown complain about his work (Tr. 385).

In contrast to Brown's generalized criticism of the work by Gallegos-Anguiano, Gallegos testified in detail. Although there is some discrepancy between Gallegos and Machuca regarding the last hour and a half of that Wednesday morning, it is clear that Gallegos was not reassigned to the restrooms until after lunch, when Anguiano returned. As seen from the foregoing summary, Gallegos and Anguiano were frequently pulled off their work in the restrooms and reassigned elsewhere.

In light of the foregoing, and in view of Brown's unpersuasive demeanor, I do not credit Brown regarding his generalized criticism that the Gallegos-Anguiano [58] There is an issue concerning whether Gallegos was off sick 1 day about Wednesday, February 9, 1983, but that will be discussed later.

[59] The misrepresentation, pertaining to the source of a copy of Respondent's rules, was not about a substantive matter regarding Gallegos' case. Nevertheless, because it was made in a Board affidavit, the deliberate misrepresentation seems to assume an importance that exceeds its intrinsic materiality.

[60] The accounts of Gallegos and Machuca differ regarding the last part of the morning, but the significant point here is that Gallegos was not assigned to the restrooms the entire morning of February 2, 1983.

[61] There is more than one restroom on each floor. Anguiano credibly testified that they worked in three restrooms (Tr. 4049).

team was slow in the work the team did on the south side restrooms.

(c) The lease area

Respecting the fifth floor lease area (space of the bank tenants), Brown testified that during one half-day period the Gallegos-Anguiano team installed only 21 to 23 sheets. That would be "42 in a day" which, Brown testified, is not acceptable work productivity. According to Brown, during this same timeframe he had another two-man team on the fourth floor hanging 75 sheets a day, and two other groups on different floors doing identical work who were hanging 100 to 115 sheets a day. Moreover, not only were Gallegos-Arguiano working slowly, they ruined four to eight sheets by cutting 4 to 6 inch holes for the electric boxes rather than the required 2 to 3 inches (Tr. 1072). According to Brown, when he confronted Gallegos about the oversize cuts, Gallegos asserted that there was no problem because the person doing the taping and bedding would fix it.[62] Rather than having Gallegos install replacement sheets, Brown, testifying that he was at rope's end with the poor quality and speed of the Gallegos-Anguiano team, allegedly sent Norman McNesse to redo the work (Tr. 1073).[63]

Gallegos (Tr. 381, 526) and Anguiano (Tr. 226) place the number of sheets hung at approximately 35. They testified that the electrical power was off that morning until the 10 a.m. break.[64] Gallegos testified that during the power outage he precut 15 sheets for installing in the RACO system, and that after the morning break he and Anguiano precut an additional 20 sheets in the process of hanging about 35 sheets by noon (Tr. 380, 526). He explained on cross-examination that the 35 was not the equivalent of hanging 140 sheets in an 8-hour day (four 2-hour segments x 35 sheets because he had been able to precut 15 sheets during the power outage. Respondent, in its brief at 50, asserts that Gallegos either dragged his feet during the (alleged) morning power outage, or lied about the amount of work he did betwen 10:15 a.m. and noon. However, it appears that Gallegos was a minute late that morning and therefore had to wait 30 minutes before he could go on the clock, or to work (Tr. 378, 519, 522). The available worktime was therefore about an hour and a half before the 10 a.m. break.

Although Respondent points to Gallegos' testimony that 65 to 80 sheets would be a good day (Tr. 413), Gallegos apparently was describing regular straight wall work at that point, not hanging sheetrock in the RACO system. Elsewhere, however, Gallegos did testify that 35 sheets would be a good half day's work on RACO (Tr. 426). That would work out to be about 70 sheets a day on RACO. At page 5 of his supplemental pretrial affidavit of March 15, 1983, Gallegos asserts:

> On a good day I could hang 100–110 with a helper. It depends on the work assignment.

Although it is not entirely clear that Gallegos was there referring to 100–110 on RACO, he in fact had just finished describing other employees installing sheetrock on lease area walls with the RACO system (R. Exh. 11).

Anguiano denied that they ruined any sheets by cutting oversize holes for the electrical boxes (Tr. 254–255), and Gallegos testified that the holes he cut were correct fits and that no one ever said otherwise (Tr. 532). In fact, Gallegos testified, Brown and leadman Carlos Carrillo checked the work after lunch, and Brown declared it "okay" before they reassigned Gallegos-Anguiano back to the fourth floor restroom for the balance of the day (Tr. 382, 531–532).[65] As Gallegos was not called during the rebuttal stage, Brown's statement that Gallegos said the person doing taping and bedding would cover the extra gaps is only impliedly denied by Gallegos.

Because of Brown's unpersuasive demeanor, and the combined testimony of Gallegos and Anguiano, I do not accept the version given by Brown, and I credit the account by Gallegos and Anguiano.

(d) The two furrdowns

Gallegos testified that the morning of Tuesday, February 8, he and Anguiano were assigned to build two parallel furrdowns 30 feet in length at the east entrance to the bank building (Tr. 387, 537).[66] The testimony on this subject, covering many pages by several witnesses, is very conflicting. The basic dispute centers on (1) whether Gallegos and Anguiano had to take the time to finish building a scaffold, or whether one was already in place and (2) whether Gallegos and Anguiano took too long in building the furrdowns.

A significant subsidiary question is whether Gallegos was out sick on Wednesday, February 9. It is significant because it bears on the credibility of Gallegos, who testified that on that day his wife called to report his absence because of sickness (Tr. 405, 467, 555). On cross-examination he acknowledged that in his pretrial affidavit at 6, February 14, 1983, he reported working on February 9 (Tr. 469; R. Exh. 10). He then seemed undecided whether to assert that it was February 9 or 10 that he was out ill (Tr. 469–470). It is worthy of note that Anguiano never mentions Gallegos as having been absent. To compound the confusion, Gallegos thereafter testified that he was paid for the missed day through Midessa's oversight (Tr. 591). Such an oversight, of course, would explain why his timecard might not reflect any absence. Respondent never produced the timecard for that week.

It is clear that work on the two furrdowns stretched over the 3-day period of Tuesday, February 8, through Thursday, February 10, even without regard to the question whether Gallegos missed a day. This is not to say [62] Brown erroneously places this conversation "2 to 3 days before the layoff" (Tr. 1074). As we shall see, the last 4 days of the second week devoted to the two furrdowns and the stairwell. The lease area work clearly occurred in the first week that the strikers returned.

[63] Brown elsewhere named McNeese as one of the strike replacements he had not released when the strikers returned (Tr. 1049)

[64] Gallegos testified without contradiction that Ron "Rick" Daugherty informed Brown that the power was out (Tr. 523).

[65] Although Gallegos testified that he thought the reassignment was unusual (Tr. 531), it certainly was in keeping with all the switching Brown was making in Gallegos' assignments.

[66] On Monday, February 7, Gallegos and Anguiano worked 1 hour in a restroom on the fifth floor, and then enclosed an elevator mechanical room during the balance of the day (Tr. 386, 536).

that Gallegos and Anguiano worked the entire time on the furrdowns. Indeed, Gallegos testified that the weather was so cold, around 15 degrees Fahrenheit, on Tuesday, February 8, that he persuaded Brown/Carrillo to move Anguiano and himself inside, where they worked that afternoon enclosing windows on either the third or fourth floor (Tr. 389, 404, 550, 551, 553).

This brings us back to the two pretrial affidavits of Gallegos. The first affiddavit (R. Exh. 10) is dated February 14—just 3 days after the February 11 layoff. The supplemental affidavit is dated March 15 (R. Exh. 11). Although both statements refer to the cold weather on the furrdown job, neither refers to Gallegos as having been off work 1 day. At 6 of his February 14 affidavit, Gallegos states

> Prior to the walk out, when it was cold, the Company would send us home; even if it was in the 30 degrees. On [a date is crossed out at this point] 2/9 it may have been 15 degrees and we were required to work outside—on 40 feet of scaffolding. The scaffolding was frozen, due to the sleet and rain and there were no hand rails, no safety belts and wooden planks for metal foot rails. I requested a safety belt from Carlos Carrillo and he told me the belt was in more need at another job detail. I asked why we weren't being sent home and Marvin Brown told us that it was entirely up to Joe Beasley. After lunch I asked Brown for myself and my partner to be assigned some other work, as I thought it was dangerous working on the scaffolding. He sent us to the fourth floor to work—this is inside work. No one else was sent on the scaffolding. It was still freezing working on the fourth floor.

The supplemental affidavit, at 3, refers to the cold weather as being on "one of the days" they worked on the furrdown, but does specify that it was the date that Gallegos made a request for Anguiano and himself to be assigned inside because it was sleeting and the scaffold's walk boards were frozen. It states they were assigned to the third floor.

By Gallegos' count, he and Anguiano worked 1-1/2 on this assignment: the morning of Tuesday, February 8, finishing building the scaffolding and performing certain other odds and ends, and all day Thursday, February 9, building the two furrdowns. Gallegos concedes that they did not get the second one braced, but did get the first one built and braced and the second one built.

Rod Black was the carpenter foreman for Area Builders on the ClayDesta project. Called by Respondent as a witness, Black testified that when the strikers came back to work he complained to Brown about Midessa's slow production speed, and that Brown replied that he would get to it and was doing the best he could (Tr. 835, 840). Brown did not describe to Black what he considered the problem to be. Black testified that his laborers for Area Builders constructed a scaffold that was there for Midessa to use in building the furrdowns at the east entry to the bank (Tr. 835, 840, 848). He described the scaffold as being in three sections, 24 feet high (Tr. 835), and that the furrdowns were to be attached to the bottom of the third floor, some 28 feet above the ground floor (Tr. 843). He did not stand and watch the Midessa employees building the furrdowns, and he concedes that he does not know what kinds of problems they may have encountered in building the furrdowns (Tr. 841).

William Chandler Simonds worked on the ClayDesta project as a layout carpenter for Area Builders. After the strike, he testified, Simonds observed that Gallegos was working "quite slowly" in building the furrdown[67] and "was standing around a lot." (Tr. 813) Because Simonds needed Midessa to finish so the stucco workers and then the glaziers could do their work in the east entry, he kept coming back to check on Midessa's progress.

Simonds testified that the scaffolding, 8 feet in length, was already in place, did not have to be built, and would only have to be moved four times in the process of building the 30-foot curtain wall (Tr. 814, 815, 820).[68] Acknowledging that there were two curtain walls, or furrdowns, to be constructed (Tr. 815), Simonds expressly limited his estimate of construction time for the first furrdown to 1 day (Tr. 813, 823).[69] This presumes that the scaffolding was in place and ready to use. Simonds concedes that if Gallegos had to get his own materials that would add more time to his estimate of the necessary time (Tr. 821). Simonds admits that he has never built any curtain wall himself (Tr. 819).

Simonds asserts that it took Gallegos and his helper 3 days to do this 1-day job (Tr. 813, 820, 823). We know, of course, that Gallegos and Anguiano worked on both furrdowns, not just the one Simonds described in his testimony.

Simonds testified that about the second day of this work he complained to Brown that the workers were taking way too long (Tr. 813, 830). He did not recall whether he registered his complaint in the morning or afternoon. Brown, according to Simonds, replied, "Yeah, I know, but there is nothing that I can do about it." Either later that day or on the third day Simonds complained in stronger terms, but he received essentially the same answer from Brown (Tr. 830).[70] Simonds concedes that while he did not stand around observing the work for the 3 days, he was on the scene frequently enough to know that if the Gallegos-Arguiano team received any other job assignments during the furrdown job, such assignments could not have been for very long (Tr. 819-820).

Simonds explained that the slow work he observed consisted in Gallegos and Anguiano not working together. That is, "You would generally have one guy on the [67] Simonds expressly referred only to the one furrdown needing insulation to be scraped from the bottom of the third floor before installation (Tr. 815, 817, 818, 823).

---

[68] A certain wall is also known as a furrdown (Tr. 812).

[69] Thus, the two furrdowns would have taken roughly 2 days, or possibly slightly less than a full 2 days.

[70] Foreman Marvin Brown named only Rod Black as complaining to him and, Brown testified, he went and told Gallegos to hurry (Tr. 1065). Gallegos denies this (Tr. 406). Brown testified that he complained to Superintendent Beasley and requested permission to get rid of Gallegos and Anguiano because they had been "up there 3 days" and only had one (furrdown) halfway built. Beasley denied permission on the basis that Midessa first had to check with its lawyer (Tr. 1069).

floor either cutting things to length or whatever, turn the laser on or what have you, and the other guy doing whatever he needs to do, shooting up, screwing up, or whatever he is doing—working together so they can both be working at the same time." What Simonds observed, he testified, was one man working on the scaffold while the other watched (Tr. 831). Simonds apparently was not aware that Anguiano was not a journeyman, but an apprentice. Gallegos testified that it was very unusual to work nearly 30 feet up on a scaffold with only 2 employees (Tr. 556). In his supplemental pretrial affidavit of March 15, 1983, Gallegos explained that on such a high job there are normally two journeymen and a helper (R. Exh. 11 at 4). As Gallegos further explained there, the helper (Arguiano) operates the chop saw to cut the heavy gauge metal used and keeps the journeymen supplied with the pieces for the framing so that the journeymen do not have to come down from the scaffolding. Here the chop saw and materials were on the second floor level (Tr. 557). Moreover, Anguiano credibly testified that he did some of the installation work using the screw gun.

Elaborating on his description of slow progress, Simonds testified that he observed Gallegos and Anguiano standing around talking about nonwork matters as he walked by (Tr. 827). He then admitted that he does not understand Spanish and would not have understood a conversation in Spanish (Tr. 827).[71] However, Simonds then testified that they were not necessarily talking to each other when he walked by, for there were other employees there. Thus (Tr. 828):

> If I were to walk by and start talking to them, they would speak to me in English. If another person who didn't speak Spanish [came by] and they were wanting to converse on some subject, they would speak in English. [Emphasis added.]

Simonds followed this by testifying that on occasion he stopped to talk with them to see how the work was progressing and what problems they were having (Tr. 828). He never described any specific problems at the trial. It is difficult to believe that had Simonds asked Gallegos about any problems,[72] the latter would not have mentioned the severe cold weather at the very least. Anguiano testified that it took them longer than normal on the job because of, in part, the fact that the weather was so cold it hurt his hands and he could not hold the screw gun (Tr. 132, 252, 269). As we already have seen, Gallegos testified that it was so cold on that first day (Tuesday, February 8) that he requested Brown/Carrillo to reassign Anguiano and himself to work inside.[73] In his pretrial affidavit of February 14, 1983, Gallegos estimated the temperature that first day of the furrdown assignment to be about 15 degrees. His request was granted.

Finally, Simonds testified that after he, Simonds, placed the marks for locating the curtain walls, it was Gallegos who used a laser beam device to set the marks for drawing the chalk lines they would make and follow (Tr. 814, 818, 823). Yet David Williams testified that it was he who set line marks with the laser and did the layout of chalk lines for the furrdown in the east entrance (Tr. 891–892, 907–908). Aside from that testimony conflicting with Simonds' regarding Gallegos having used the laser, it also conflicts with Simonds' testimony that the laser would not be used until the stucco or blown insulation material had been scraped from the first beam and then the lines marked and chalked (Tr. 822).

Gallegos, indicating that someone had been there first with a laser to set pencil lines, testified that leadman Carlos Carillo set the chalk lines on the floor and aserted that he, Gallegos, set the chalk lines on the "deck" (bottom of the third floor) where the furrdowns were to be attached (Tr. 537–540, 550). It is quite possible that Gallegos used the laser device to match the lines on the deck with the chalk lines already on the floor.[74] Finally, it appears that the pencil lines were drawn by Simonds who testified that he made lines with either a pencil or soap stone, he could not recall which (Tr. 825).

Returning for the moment to the time estimate, we may recall that Simonds called the one furrdown a 1-day job. With two furrdowns, the job would take roughly 2 days, or a little less, even under Simonds' estimate. Foreman Brown testified that the job of building both furrdowns should have been completed in 4 to 6 hours (Tr. 1064–1065). That figure is based, he testified, on the scaffolding being in place and ready to use. And David Williams testified that he could do the job in a mere 2 to 3 hours (Tr. 890). I do not credit Williams. In his zeal to portray himself as a superfast worker, Williams reinforces the disbelief engendered by his unfavorable demeanor.

Respondent asserts in its brief at 51, that "Anguiano himself testified it should be a half day's work." (Tr. 251.) This overlooks the fact that Anguiano testified it took Gallegos and him 1-1/2–2 days to do the job because of (1) the severely cold weather, (2) they had to get off and on the scaffolding to get the necessary equipment and materials, and (3) they twice had to disassemble the scaffolding and move it, and even then they did not quite finish the work (Tr. 231, 252–253).

Although Brown testified that Gallegos and Anguiano worked 3 days on the project without finishing it (Tr. 1063, 1069, 1116), he acknowledged that in his pretrial affidavit, which he gave to the investigating Board agent, he said it took them 2 days (Tr. 1116).[75]

Preliminary Conclusions

Brown's March 14 pretrial version of 2 days matches not only Anguiano's recollection, but also that of Galle-

[71] Anguiano, it will be recalled, had to testify through an interpreter.

[72] Notwithstanding the "they" in his testimony, it is clear that Simonds never conversed with Anguiano beyond a smile and a hello. Simonds does not speak Spanish, and Gallegos would have had to speak for Anguiano in English.

[73] At 3 of his supplemental pretrial affidavit of 3–15–83, Gallegos asserts that everyone else was working on the inside (R. Exh. 11).

[74] I do not credit Williams regarding his testimony about setting lines here. His demeanor was generally unconvincing, and his testimony conflicts with both that of Gallegos and Simonds.

[75] He threw this difference off at trial with a flippant, "It took them actually 3 days, so I made them sound better than they were." The affidavit is dated 3–14–83 (Tr. 1117).

gos who testified, as earlier noted, to a day and a half.[76] One kink in Gallegos' line of testimony is his asserted absence on Wednesday, February 9 (which would have been the second day), and further complicating story that Respondent, through oversight, even paid him for the day of absence.

Another kink in Gallegos story line is the building of the scaffolding. According to Gallegos, he and Anguiano spent from early morning to 11 a.m. on (1) conferring with Carrillo about the layout lines; (2) searching for the extra parts needed for the scaffolding; and (3) building the rest of the scaffold. Gallegos never asserted there was no scaffolding there; it is just that it was incomplete.

Anguiano seemed to testify that the scaffolding did not have to be built, but had to be moved twice, with each move requiring 10 to 15 minutes (Tr. 231). On the other hand, Simonds, as we have seen, testified that the scaffold he referred to was 8 feet in length and therefore would have to be moved four times to cover the distance of the first 30-foot furrdown. Gallegos testified that not only he did he and Anguiano add a top section, but they also added three other sections—apparently lengthening the scaffolding (Tr. 542, 546–547). Although Gallegos' Testimony certainly is not a model of clarity, it dovetails with Anguiano's testimony, which I credit, that they moved the scaffolding only twice. Even this leaves open the question of whether they moved it once to reach the starting place, or whether they moved it twice from the starting point. That question probably cuts too fine. Anguiano was not examined closely regarding this point. He did testify that the scaffolding was long enough (Tr. 253).[77] Thus, it would appear that the 8-foot-long scaffold described by Simonds had been extended by Gallegos and Anguiano.

I am persuaded preliminarily that Simonds' faulty recollection of events is the product of the passage of time before he was called on to testify. Apparently unaided by having recorded in February or March his observation of the events in question, the details of those events appear to have eluded him by the time of trail. As for Brown, his demeanor was unfavorable, and I preliminarily do not credit him when he disputes Gallegos or Anguiano.

Arguably Gallegos and Anguiano worked on this project for 1-1/2 days, as they described. Whether Gallegos actually was absent on February 9, or February 8, or February 10 is immaterial. It is just possible that he was not absent at all, and he started the curtain wall project on Wednesday, February 9 rather than Tuesday, February 8. But I need not speculate if I credit them in their testimony that they worked only 1-1/2 days on the project.

When the severely cold weather is considered, along with the fact that Gallegos and Anguiano built most of two furrdowns, and not one, as well as assembling the additional scaffolding, it is quite clear that 1-1/2 was well within Simonds' estimate for roughly 2 days to build the two furrdowns (even without counting the scaffolding).

And even if Rod Black and Simonds complained to Brown about the progress, Brown would know that it was not any fault of Gallegos and Anguiano. Brown would know that it took time to build the balance of the scaffolding, and he would be aware that he had allowed Gallegos and Anguiano to join all other employees working inside on that bitterly cold first day. Even the second day was no doubt still cold. If, therefore, Simonds walked by on the second day and observed, he may very well have seen Gallegos standing on the ground—trying to get warm. Certainly the fact that Gallegos and Anguiano nearly completed both furrdowns on the second day would not have left them any time to be standing around loafing. Finally, Simonds described his visits to the east entry without any mention of the weather. One would think that he was describing a stroll on a delightful spring day, and that he found Gallegos and Anguiano enjoying the beautiful weather by standing around on the ground floor conversing (in English, no less) with whoever happened to be passing by.

Simonds appeared to be a sincere witness. It seems, however, that he was unsuccessful in attempting to recall on June 10 events that had occurred 4 months earlier.

(e) CH studs in the stairwell

In the stairwells at the ClayDesta Bank Building, Midessa installed liner board (a type of sheetrock) in what is called CH channel or studs. The studs are so called because in their double configuration the face of each end has one half shaped like a "C" while the other is in the form of an "H." (Tr. 266.) The liner board has a green water resistent covering (Tr. 270–271). At the trial Anguiano demonstrated how the liner board fits into the CH studs (Tr. 259–260). There is no dispute that the only method by which this material can be installed is by screwing one stud to the wall, then sliding the first end of the liner board into the track of that stud, then fitting the second stud over the remaining end of the liner board, and, finally, attaching the liner board and second stud to the walls with screws. If both studs were to be installed first, there is no way the liner board can be inserted. The only sequence is: stud, liner board, stud.

Brown, as noted, testified that one of the principal reasons he included Gallegos and Anguiano on the layoff list was because they incorrectly installed some CH studs in three floors of the north stairwell (Tr. 1065–1066). According to Brown, not only were the studs screwed off without the liner board being inserted, but the studs were even installed backwards (Tr. 1066).

Brown testified that Gallegos and Anguiano began the stairwell project about noon on the Wednesday before the layoff of Friday, February 11, and worked on it all day Thursday and Friday (Tr. 1067). In short, it was the last 2-1/2 days of the week of the layoff.[78]

[76] Gallegos also set the time at 1-1/2 days at 3 of his supplemental pretrial affidavit of 3–15–83 (R. Exh. 11).

[77] As the furrdowns were about 10 to 15 feet apart (Tr. 387), the scaffold had to be moved over to the second one (Tr. 269).

[78] Already, as we can see, there is a problem regarding time. The two furrdowns were built this same week. Brown testified the furrdowns took 3 days. Now the stairwell, in the same week, takes 2-1/2 days.

Asked when he discovered this, Brown testified that he discovered "shortly after they started" that the work was being done incorrectly (Tr. 1067). However, he thought he might learn a new trick on speeding things up, so he asked some other (unidentified) people to walk by and let him know what they thought. They reported that "they" had never seen the work done that way. Brown even confronted Gallegos, asking whether Gallegos had ever hung CH before. Gallegos responded that he was an interior mechanic and knew what he was doing and did not need Brown's advice. Brown said he did not think it would work that way. To this remark Gallegos, Brown testified, repeated his statement that he was an interior mechanic and knew what he was doing. Brown left and on Thursday (February 10) Brown brought Superintendent Beasley to the stairwell around 10 a.m. when Gallegos was two floors above. He showed the work to Beasley, who just shook his head. Brown told Beasley that the work would have to be redone, and asked permission to get rid of Gallegos and Anguiano because, "They are killing my payroll." Beasley said that the "lawyer" said Midessa had to keep them. Beasley said just to let it go, to let them keep going and "we will find out if we can get rid of them." (Tr. 1067–1070, 1074–1075). Brown testified that this was the first time Gallegos had been assigned to install CH studs on that job (Tr. 1121). Brown testified that on Monday, February 14 (after the Friday layoff) he assigned leadman Carlos Carrillo to correct the work (Tr. 1067, 1075).

In very brief testimony, Carrilo testified that he observed that on the second floor level on the north side the CH studs had been screwed "off" (meaning screwed in) backwards without liner board. Although Carrillo did not specify exactly when he saw this, other than that it was after the strike, nor assert that he corrected the problem, he did testify that it was Gallegos and Anguiano who had installed the studs (Tr. 805–806).

Carrillo's testimony is rather ambiguous concerning whether he observed Gallegos in the act of the installation process. The testmony is subject to the interpretation that Carrillo knew that Gallegos and Anguiano were working in the stairwell, or was so told, and when he went there (presumably on Monday, February 14) to correct the work he found it as he described and assumed that Gallegos and Anguiano had done it that way. Of course, his testimony can also be interpreted as meaning that he personally observed them installing the studs incorrectly.

Gallegos testified that on Friday, February 11, he and Anguiano were assigned by Carrillo to enclose the north stairwell using CH studs and 1-inch liner board; that they did this for five floors, going from the second through the sixth floors; and that it was done properly, with the liner board inside the CH studs (Tr. 406–408, 558–560). Anguiano also testified that they worked on this the day of the layoff, although he recalled that they worked on three floors (Tr. 258, 261).

Gallegos testified that he has performed this work for many years and he denied screwing off the CH studs without installing the liner board (Tr. 409, 559). Bringing the issue into sharp focus, Gallegos, in a straightforward fashion, testified that if he had screwed off (i.e., screwed in) the CH studs without the liner board, then it could not have been a mistake and it would have had to have been intentional on his part (Tr. 561). In short, if he did it that way, Gallegos admits that such would have been sabotage by him.

Anguiano testified that he was aware the liner board (which he knew as core board) could not be installed if the CH studs were both screwed in first (Tr. 260). That knowledge, plus his demonstrated assembly during cross-examination, shows that Anguiano could not have been mistaken either.[79] Anguiano denied that he installed the studs without the liner board (Tr. 261).[80]

Conclusions

Gallegos and Anguiano testified with a fully believable demeanor on this point, and Brown's demeanor was completely unfavorable. Moreover, Brown's entire account of this subject, aside from being delivered in an unbelievable manner, has no internal logic. He was totally unconvincing in his testimony that the same afternoon Gallegos and Anguiano started, Brown knew they were doing it wrong but did not correct them because he thought they might teach him a new trick. Yet Brown still knew it was wrong and that is why he supposedly brought Superintendent Beasley (who did not testify) over the next morning, showed him the work, and requested permission to "get rid of" Gallegos and Anguiano.[81] I am to believe that Foreman Brown knew on Wednesday that the work was being done wrong (and backwards at that), that Superintendent Beasley knew it by 10 a.m. on Thursday, February 10, yet neither of them instructed Gallegos and Anguiano to begin doing it correctly. That tale is unworthy of belief. Even if they wanted to check with Midessa's lawyer, one cannot imagine that Midessa would permit Gallegos to continue installing the material incorrectly. Brown's account would have had a more believable logic had Gallegos been ordered to change methods, or if Midessa had fired Gallegos on the spot. Midessa did neither.

But what of the testimony of Carrillo? As Respondent observes at 54 of its brief, Gallegos admitted that he and Carrillo were good friends in their working relationship both before and after the strike (Tr. 395). Carrillo never clearly testified that he saw Gallegos and Anguiano in the process of doing the incorrect installation. If he so intended to testify, then we have one more experienced leader walking away from work being done incorrectly. That story has no more logic or conviction coming from Carrillo than it does from Brown.

To the extent Carrillo testified that he really did not see what had occurred until he arrived at the second [79] Anguiano testified that leadman Carlos Carrillo showed him how to asemble the CH studs and liner board (Tr. 259). He did not say whether this instruction was the day of the stairwell assignment or at some earlier time.

[80] Anguiano testified through an interpreter. At some points he had some difficulty understanding the precise question. However, he testified very clearly and credibly that he inserted the liner board inside the studs (Tr. 261).

[81] I draw the inference that had Superintendent Beasely testified, his testimony would not have supported Brown.

floor on Monday, February 14, to correct the problem on assignment by Brown, at which time he found the stairwell at the second floor level in the mess described, I do not credit him.[82] Brown's testimony is to the effect that Gallegos and Anguiano were allowed to continue on their merry way goofing up the entire stairwell (or at least the three floors Brown mentioned the assignment consisted of). Yet Carrillo strangely describes only the stairwell at the second level. Carrillo did not testify convincingly, and I do not credit him.

In light of the foregoing, I find that no problem existed with the stairwell work of Gallegos and Anguiano.

(f) Preliminary conclusions regarding Gallegos-Anguiano

At this point it would seem that Midessa, through Foreman Brown, placed the names of Gallegos and Anguiano on the February 11 layoff list to punish them, particularly Gallegos, for their union and other protected activities in violation of Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act. This is especially true regarding Gallegos, who was a principal leader in the activity by the employees. In light of the demonstrated union animus of both President DeVilbiss and Superintendent Beasley, it is immaterial that the General Counsel did not allege or prove any unlawful threats or interrogation by Foreman Brown. If Brown gave false reasons for selecting Gallegos-Anguiano for layoff, I may infer from such contrived pretexts that his motivation, and that of Respondent, was to get rid of Gallegos because of his union and other protected activities. It is well settled that when the asserted reasons for a discharge fail to withstand examination, the Board can infer that there is another reason—an unlawful one that the employer seeks to conceal—for the discharge. Louisiana Council No. 17, AFSCME, AFL-CIO, 250 NLRB 880, 886 fn. 38 (1980). As Anguiano was the apprentice assigned to Gallegos, Anguiano also was severed from employment as a natural consequence of the reasons Brown assigned for terminating Gallegos.

Although Respondent has not raised the point, consideration should be given to the fact that Gallegos admits that he made a false statement in a pretrial affidavit, which he gave to the investigating Board agent in conjunction with consideration of the remedy. In recommending a remedy here, should reinstatement and backpay be denied to Gallegos? I think not. The misrepresentation by Gallegos was on an ancillary matter pertaining to the source of a copy of Respondent's rules. It was not a misrepresentation of a material link in the chain of evidence necessary to establish a cause of action on his layoff. Stated differently, Gallegos did not mispresent in order to establish, by fraud, a cause of action by which he could persuade the Agency to order Respondent to pay him backpay or offer him reinstatement. His misrepresentation was made to protect another, not to obtain, by fraud, a gain for himself. I therefore find that his misrepresentation, while improper, does not constitute a sufficient basis for denying the usual public remedy of ordering Respondent to offer reinstatement with backpay.

(g) Salvador Machuca and Anastacio Dominguez Jr.

Foreman Marvin Brown testified that Salvador Machuca and Anastacio Dominguez Jr., worked together as a team (Tr. 1075, 1079).[83] Machuca testified he returned to work on February 1 (Tr. 616, 618). Brown testified that Machuca (and Dominguez) spent the entire 9 days from Tuesday, February 1, through Friday, February 11, framing the north penthouse, but did not finish the job (Tr. 1075, 1078–1081, 1108). According to Brown, he told Machuca (apparently on February 10) that Midessa was hurting and that Machuca was taking longer than the team of Carlos Carrillo and Louis Sotelo did on framing the (identical) south penthouse (Tr. 1081).[84]

Brown testified that Machuca and Anastacio Dominguez made a little more progress on February 10 and 11, "but they still never really picked up." (Tr. 1081.) He included them on the layoff list for taking so long on the penthouse (Tr. 1075). Before the strike, Brown testified, Machuca was a good, productive worker, and a leadman when there was a large crew, but he was not a good worker after he returned from the strike (Tr. 1076). Kevin Nichols, a striker and a witness called by Respondent, testified that after the strike Machuca still felt he was being paid unfairly (Tr. 923). Nichols, who worked at Petro North rather than at ClayDesta where Machuca was, never explained how he knew that this was Machuca's attitude after the strike. During the strike, such as when both were at the union hall, Nicols no doubt had an opportunity to hear Machuca express his opinion. It appears that Nichols actually was describing an opinion that he possibly heard during the strike rather than afterwards.

Machuca and Tommy Gallegos testified that on either February 1 or 2 Machuca, Dominguez, Gallegos, and leadman Carlos Carrillo spent most of the morning assembling a scaffold for a curtain wall they were to build.[85]

As we have seen, they could not proceed with the furrdown because of an alignment problem, so Brown took them to frame one of four penthouses, which Machuca described as the south penthouse (Tr. 622, 691).[86] The weather was cold and wet, the roof surface was frozen, and Brown and Machuca slipped and almost fell on the frozen surface. Brown soon decided that it was too cold for anyone to work there, so he sent them on different assignments. Machuca (and Dominguez) worked the balance of that day with Carrillo framing walls underneath windows on the fourth floor (Tr. 623–624, 629, 695).

[82] The General Counsel makes no contention that someone sabotaged the second level stairwell over the weekend to leave the appearance that Gallegos and Anguiano had done the work incorrectly.

[83] Known as "Junior" Dominguez (Tr. 650, 695), Anastacio Dominguez Jr., is not to be confused with his father, Jesse Dominguez.

[84] Brown testified that the Carrillo-Sotelo team not only framed the south penthouse, but also sheetrocked most of it, all in 5 days the week before the walkout (Tr. 1080, 1109).

[85] Machuca places the event on the 1st day of his return (Tr. 618, 687), whereas Gallegos, as already discussed, dated the event as February 2, the morning Anguiano did not come in because of car trouble.

[86] Tommy Gallegos, however, described it as the penthouse at the top of the west stairwell (Tr. 375, 508).

The second day (February 2, according to Machuca), and into the third, he and Dominquez were assigned to install double walls of sheetrock (one being the green covered weather board) in rest rooms (Tr. 624, 629). At one point Machuca recalled the time spent on the restrooms as being 2 or 2-1/2 days (Tr. 696). In any event it is clear that the first 3 days Machuca was back he and Dominguez worked on assignments other than the penthouse. Machuca testified with a persuasive demeanor.

Machuca testified that his next assignment was to frame and sheetrock a penthouse where he worked for 5 days (Tr. 624, 629, 696). He and Dominguez had not completed it by the time of their layoff (Tr. 702). He testified that under the prevailing conditions it would have taken the two of them a whole week, even more, to frame and sheetrock it (Tr. 696–697). The conditions included having to devote one entire afternoon to some special welding on a top track (Tr. 628, 698). About the third day of the penthouse work Brown came by and asked how they were doing. Machuca replied okay, and inquired why Brown had not sent Carrillo to check on the work. Brown, Machuca credibly testified, said he had faith in Machuca, knew that he could do the job, and that their work was "looking real good." (Tr. 628, 630).

There is no point outlining the work performed on the penthouse, for other than the welding mentioned, there is no showing that the framing work on the north penthouse was any different from that done on the south penthouse by Carrillo and Sotelo the week before the strike.

Preliminary Conclusions

Machuca testified with a convincing demeanor, but Brown did not. I therefore find that Machuca and Dominguez worked as many as 6 days on the north penthouse,[87] and not the 9 days Brown asserted. Brown's overstatement, I am convinced, was not the product of a faulty memory. Rather, I find that Brown deliberately overstated the penthouse time by some 50 percent to cast as unfavorable a light as possible on Machuca and Dominguez. Similarly, I find, he understated by 50 percent the time it took Carrillo and Sotelo to both frame and (nearly) sheetrock the south penthouse. Thus, I find that the actual time Carrillo and Sotelo worked on the south penthouse approximated 7-1/2 days—not 5 days. In that light, the 6 days spent by Machuca and Dominguez were well within reason. Indeed, Machuca credibly testified that on returning from the strike he worked even more diligently than before to avoid any suspicion that he would slack off after having been in the walkout (Tr. 635).

I find that Midessa's reasons regarding Machuca and Dominguez are pretexts contrived to justify laying off the previously highly regarded Machuca. The motive for this contrived action was to punish Machuca for his union and other protected activities. Dominguez was a victim of this illegal punishment. I therefore find that by terminating Machuca and Dominquez on February 11, 1983, Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act. Although Dominguez did not testify, he worked as a team with Machuca and they were laid off on that basis. His situation is therefore covered by the testimony of Machuca, Gallegos, and Brown.

Finally, it matters not that Respondent chose to terminate some, but not all, of the strikers. It is well settled that an employer need not discriminate against all union activists or supporters for the General Counsel to establish discriminatory intent regarding those terminated. Respondent has rebutted the showing of discriminatory intent as to Machuca and Dominguez. Nor has Respondent shown that they would not have been retained on February 11 in any event. Accordingly, it preliminarily appears Respondent must be ordered to offer them reinstatement.

F. Further Analysis and Conclusions

A question arises regarding the two furrdowns when comparing the testimony of Gallegos and Machuca.

Tuesday, February 8, 1983, is the date that Gallegos described as the first day on the east entry furrdowns. He testified that as late as noon the weather was so cold there was ice on the scaffold (Tr. 389, 550). At 6 of his pretrial affidavit of February 14, less than a week after the event, Gallegos was more specific. He asserted that the temperature was perhaps 15 degrees when they were working outside (R. Exh. 10).[88] Following lunch he successfully obtained a reassignment for Anguiano and himself to work inside the bank building. According to his supplemental affidavit of March 15, this left no one outside. Even inside, according to his affidavit of February 14, it was "still freezing."

Salvador Machuca worked all that second week framing the north penthouse on the roof. On February 8, Machuca testified, Brown came by and complimented the work (Tr. 630). Machuca described several problems that he and Dominguez encountered on that assignment, but he did not mention weather—yet he had mentioned it when describing the frozen condition of the roof on February 1, his first day back from the strike.

Strange. If, as described by Gallegos, it was about 15 degrees and sleeting downstairs on February 8, why would it not be at least that cold on the roof? Was it an oversight by Machuca in his testimony? Neither Brown nor William C. Simonds contradicted Gallegos regarding the conditions of subfreezing weather.[89] Perhaps weather reports would shed light on the matter. And there are weather reports.

[87] Although Machuca testified that he worked 5 days on the penthouse, the other workdays accounted for number about 3. That leaves approximately 1 day of work not described.

[88] As earlier discussed, he also placed the date as 2-9-83. Although completely clear in his affidavit, Gallegos did seem to be describing the first day of his assignment to the east entry location. At 3 of his supplemental affidavit of 3-15-83, Gallegos asserts that on "one of the days" he worked on the assignment it was sleeting (R. Exh. 11). His pretrial affidavits do not contain a day-by-day account as was given in his trial testimony.

[89] Simonds appeared to be a sincere witness. But in describing the occasions of his walking by where Gallegos was standing around, he impliedly was describing a balmy day. Apparently, I initially drafted, the passage of time had caused Simonds' memory to confuse dates and events.

The National Climatic Center of the U.S. Department of Commerce is located at Asheville, North Carolina.[90] Pursuant to FRE 201, 803(8), and 902(4), I take official notice of the following Climatological Data Reports (CDR), and I include them in the record as follows:

	January 1983 Vol. 88, No. 1	February 1983 Vol. 88, No. 2
Climatological Data, Texas, Vol. 88	ALJ Exhibit 1	ALJ Exhibit 2

Contemporaneous with my release of this decision, I shall mail copies of the foregoing documents, certified on their faces as official, to the parties' attorneys.

For the 2 weeks between the return of the strikers and the February 11 layoff, the following weather conditions prevailed, begining Monday, January 31 (skipping the weekend of February 5–6):

	Temperature
	1-31	2-1	2-2	2-3	2-4	2-7	2-8	2-9	2-10	2-11
Max	57	48	53	55	36	64	68	69	70	62
Min	35	34	31	26	32	26	34	39	36	36
Max	65	61	52	54	50	63	68	68	70	70
Min	40	32	31	25	30	27	35	41	36	38

The first set of figures (maximum and minimum across) is for the National Weather Service at the Midland-Odessa Airport (ALJ Exh. at 62). The second set was recorded at Gulf Refining Company, located 4 miles north by northeast of downtown Midland (ALJ Exh. 2 at 62, 67). The airport is midway between Midland and Odessa, or 10 miles west of downtown Midland. The ClayDesta project is on the near northside of Midland.

Precipitation
1-31	2-1	2-2	2-3	2-4	2-7	2-8	2-9	2-10	2-11

Once again, the first line of figures was recorded at the airport, and the second line at Gulf Refining Company.

We see, therefore, that on Tuesday, February 8, 1983, the morning hours would have been a bit cold at ClayDesta Bank on the near north side of downtown Midland. Although brisk wind would have made it seem colder (the wind chill factor), Gallegos made no reference to the wind. Accordingly, I presume that there was no more than a slight wind on these mornings. Even allowing some room to Gallegos for a margin of error, it seems that the temperature was more than double his 15 degrees even at 8 a.m., when he would have arrived for work. But after lunch, how can a temperature of at least 60 degrees be described as too cold to work outside? Sleeting? Even if there were a small shower over the ClayDesta project (while dry at both the airport on the west and at the Gulf Refinery on the east), the temperature was far too warm for ice to form on a scaffold. Indeed, the weather apparently was quite pleasant that afternoon. February 9 was even warmer in the morning, and on Thursday afternoon, February 10, the temperature reached a balmy 70 degrees.

The weather discrepancy is too large a difference to be considered a minor variance. Gallegos simply cannot be credited regarding the furrdown assignment. Although that fact does not serve to verify all of Brown's testimony on the subject, it is enough that Simonds now stands as a credible witness. Gallegos apparently worked February 9 on the furrdowns and the next day as well. Counting the first day of February 8, that totals 3 days. Simonds complained to Brown about Gallegos. The complaint of Respondent's chief customer complaining about the slow progress of Gallegos would constitute a legitimate ground for including Tommy Gallegos and "Temo" Anguiano in the layoff of February 11, 1983.

In view of all findings regarding Gallegos, it seems clear that the termination of the Gallegos-Anguiano team falls in the dual-motive category. Thus, one termination motive was the legitimate one based on the complaint of Area Builders. The other motive, as revealed by the pretexts involving the other grounds, was the illegal one of desiring to eliminate a union agitator from its payroll. It is now well established that in such a situation, Respondent had the burden of going forward with evidence showing that it would have selected Gallegos and Anguiano for layoff in any event because of the one legitimate ground notwithstanding the existence of the unlawful motive. This, Respondent failed to do. Accordingly, I shall order Respondent to reinstatement to Gallegos and Anguiano and to make them whole, with interest.

The weather reports also have a bearing on Machuca's case. Did the Carrillo-Sotelo team really do as much work on the south penthouse the week of January 17 as Foreman Brown described?[91] Perhaps the weather was warm and they were able to fly. But what if the weather was cold the week of January 17? Could they still have made that much progress? No witness said they did not nor could not have made such progress. But Brown did not testify with a persuasive demeanor.

The January CDR shows that the week of January 17 started mild, with the low around 40 and the high about 60 (ALJ Exh. 1 at 12). By midweek conditions became colder, and by Thursday morning the low temperature was at freezing, with the high from 42 to 46 degrees. On Friday, January 21, the low was about 28 and the high was between 32 (at the airport) and 38 (at the Gulf Refinery). It was slightly wet that week, with a trace of rain recorded at the airport on Monday and Tuesday, .74 on Thursday (but none recorded at the Gulf refinery), and .05 on Friday (but again none at the gulf refinery). Thus, weather conditions on the roof the last 2 days of that week were rather unpleasant—near freezing temperature readings and moisture in the air. A brisk wind would have made working conditions downright miserable.

The weather report does not support Foreman Brown. This is not to say that the Carrillo-Sotelo team could not have accomplished all the work attributed to them by Brown, but Brown was not a credible witness. Carrillo's testimony was limited to a specific item relating to work Gallegos allegedly did in the north stairwell, and Respondent successfully objected when the General Counsel sought to examine beyond the scope of the direct examination. As Sotelo was not a witness, neither Carrillo nor Sotelo testimonially described framing the south penthouse or how much they accomplished. I do not credit Brown; I do credit Machuca. I therefore find, in accordance with my preliminary conclusion outlined earlier, that Brown overestimated by 50 percent the time Machuca spent, and underestimated by an equal 50 percent the time Carrillo and Sotelo spent on the south penthouse. Brown did so, I find, for the unlawful purpose of eliminating Machuca and Dominguez from the payroll because of their union and other protected activities. This is particularly so regarding Machuca, who is acknowledged to have been a leadman when there were more employees on the job. I specifically do not credit Brown in his testimony that Machuca, admittedly a good employee before the strike, was not a good worker after the strike (Tr. 1076). Thus, I find that Brown valued Machuca's skills, ability, and performance at all times.

As also discussed earlier, Machuca credibly testified that on February 8 Foreman Brown told him that the work was looking "real good," and Machuca credibly denied that Brown complained about the progress (Tr. 630). Because of Machuca's superior demeanor, I credit him over Brown.

As previously noted, it is well settled that when the asserted reasons for a discharge fail to withstand examination, the Board can infer that there is another reason—an unlawful one, that the employer seeks to conceal—for the discharge. Louisiana Council No. 17, AFSCME, AFL-CIO, 250 NLRB 880, 886 fn. 38 (1980). As the reasons Foreman Brown gave for including Machuca on the layoff list have been determined to be false, I find that the true motive, which Respondent sought to conceal behind pretexts, was the unlawful one of terminating him because of his union and other protected activities. Dominguez, Machuca's working partner,[92] was terminated as a consequence of Brown's pretextual reasons for laying off Machuca.

In light of the foregoing, I shall order Respondent to offer reinstatement to Machuca and Dominguez and to make them whole, with interest.

Respecting the allegations I have dismissed, one final note should be made. As earlier noted, one of the General Counsel's principal contentions is that because the February 11 layoff "affected almost exclusively union adherents," that fact supports an inference of illegal motivation. Counsel for the General Counsel, at 45 of the brief, cites and relies on cases such as Camco, Inc., 140 NLRB 361 (1962), enfd. in pertinent part 340 F.2d 803 (5th Cir. 1965), for this proposition.

When the factual pattern is appropriate, the Camco rule is established authority for drawing the inference sought by the General Counsel in this case. The problem is that here the factual pattern does not appear to fall into the Camco category. In Camco 16 of 95 employees in one department attended a union meeting. Shortly thereafter, 11 of the 16 were terminated. Not one of the nonunion employees was terminated. Through such means as interrogation, Camco had identified the union adherents. Thus, of the 11 terminated, 100 percent were known union supporters. By contrast, 62.5 percent of the group terminated on February 11 were deemed by Midessa to be union supporters.

There are other differences between Camco and this case, but the percentage factor is perhaps the most prominent distinction. Where the percentage factor drops as low as 62.5 percent, it does not seem reasonable to say it is a great enough factor in itself to support an infer-

[91] As earlier noted, even though Machuca testified that as of February 1 the south penthouse remained unframed (Tr. 622, 691, 693), Gallegos described the penthouse they went to as the one on the west side (Tr. 375, 508). Such a disagreement between two key witnesses of the General Counsel leaves intact Brown's testimony that Carrillo-Sotelo framed a penthouse, and that it was the south penthouse.

[92] Brown testified that Dominguez also is a brother-in-law of Machuca (Tr. 1111).

ence of unlawful motivation. And in our case, the other factors usually considered, such as timing, reasons given for the terminations, comparisons with workers retained, and the like, do not seem to justify according much weight to the fact that over half those terminated were known by Midessa to be union supporters.

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. Respondent is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act.

2. Carpenters Local Union 1428 is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

3. By interrogating its employees about their union and other protected activities, by threatening employees with discharge for such activities, by discharging economic strikers on January 25, 1983, and by requiring such discharged strikers to fill out new applications and be reevaluated prior to being rehired around January 31, 1983, and by demoting Salvador Machuca on February 1, 1983, when it rehired him, Respondent has violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.

4. By terminating the below named employees on February 11, 1983, because they engaged in union or other protected activities, Respondent has violated Section 8(a)(3) and (1) of the Act:

Cuahtemoc Anguiano
Anastacio Dominguez, Jr.
Thomas B. Gallegos, Jr.
Salvador Machuca

REMEDY

Having found that Respondent has engaged in certain unfair labor practices, I shall order it to cease and desist and to take certain affirmative action designed to effectuate the policies of the Act.

Respondent shall be ordered to make whole the following 22 named employees by reason of its unlawful discharge of them on January 25, 1983, when they were engaging in a lawful economic strike:[93]

Cuahtemoc Anguiano	Ezequiel Mata
Avitio A. Carrillo	Mario Matta
Jesse R. Dominguez	Kevin Nichols
Anastacio Dominguez Jr.	Derrill Pope
Alvaro Fuentes	James Pope
Thomas B. Gallegos Jr.	Louis Rodriguez
Joe Gaitan	James Rowe
Bill Gleason	Dale Smith
Bill Leasure	Elivorio Soto
Victor Leija	Orvie Springs
Salvador Machuca	Mike Tapia

[93] The 22 names, plus those of E. Armendariz and E. Ibarbo, are listed in par. 8 of the complaint. Armendariz and Ibarbo are not entitled to any backpay because Respondent, I have found, treated them as having been granted time off from work on January 25, 1983.

Respondent's backpay obligation to them is limited to no more than 4 days, plus interest and any fringe benefits, such as medical expenses, they would have been entitled to receive during the period of January 25–28, 1983.

Respondent shall be ordered to offer immediate and full reinstatement to the below named employees to their former jobs, or, if those jobs no longer exist, to substantially equivalent positions[94] and to make them whole with interest, because of their unlawful termination on February 11, 1983.

Cuahtemoc Anguiano
Anastacio Dominguez, Jr.
Thomas B. Gallegos, Jr.
Salvador Machuca

Reinstatement is appropriately ordered notwithstanding there was no allegation that the layoff of February 11, 1983, was itself unlawful. The General Counsel proved that Respondent selected the four employees named above for layoff, and Respondent failed to show that the four would have been included in the layoff of February 11, 1983, in any event. Whether any or all four of the discriminatees would have been included in subsequent nondiscriminatory layoffs, that factor, relevant to both reinstatement and the amount of backpay, must be determined at the compliance stage.

In the event it is determined at the compliance stage that any or all four discriminatees would have been included in a subsequent economic layoff, then Respondent shall be ordered to place such discriminatee on a preferential hiring list to be the first employee rehired in his former or substantially equivalent position.

Backpay shall be computed in the manner established by the Board in F. W Woolworth Co., 90 NLRB 289 (1950), with interest calculated in the manner prescribed in Florida Steel Corp., 231 NLRB 651 (1977). See generally Isis Plumbing Co., 138 NLRB 716 (1962). Removal of any references to the terminations of both January 25, 1983, and regarding Gallegos, Anguiano, Machuca, and Dominguez, as to February 11, 1983, from personnel records shall be ordered in accordance with Sterling Sugars, 261 NLRB 472 (1982).

On these findings of fact and conclusions of law and on the entire record, I issue the following recommended[95]

ORDER

Respondent Midessa Construction Co., Midland, Texas, its officers, agent, successors, and assigns, shall

1. Cease and desist from

(a) Interrogating its employees concerning their union or other protected activities.

[94] The former position to which Salvador Machuca is to be reinstated is that of leadman if such position is in existence in light of the number of employees on Respondent's jobsites.

[95] If no exceptions are filed as provided by Sec. 102.46 of the Board's Rules and Regulations, the findings, conclusions, and recommended Order shall, as provided in Sec. 102.48 of the Rules, be adopted by the Board and all objections to them shall be deemed waived for all purposes.

(b) Threatening its employees with discharge if they engage in union activities.

(c) Discharging its employees who engage in an economic strike.

(d) Requiring discharged economic strikers to fill out new employment applications and be reevaluated on being recalled as if they were new employees.

(e) Demoting employees because they engage in union or other protected activities.

(f) Terminating employees because they engage in union or other protected activities.

2. Take the following affirmative action necessary to effectuate the policies of the Act.

(a) Make whole the employees named below, in the manner set forth in the remedy section of this decison.

Cuahtemoc Anguiano	Ezequiel Mata
Avitio A. Carrillo	Mario Matta
Jesse R. Dominguez	Kevin Nichols
Anastacio Dominquez Jr.	Derrill Pope
Alvaro Fuentes	James Pope
Thomas B. Gallegos Jr.	Louis Rodriquez
Joe Gaitan	James Rowe
Bill Gleason	Dale Smith
Bill Leasure	Elivorio Soto
Victor Leija	Orvie Springs
Salvador Machuca	Mike Tapia

(b) Offer the below named employees immediate and full reinstatement to their former positions of employment or, if such positions no longer exist, to substantially equivalent positions or, if no work is available or if any of the below named employees would have been included in any subsequent layoffs, then establish a preferential hiring list for the employee or employers and reinstate him or them from that list, before hiring or recalling other, when Respondent resumes hiring, without prejudice to their seniority or other rights or privileges previously enjoyed.

Cuahtemoc Anguiano
Anastacio Dominguez, Jr.
Thomas B. Gallegos, Jr.
Salvador Machuca

(c) Make the employees named above in paragraph 2(b) whole for any loss of earnings or other benefits suffered as a result of their termination on February 11, 1983, in the manner set forth in the remedy section of the decision.

(d) Remove from its files any reference to the unlawful discharges and notify the employees in writing that this has been done and that the discharges will not be used against them in any way.

(e) Post at each of its Midland, Texas jobsites, and its personnel office, copies of the attached notice marked "Appendix."[96] Copies of the notice, on forms provided by the Regional Director for Region 16, after being signed by the Respondent's authorized representative, shall be posted by the Respondent immediately upon receipt and maintained for 60 consecutive days in conspicuous places including all places where notices to employees are customarily posted. Reasonable steps shall be taken by the Respondent to ensure that the notices are not altered, defaced, or covered by any other material.

(f) Notify the Regional Director in writing within 20 days from the date of this Order what steps the Respondent has taken to comply.

IT IS FURTHER RECOMMENDED that the complaint be dismissed insofar as it alleges violations of the Act not specifically found.

[96] If this Order is enforced by a judgment of a United States court of appeals, the words in the notice reading "Posted by Order of the National Labor Relations Board" shall read "Posted Pursuant to a Judgment of the United States Court of Appeals Enforcing an Order of the National Labor Relations Board."

Massachusetts Laborers' District Council, a/w Laborers' International Union of North America, AFL–CIO and J. F. White Contracting Company and International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, Local 103, AFL–CIO. Case 1–CD–826

DECISION AND DETERMINATION OF DISPUTE

BY MEMBERS JOHANSEN, BABSON, AND CRACRAFT

The charge in this Section 10(k) proceeding was filed January 20, 1988, by J. F. White Contracting Company (White), alleging that the Respondent, Massachusetts Laborers' District Council, a/w Laborers' International Union of North America, AFL–CIO (Laborers' District Council), violated Section 8(b)(4)(D) of the National Labor Relations Act by engaging in proscribed activity with an object of forcing White to assign certain work to employees it represents rather than to employees represented by International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, Local 103, AFL–CIO (Electrical Workers Local 103). The hearing was held February 9, 1988, before Hearing Officer Carol A. Sax.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board affirms the hearing officer's rulings, finding them free from prejudicial error. On the entire record, the Board makes the following findings.

I. JURISDICTION

White, a Massachusetts corporation, is engaged in a general contracting and construction business at its facility in Newton, Massachusetts, where it annually derives revenues in excess of $50,000 directly from sources located outside the Commonwealth of Massachusetts. The parties stipulate, and we find, that White is engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act and that Laborers' District Council and Electrical Workers Local 103 are labor organizations within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

II. THE DISPUTE

A. Background and Facts of Dispute

White is the general contractor for a track rehabilitation project for the Massachusetts Bay Transit Authority (MBTA) on mass transit tracks located in one of the underground tunnels. The MBTA contract with White specifies that work on the track renovation project can be performed only between the hours of 9:30 p.m. and 4:30 a.m. and that passenger service on the line cannot be disrupted by the renovation work. The project involves the upgrading of the track and the installation of concrete ducts or raceways immediately adjacent to the track to carry electrical cables that later will be pulled through these ducts. Normally, the process of putting down such ducts involves digging a trench, laying an electrical raceway (essentially a metal, fiberglass, or PVC pipe through which electrical wiring is eventually pulled), and covering it with raw concrete. This conventional method was rejected for this project because it would be impossible for the concrete to dry sufficiently overnight to withstand resumption of regular rail service the next day. White was required to use precast concrete surrounding cylindrical forms, which will eventually be utilized for power and communication cable adjacent to the track. The precast concrete is poured and hardened at an offsite manufacturing plant and transported to the job.

White has collective-bargaining agreements with both Laborers' District Council and Electrical Workers Local 103. White assigned all the work of laying the precast conduit to employees represented by Laborers' District Council.

On December 3, 1987, business agent for Electrical Workers Local 103, Don Berry, sent a letter of grievance to Philip Bonnano, president of White, under the subcontracting clause of the Electrical Workers contract with White, claiming that the work of handling the precast conrete duct was electrical work. After a subsequent conversation between Berry and Bonanno, Bonanno contacted Laborers' District Council Business Manager Paul McNally and informed him of Electrical Workers Local 103's claim to the work. McNally said he would not agree to a reassignment, and that Laborers' District Council would go on strike if a reassignment occurred.

On January 15, 1988, a hearing was held before the joint grievance committee of the National Electrical Contractor's Association. The committee found that White was in violation of its agreement by allowing the work to be performed by employees represented by Laborers' District Council and that White should cease and desist from violating the agreement. Laborers' District Council was not bound by this dispute resolution mechanism.

About January 18, 1988, Bonanno informed McNally of the award and asked if they could work something out. McNally told Bonanno that if he changed the work assignment, Laborers' District Council would not only strike and shut down the instant project, but would also shut down the rest of White's projects in Boston. As of the date of the hearing, White had not changed the work assignment.

B. Work in Dispute

The disputed work involves the handling and installation of precast enclosures for electrical conduit (duct banks/electrical raceways) at the Massachusetts Bay Transit Authority construction project adjacent to Auditorium Station in Boston, Massachusetts.

C. Contentions of the Parties

White contends that Laborers' District Council violated Section 8(b)(4)(D) of the Act by its January 18, 1988 threat to strike all White's projects. White and Laborers' District Council further contends that the disputed work should be awarded to employees represented by Laborers' District Council on the basis of their collective-bargaining agreement, White's preference and past practice, area practice, economy and efficiency, and relative skills and safety.

Electrical Workers Local 103 filed a motion to quash the notice of hearing and dismiss the case, contending that the precast duct banks are electrical conduit and that laying electrical conduit is work that should be assigned to employees it represents under the relevant collective-bargaining agreement and under historical practice. It further contends that there is no reasonable cause to believe that Section 8(b)(4)(D) has been violated. Electrical Workers Local 103 contends that a jurisdictional dispute does not exist and that it is simply seeking to enforce the provisions of its collective-bargaining agreement.

No party contends that there is an alternative method to voluntarily resolve the dispute that binds all parties.

D. Applicability of the Statute

In a 10(k) proceeding, the Board must determine whether there is reasonable cause to believe that a violation of Section 8(b)(4)(D) has occurred and whether the parties have agreed on a method for the voluntary adjustment of the dispute. In this case, a finding of "reasonable cause" requires evidence that a party has used proscribed means to enforce its claim and that there are competing claims to disputed work between rival groups of employees.

It is undisputed that the business agent for Laborers' District Council threatened to shut down all of White's projects in the Boston area if White reassigned the work to employees represented by Electrical Workers Local 103. There is no agreed method for voluntary adjustment of the dispute within the meaning of Section 10(k) of the Act.

Electrical Workers Local 103 contends there was, in effect, "no threat" because White was going to maintain its "illegal" position in refusing to honor the arbitration award regardless of the threat. Local 103 also contends that there is no traditional jurisdictional dispute, but rather unilateral action by White in assigning the disputed work "to itself and not to its electrical sub-contractor's employees." In support of this contention, Electrical Workers Local 103 cites Teamsters Local 578 (USCP-Wesco), 280 NLRB 818 (1986), affd. 827 F.2d 581 (9th Cir. 1987).

We reject Electrical Workers Local 103's contention that there was no threat because the alleged threat had no influence on White's assignment of the work. The issue is not the actual effect on an employer's assignment of the work, but rather whether there is reasonable cause to believe that proscribed activity occurred. In this case the threat was clear and unequivocal.

We also reject Electrical Workers Local 103's contention that White's assigning the disputed work to its own employees rather than to its electrical subcontractor's employees brings this case within the type of situation contemplated in Teamsters Local 578 (USCP-Wesco), supra, and that the notice of hearing should therefore be quashed because the real nature of the dispute is contractual work preservation rather than jurisdictional. In Teamsters Local 578 (USCP-Wesco), the employer had a contract with only one union and sought to transfer work out of the unit and subcontract it to another employer. The Board concluded that the dispute was essentially between the union and the employer rather than between rival groups of employees. By contrast, this case presents a traditional 10(k) situation in which two unions have collective-bargaining agreements with White. Both unions claim that their respective agreements cover the same work. Consequently, we conclude that there are competing claims to the same work between rival groups of employees, and consequently, a traditional jurisdictional dispute.

We find that there is reasonable cause to believe that a violation of Section 8(b)(4)(D) has occurred, that there exists no agreed method for voluntary adjustment of the dispute within the meaning of Section 10(k) of the Act, and that Teamsters Local 578 (USCP-Wesco) does not apply to this situation. Accordingly, we find that the dispute is properly before the Board for determination.

E. Merits of the Dispute

Section 10(k) requires the Board to make an affirmative award of disputed work after considering various factors. NLRB v. Electrical Workers IBEW Local 1212 (Columbia Broadcasting), 364 U.S. 573 (1961). The Board has held that its determination in a jurisdictional dispute is an act of judgment based on common sense and experience, reached by balancing the factors involved in a particular case. Machinists Lodge 1743 (J. A. Jones Construction), 135 NLRB 1402 (1962).

The following factors are relevant in making the determination of this dispute.

1. Certifications and collective-bargaining agreements

No party claims that there are certifications applicable to the work in dispute.

The Laborers' District Council's collective-bargaining agreement clearly covers the disputed work. The contract lists precast concrete work, trench preparation and backfilling, and the setting of pipes and conduits in trenches as work to be performed by employees represented by Laborers' District Council.

Electrical Workers Local 103's collective-bargaining agreement speaks only of electrical work. Electrical Workers Local 103 admitted at the hearing that the agreement does not cover any of the related carrying, unhooking, trench excavation, and backfilling aspects of the job and, in fact, Electrical Workers Local 103 does not seek the assignment of these portions of the job. Moreover, even if the project were being performed with an ordinary wet concrete pour, the only possible involvement of electrical workers would be to place the conduit into the trench when the concrete was poured. In this instance that specific function of placing the conduit prior to the concrete pour was performed at the offsite precast concrete manufacturing plant and that phase of the process is not in dispute here.

Thus, as the work in dispute is not fairly considered electrical, and it is clearly covered by the Laborers' District Council's agreement, we find that this factor of collective-bargaining agreements favors an award of the disputed work to employees represented by Laborers' District Council.[1]

2. Company preference and past practice

The practice of White for at least 20 years has been to assign the work of excavating trenches and the placing of material such as pipe and conduit in trenches to employees represented by Laborers' District Council. Accordingly, this factor favors an award of the disputed work to employees represented by Laborers' District Council.

3. Area practice

Testimony presented at the hearing shows that the type of work involved in this dispute is identical to that traditionally assigned by other general contractors in the area to employees represented by Laborers' District Council. Bonanno testified that he knows of no instance in which his competitors used anyone but Laborers-represented employees to perform such work and that he often sees his competitors using the very same individuals. Accordingly, this factor favors an award of the disputed work to employees represented by Laborers' District Council.

4. Relative skills and safety

White is satisfied with the skills demonstrated by the employees represented by Laborers' District Council. Additionally, the work is being performed in a confined area involving the potentially hazardous hoisting and unloading of heavy precast concrete sections. In such a confined area, the unnecessary presence of two full crews would add to the congestion and to the potential for hazardous conditions. White presented testimony that there are hazards involved in the hoisting and setting of these concrete materials; the traditional electrical skills of the employees represented by Electrical Workers Local 103 would have no relevance. Accordingly, this factor favors an award of the disputed work to employees represented by Laborers' District Council.

5. Economy and efficiency of operation

The operation of bringing the precast materials into the tunnel, digging 100 feet of shallow trenching, placing the concrete materials, and backfilling the shallow trench involves no more than 30 to 60 minutes and the disputed part of the operations occupies only a few minutes. If White assigned the placing of the precast ducts to employees represented by Electrical Workers Local 103, White would have to pay them for a whole shift to do a few minutes' work, and White would still require the presence of a crew of employees represented by Laborers' District Council. Under White's present assignment, employees represented by Laborers' District Council perform all aspects of this operation, including the disputed work and perform other Laborers' tasks upon completion of that operation. Accordingly, economy and efficiency of operation favors awarding the disputed work to employees represented by Laborers' District Council.

[1] Member Johansen accepts the grievance committee's interpretation of the contract, finds both contracts cover the work and, therefore, concludes that this factor favors neither group.

Conclusions

After considering all the relevant factors, we conclude that employees represented by Laborers' District Council are entitled to perform the work in dispute. We reach this conclusion relying on the factors of collective-bargaining agreements, employer preference and past practice, area practice, economy and efficiency of operation, and relative skills and safety. In making this determination, we are awarding the work to employees represented by Laborers' District Council, not to that Union or its members. The determination is limited to the controversy that gave rise to this proceeding.

DETERMINATION OF DISPUTE

The National Labor Relations Board makes the following Determination of Dispute.

Employees of J. F. White Contracting Company represented by Massachusetts Laborers' District Council, a/w Laborers' International Union of North America, AFL–CIO are entitled to perform the handling and installation of precast enclosures for electrical conduit (duct banks/electrical raceways) at the Massachusetts Bay Transit Authority construction project adjacent to Auditorium Station in Boston, Massachusetts.

Livingstone College and Livingstone College Federation of Teachers and Librarians, AFT, AFL-CIO, Local 4110, Petitioner. Case 11-RC-4989

July 29, 1988

DECISION AND DIRECTION OF ELECTION

BY MEMBERS JOHANSEN, BABSON, AND CRACRAFT

Upon a petition filed under Section 9(c) of the National Labor Relations Act, a hearing was held on April 29 and 30, 1981, before Hearing Officer Jasper C. Brown Jr. Following the hearing and pursuant to Section 102.67 of the National Labor Relations Board Rules and Regulations, the Regional Director for Region 11 transferred the case to the Board for decision.[1]

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board affirms the hearing officer's rulings, finding them free from prejudicial error. On the entire record, the Board makes the following findings.

1. The Employer, Livingstone College, is engaged in commerce within the meaning of the Act and it will effectuate the policies of the Act to assert jurisdiction over it.

2. The Petitioner, Livingstone College Federation of Teachers and Librarians, AFT, AFL-CIO, Local 4110, is a labor organization seeking to represent certain employees of the Employer.

3. A question affecting commerce exists concerning the representation of employees of the Employer within the meaning of Section 9(c)(1) and Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

4. Livingstone College is a predominantly black, liberal arts institution of higher learning located in Salisbury, North Carolina. The College is made up of an undergraduate school, known as the School of Arts and Sciences, and a Graduate School of Theology, known as Hood Seminary, both of which are situated at the main campus in Salisbury. The College is divided into four divisions—Business Affairs, Student Affairs, Planning and Development, and Academic Affairs—each under a division head. Above the division heads is the president of Livingstone College, who is responsible for the daily operation of the school.

In addition to faculty and professional employees, Livingstone College employs numerous nonprofessional employees in various categories throughout its main campus (see attached appendix).[2] The Petitioner seeks to represent all the Employer's full-time, nonprofessional employees employed at the main campus,[3] excluding faculty, professional, and confidential employees, guards, and supervisors as defined in the Act.

The Employer contends that the unit of all nonprofessional employees sought by the Petitioner is inappropriate because it is composed of three main groups of employees—clerical/secretarial employees; buildings and grounds employees; and dormitory directors—which do not share a community of interest with each other and which constitute separate and distinct appropriate bargaining units. It further argues that the clerical/secretarial employees cannot, in any event, be included in the same unit with the buildings and grounds employees, but must instead be placed in a separate unit, in view of the Board's "long-established" policy of not including office clerical workers with other groups of employees, i.e., "manual" workers. Finally, the Employer claims that the petitioned-for unit includes employees who are, in its view, "technical" employees having no community of interest with the other employees in the unit sought, and who should be placed in a separate unit if the Board should direct that an election be held.[4]

[1] This matter was transferred to the Board for decision because the Board at the time was considering whether it had jurisdiction over this Employer in Livingstone College, Case 11-RC-4957, and the issue was once again being raised by the Employer in the instant case. On November 30, 1987, the Board issued a decision in Case 11-RC-4957 (286 NLRB 1308) finding, inter alia, that its assertion of jurisdiction over this Employer was proper and not prohibited by the Supreme Court's decision in NLRB v. Catholic Bishop of Chicago, 440 U.S. 490 (1979). In light of the holding in that case, we find no merit to the Employer's assertion here that the Board lacks jurisdiction over it.

[2] The appendix is a copy of P. Exh. 2 containing the names and job classifications of employees listed on the Employer's payroll during the time period relevant here. P. Exh. 2 was produced during the hearing by the Employer's business manager, Bobby Aldrich, pursuant to a stipulation of the parties. The list excludes those classified by the Employer as faculty, professional, or supervisory.

[3] The unit is described in the petition as consisting of secretaries, clerical staff, technicians, maintenance (or janitorial staff), and dormitory directors. However, it is clear from the record and its brief to the Board that the Petitioner seeks to represent a unit of all nonprofessional employees. Thus, the unit sought by the Petitioner would include the following employees listed in the appendix: clerical/secretarial employees; computer and keypunch operators; BEOG, NDSL, and workstudy coordinators; records clerk; keeper of records; laboratory assistant; dormitory directors; invoice auditors; cashier/accountant; admissions officer; bookstore/canteen manager; director/Learning Center; administrative assistant/development; Living Learning Centers coordinator; and buildings and grounds employees.

[4] The Employer thus contends that the 13 employees listed under "OTHERS" in the attached appendix, along with the BEOG and workstudy coordinators, the records clerk, and the laboratory assistant, are "technical" employees who should be excluded from any unit found appropriate. Of the 13 employees listed under "OTHERS," the Petitioner would include all but the following in the unit: payroll accountant, federal programs accountant, recruiter, and UNCF coordinator. The Petitioner would also exclude the position of recruiter, solicitation, etc., held by employee Louise Shipman, because she is the wife of the college president and a part-time employee.

Contrary to the Employer, we find that the unit sought by the Petitioner, consisting of all full-time, nonprofessional employees, is appropriate for collective-bargaining purposes. In determining the appropriateness of a nonprofessional unit in a college or university environment, the Board applies the rules traditionally used to determine the appropriateness of a unit in an industrial setting.[5] In this regard, a campus or collegewide unit, like a plantwide unit, is viewed by the Board as presumptively appropriate under the Act.[6] The burden of proving that the interests of a given classification of employees are so disparate from those of others that they cannot be represented in the same unit rests with the party challenging the unit's appropriateness, in this case the Employer.[7] The latter has not met its burden here.

The record reveals, contrary to the Employer's contention, that the clerical/secretarial employees, the buildings and grounds employees, and the dormitory directors share a strong community of interest with each other and with other nonprofessional employees. Thus, employees in all three groups, along with other nonprofessional employees, receive the same hospitalization coverage, pension coverage, medical insurance, vacation privileges, holidays, and entitlement to workmen's compensation privileges. They are all subject to the same policies and procedures found in the college faculty/staff handbook, and can attend the monthly faculty/staff meetings as well as the faculty/staff retreats.[8] Further, all nonprofessional employees are subject to the same hiring procedures. Thus, employees are recommended for employment by the head of the division in which employment is sought, with the college president having the final authority over the hiring.[9]

There are, to be sure, some distinctions to be found among these three groups of employees. The buildings and grounds employees, for example, receive an hourly wage for a 42-hour workweek, begin their workday at 7:30 a.m., and work one-half day on weekends, although employees in the other two groups, along with other nonprofessional employees, are salaried, work a 40-hour week, and have work hours from 8 a.m. to 5 p.m. On the other hand, the dormitory directors work only 9-1/2 months of the year (to coincide with the academic school year), although all other nonprofessional employees, including the clerical/secretarial employees and the buildings and grounds employees, are employed year round.[10] These minor distinctions, however, are insufficient to overcome the strong community of interest that employees in these three groups, as well as all other nonprofessional employees, share with each other, or to rebut the presumptive appropriateness of the collegewide unit sought by the Petitioner.

Further, the separate supervision of employees in these three groupings and their infrequent contact with each other generally is, in our view, not enough to negate their otherwise strong community of interests.[11] Nor do we find any merit to the Employer's suggestion that the three employee groups cannot be included in one overall unit merely because, if petitioned for separately, they might arguably constitute appropriate units. When making unit determinations, the Board does not concern itself with whether the unit petitioned for is the only or the most appropriate unit for collective bargaining; rather, the Board has held that the Act requires only that the unit requested be an appropriate unit.[12] Thus, even assuming the smaller groups proposed by the Employer could be found appropriate, the larger overall unit sought by the Petitioner here would not be rendered inappropriate.

We also do not agree with the Employer that the clerical/secretarial employees cannot be included in the same unit with the other employee groups. Although the Board ordinarily does not include office clerical workers in a unit containing manual workers because of their different inter-

[6] See Cornell University, supra, where a unit similar to that petitioned for here was found to be appropriate.

[7] Airco, Inc., 273 NLRB 348, 349 (1984) (employer found not to have met its burden of showing that plant operators did not share a community of interest with the other employees in the requested plantwide unit).

[8] According to Business Manager Aldrich, buildings and grounds employees are invited to attend the faculty/staff meetings and are frequently represented at these meetings by their firstline supervisor. The record is silent as to whether these employees can also attend the staff/faculty retreats. However, we note in this regard that Aldrich testified that the buildings and grounds employees receive the same benefits, which presumably would include the staff/faculty retreats, as other full-time nonprofessional employees.

[9] However, with respect to the buildings and grounds employees, Business Manager Aldrich testified that he has final authority over the hiring in this department.

[10] All nonprofessional employees, except for buildings and grounds personnel, execute a "Notice of Employment Authorization" contract annually. The buildings and grounds employees receive an hourly wage rather than a salary and are not required to execute such a contract.

[11] In Airco, Inc., supra, the Board found a plantwide unit appropriate notwithstanding that employees in different classifications had little contact with each other, and possessed different skills, training, and working conditions. Compare also Austin Cablevision, 279 NLRB 535 (1986), where the Board clarified an existing clerical employees unit to include the salesclerks who worked in a separate department, were separately supervised, and had no interchange or official contact with office clerical employees. Also, Jones & Laughlin Steel Corp., 57 NLRB 357 (1944), where the Board found that the different modes of pay, i.e., salary vs. hourly rate, was not enough to keep employees out of the same unit.

ests,[13] it has, nevertheless, found them to be properly included in such a unit in situations where the office clericals were shown to have strong mutual interests with other employee groups.[14] Here, the record clearly shows that the clerical/secretarial employees share the same interests with other employees, are subject to the same personnel policies, work the same hours as most unit employees, and receive the same fringe benefits. The record further shows that there is frequent contact between the clerical/secretarial employees and certain other unit employees, i.e., "technical" employees. Finally, we note that the Petitioner seeks to represent all nonprofessional employees, including the clerical/-secretarial employees, and there is no union here that seeks to represent the clerical/secretarial employees in a separate unit.[15]

We also find no merit to the Employer's contention that the BEOG coordinator, workstudy coordinator, records clerk, laboratory assistant, and the 13 employees listed as "OTHERS" in the appendix, should be excluded from the unit as "technical" employees.[16] Initially, we note that if these employees are found to be technical employees, as urged by the Employer, that fact alone would not require their exclusion from the unit sought by the Petitioner. The Board has long held that it will not automatically exclude technical employees from units of other employees whenever their placement is in issue. Rather, the Board will determine their unit placement on the basis of an analysis of their community of interest.[17] Here, the record shows that these individuals share the same community of interest with other employees in the bargaining unit. Thus, they receive the same fringe benefits,[18] work the same hours, and are subject to the same policies and procedures of the faculty/employee handbook applicable to all nonprofessional unit employees. Further, these employees are hired in the same manner and are apparently required to execute a yearly notice of employment authorization contract. On these facts, it is clear that these individuals properly belong in the unit sought by the Petitioner, regardless of whether they are technical employees under the Act.[19]

The Employer seeks to exclude from the unit as confidential employees two secretaries in the office of the president, Victoria Thomas and Joanna Phipps, and two secretaries in the dean's office, Sandra Grier and Mary Mitchell. The Petitioner seeks to include Phipps, Grier, and Mitchell in the unit but would exclude Thomas from the unit as a confidential employee. Although the record suggests that all four employees perform basically the same duties, the evidence as to the exact nature of their duties is conflicting and, in our view, insufficient to establish whether, at the relevant time period, any or all four of these individuals "assist[ed] and act[ed] in a confidential capacity to persons who formulate, determine, and effectuate management policies in the field of labor relations" which would render them "confidential employees [13] This policy has been applied most frequently in the industrial setting where the office clericals differ from production workers and plant clericals by working in separate offices on administrative matters not directly related to production. See, e.g., Beech Aircraft Corp., 170 NLRB 1595 (1968); Carling Brewing Co., 126 NLRB 347 (1960).

[14] See Standard Oil Co. of California, 116 NLRB 1762 (1956) (office clericals included in same unit with sales employees, production and maintenance employees, truckdrivers); Southern Minnesota Supply Co., 116 NLRB 968 (1956) (office clericals included in employerwide unit containing, inter alia, mechanics and machinists).

[15] Georgetown University, 200 NLRB 215 (1972), cited by the Employer in support of its position that the clerical/secretarial employees should be excluded from the unit, is factually distinguishable from the present case and, therefore, not controlling. Thus, unlike here where the Petitioner seeks to represent a collegewide unit of all nonprofessional employees, the petitioner in Georgetown University was seeking only a unit of service and maintenance employees. The Board rejected the employer's attempt in that case to include the clerical employees in the unit sought, noting that such a unit does not normally include office clerical employees. As stated, the Petitioner here is not seeking such a limited unit and the record clearly establishes a strong community of interest between the clerical/secretarial employees and other employee groups.

[16] The Board defines a "technical" employee as one who does not meet the strict requirements of the term "professional" employee as defined in the Act, but whose work is of a technical nature involving the use of independent judgment and requiring the exercise of specialized training usually acquired in colleges or technical schools or through special courses. Postal Service, 210 NLRB 477, 480 (1974). The Employer, in its brief to the Board, concedes that these employees are not professional employees within the meaning of the Act.

[18] The Employer's business manager, Aldrich, testified that all nonprofessional employees, which includes these individuals, receive the same fringe benefits. However, Aldrich also testified that employee Releford, who is listed under "OTHERS" as the director of the Learning Center, receives benefits available only to faculty members in addition to those benefits provided to nonprofessional employees.

[19] The record, in any event, fails to support the Employer's claim that these individuals are technical employees. Thus, the record is devoid of any evidence showing that these 17 individuals engage in work that can be viewed as technical in nature requiring the exercise of independent judgment, or that they possess and are required to have some form of specialized training to perform their job functions.

Although we find that employee Releford is not a technical employee, we are, nevertheless, unable to determine from the record whether she can be classified as a professional or a nonprofessional employee, as she appears to have a community of interest with both classifications of employees. Further, we note that in the earlier Livingstone College case (see fn. 1, supra), Releford's name was included in the Excelsior list containing the names of faculty members, although her ballot was challenged. In light of its holding in that case, the Board found it unnecessary to resolve her challenged ballot. In view of the above, we shall allow Releford to vote subject to challenge.

We shall also allow employee Shipman to vote under challenge. Although the Petitioner claims that Shipman is the wife of the college president and a part-time employee and, therefore, excludable on these grounds, no evidence whatsoever was produced at the hearing concerning Shipman's duties or work schedule. Lacking such evidence, we find it proper to allow her to vote subject to challenge.

The Petitioner would also exclude employees Harris, Colson, Everhart, and Chambers, listed under "OTHERS" in the appendix, from the unit but gives no reason for seeking their exclusion. There is nothing in the record to suggest that these employees fall within any of the categories that are to be excluded from the unit. We shall, accordingly, include them in the unit with other nonprofessional employees.

under the Act." See B. F. Goodrich Co., 115 NLRB 722, 724 (1956); Associate Day Care Services, 269 NLRB 178, 180–181 (1984); NLRB v. Hendricks County Rural Electric Corp., 454 U.S. 170 (1981). In view of the conflicting nature of the evidence presented with respect to these individuals, we shall permit them to vote under challenge.[20]

In summary, we find that the following unit of employees is appropriate for collective bargaining:

> All full-time nonprofessional employees employed by Livingstone College at its main campus in Salisbury, North Carolina, in the following classifications: clerical/secretarial employees; buildings and grounds employees; computer and keypunch operators; BEOG, NDSL, UNCF, and workstudy coordinators; records clerk; keeper of records; laboratory assistant; dormitory directors; invoice auditors; cashier/accountant; federal programs accountant; payroll accountant; recruiter; admissions officer; bookstore/canteen manager; administrative assistant/development; Living Learning Centers coordinator; but excluding all faculty, professional and confidential employees, guards and supervisors as defined in the Act.

We shall direct that an election be held among employees in the unit.

[Direction of Election omitted from publication.]

MEMBER CRACRAFT, concurring.

I concur in my colleagues' finding that a unit of all full-time, nonprofessional employees is appropriate herein. The interests of these employees are admittedly diverse. There exists among them separate supervision, different skills, wages, benefits, and hours and little interchange or interaction. However, the unit sought consists of all nonprofessional employees of the Employer.[1] Further, we need not determine "the only appropriate unit, or the ultimate appropriate unit, or the most appropriate unit; the Act requires only that the unit be 'appropriate.'"[2] On these bases and in light of the limited evidence before the Board, I would find that the unit sought constitutes an appropriate unit.

[20] The Petitioner would exclude from the bargaining unit employee Phyllis Wells, who is employed as a secretary at Hood Seminary, on "First Amendment grounds of separation of Church and State." Contrary to the concerns expressed by the Petitioner, we see no reason to exclude Wells from the bargaining unit. Initially, we note that Wells is a nonprofessional employee employed by the College and not the AME Zion Church which founded and sponsors the College. As a nonprofessional employee, she clearly shares a strong community of interest with other unit employees. Further, in its earlier Livingstone College decision (fn. 1, supra), the Board found that the AME Zion Church was "not involved with the College in a manner which creates a significant risk of constitutional infringement," noting in particular that the College was not financially dependent on the Church.

[1] A unit of such scope is the first one deemed appropriate in Sec. 9(b) of the Act, the section on which the Board's authority to establish collective-bargaining units rests. Such a unit has invariably been found appropriate by the Board since its earliest days. See, e.g., Western Electric Co., 98 NLRB 1018, 1032 (1952); Montefiore Hospital & Medical Center, 261 NLRB 569, 573 (1982); see also NLRB v. Carson Cable TV, 795 F.2d 879 (9th Cir. 1986), in which the court endorsed the Board's long held practice of determining that when a labor organization seeks a broad, all-encompassing unit, an employer's argument that smaller units are "presumptively appropriate" or even more appropriate are unavailing. DECISION AND ORDER

On February 10, 1986, Administrative Law Judge William N. Cates issued the attached decision. The General Counsel and the Charging Party filed exceptions and supporting briefs, and the Respondent filed an answering brief.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the decision and the record in light of the exceptions and briefs and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings,[1] and conclusions for the reasons stated below and to adopt the recommended Order.

This case concerns the Respondent's refusal to grant vacation pay to striking employees. In Texaco, we held that the question whether an employer violates Section 8(a)(3) or (1) by refusing to continue benefit payments to a disabled employee on commencement of a strike will be resolved by applying the test for alleged unlawful conduct articulated by the Supreme Court in Great Dane. Under this test, the General Counsel bears the prima facie burden of proving at least some adverse effect of the benefit denial on employee rights. The General Counsel can meet this burden by showing that (1) the benefit was accrued and (2) the benefit was withheld on the apparent basis of a strike.[2] The burden then shifts to the employer to come forward with proof of a legitimate and substantial business justification for its cessation of benefits by proving waiver or by demonstrating reliance on a nondiscriminatory contract interpretation that is reasonable and arguably correct.[3] If the employer proves business justification, the Board may nevertheless find that the employer has committed an unfair labor practice if the conduct is demonstrated to be "inherently destructive" of important employee rights or motivated by antiunion intent.[4]

The Texaco analysis of the Supreme Court's Great Dane test for unlawful conduct is applicable to the instant case. Applying the Texaco principles to the facts here, we find that the General Counsel has not established a prima facie case of 8(a)(3) and (1) conduct concerning the Respondent's failure and refusal to grant vacation benefits to striking employees.

Whether the General Counsel has met the prima facie burden of proving that the vacation benefits were due and payable, and therefore accrued, on the date the Respondent withheld them depends on an interpretation of the collective-bargaining agreement.[5] The contract here provides for unit employees to have paid vacations of varying durations depending on each employee's length of service. It also contains provisions concerning the scheduling of employees' vacation periods. We agree with the judge that the contract does not provide for payment for vacation pay in lieu of vacation but, rather, contemplates employees' taking time off. After the strike began, however, the Respondent received from the Union and individual employees a number of requests, which the Respondent denied, for the employees to be "paid" their vacation benefits or given their "vacation pay." As the employees were on strike, and thus not working, they made no requests to schedule vacations. As the contract does not provide for vacation pay apart from the taking of a vacation, we find that in requesting vacation pay the Union and the striking employees were seeking a benefit not contained in the contract. Moreover, there is no evidence that the Respondent had ever in practice departed from the terms of the contract and granted vacation pay in lieu of vacation in the past. Accordingly, we conclude that the vacation benefits that the Respondent denied were not accrued benefits.[6]

Moreover, even if the requests of the Union and the striking employees were viewed as requests to take vacations, rather than simply requests for vacation pay, denial of the requests at that time

[1] Absent evidence of actual discriminatory intent, the judge's analysis of the instant case is consistent with Texaco, Inc., 285 NLRB 241 (1987), especially in his use of the test set forth in NLRB v. Great Dane Trailers, 388 U.S. 26 (1967).

[6] Contrary to our dissenting colleague, we do not find the contract's failure to expressly prohibit the granting of vacation pay in lieu of vacation warrants a finding that such pay was available under the contract. As the judge found, the vacation provisions of the contract contemplate employees' taking off vacation time, not pay in lieu of vacation. In fact, the contract provides for vacation pay in lieu of vacation only in one circumstance—when an employee is discharged. As the contract provides for vacation pay in lieu of vacation only in this limited circumstance, and fails to mention it in any other context, we think a claim for pay in lieu of vacation in the circumstances here is unsupported.

Additionally, contrary to our dissenting colleague, we do not find that the vacation benefits were shown to be accrued by the testimony of Bailey, the Respondent's human resources manager, that the employees would have received vacation benefits if they had continued to work rather than having gone on strike. We agree with the judge that, considering Bailey's testimony in context, Bailey was merely stating a "truism."

would not have been unlawful. Thus, article 8, section 4 of the agreement provides that employees must work at least 8 hours on the last scheduled workday before their vacation begins. The employees here did not meet this requirement because they were on strike, and thus not working, when they requested their vacation benefits. Without meeting this requirement, the employees could not satisfy all the conditions necessary to entitle them to take vacations. Therefore, even had they sought to take vacations, their vacation benefits would not have been accrued.[7]

Further, assuming arguendo that the General Counsel did establish a prima facie case, the Respondent has established a legitimate and substantial business justification for its refusal to grant vacation benefits to striking employees. The Respondent demonstrated its reliance on a nondiscriminatory contract interpretation, which is reasonable and arguably correct. Article 8 of the collective-bargaining agreement provides for employees' vacation with pay; it does not, however, provide for vacation pay separate from taking vacation time off. As article 8, section 4, requires that employees work at least 8 hours on the last scheduled workday before and at least 8 hours on the first scheduled workday after vacation, it is, at the very least, reasonable to construe article 8 as contemplating that employees be in work status prior to taking a vacation. Moreover, a common understanding of "vacation" is a respite from work. Because the Respondent's contract interpretation is reasonable on its face and is consistent with the common understanding of "vacation," and there is no explicit contract language, bargaining history, or controlling past practice to the contrary, we find that the Respondent has established a sufficient rebuttal, even assuming that the General Counsel had made out a prima facie case.[8]

Additionally, we agree that, for the reasons the judge stated, the Respondent's denial of requested benefits was not inherently destructive of important employee rights or motivated by antiunion intent.

The complaint further alleges that the Respondent's denial of vacation benefits violated Section 8(a)(5) of the Act. As we have concluded that under the contract the employees were not entitled to vacation pay in lieu of taking vacation and, further, were required to work on the last scheduled workday in order to be entitled to take vacation, it follows that the Respondent did not violate Section 8(a)(5) by denying the requests of the Union and the striking employees for vacation benefits.

Accordingly, we shall dismiss the complaint.

ORDER

The recommended Order of the administrative law judge is adopted, and the complaint is dismissed.

MEMBER CRACRAFT, dissenting.

Contrary to my colleagues, I find that the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(5), (3), and (1) by denying employees' requested vacation benefits.

Under Texaco, Inc., 285 NLRB 241 (1987), the General Counsel must demonstrate that the requested benefits were accrued, that is due and payable at the time requested, and were withheld on the apparent basis of a strike. Article 8, section 1, of the parties' collective-bargaining agreement states that employees who worked at least 1000 hours during a 12-month period are entitled to specified amounts of vacation with pay, depending on their length of service.[1] The only discretion the contract affords the Respondent in granting vacations is to limit the number of employees on vacation at any one time to no more than 25 percent of a unit, group, shift, or area. The Respondent's human resources manager, Bailey, testified that the employees for whom the Union requested vacation benefits would have been entitled to the benefits but for the strike. He further testified that the 25-percent limit had nothing to do with the denial of benefits.

[7] In Texaco, Inc., supra, the employees' right to the benefits had accrued because they had accumulated the contractually specified period of employment credit and became eligible to receive the benefit due to sickness or disability prior to strike. Here, the dispute involves that aspect of the contractual eligibility test, which determines when employees earn the right to receive vacation benefits. Art. 8, sec. 4, supports the Respondent's contention that employees normally are eligible to schedule vacations only in between periods of active work. Unlike the instant case, the employees in Texaco and Amoco Oil Co., 285 NLRB 918 (1987), were already receiving their benefits when the strike began, so their benefits clearly were accrued.

Also distinguishable from the instant case is Bil-Mar Foods, 286 NLRB 786 (1987), in which the collective-bargaining agreement required employees to be "on the employer's payroll" as of July 1 in order to receive vacation pay. It did not require employees' on-the-job presence on that date for eligibility, like the contract here. (Chairman Stephens did not regard the benefits in Amoco as accrued, but that, of course, does not conflict with his conclusion that the benefits here likewise are not accrued benefits.)

[8] As our dissenting colleague points out, in concluding in Texaco, supra, that the respondent's contractual interpretation there was no more than post hoc rationalization, we noted that the respondent made no contemporaneous reference to contract interpretation when announcing the suspension of benefits. We also pointed out, however, that the respondent's announcement and its principal defense turned on the noncontractual argument that it should legally be entitled to presume that disabled employees are strikers. Moreover, we specifically found that the respondent's contractual interpretation argument was both unreasonable and not arguably correct. In any event, we find that in the circumstances here, particularly the fact that the contract clearly does not provide the benefits requested, the Respondent's failure to offer a reason for its denial of requests for vacation pay at the time of the requests does not preclude the Respondent from establishing reliance on a nondiscriminatory contract interpretation that is reasonable and arguably correct.

[1] See sec. III,A, of the judge's decision, which sets forth the contractual vacation pay provisions.

Because the striking employees were entitled to vacation benefits according to the contract terms and according to Bailey's testimony, the benefits were accrued. Therefore, the Respondent's denial of the accrued benefits based on the strike establishes a prima facie case of 8(a)(3) and (1) conduct. Consequently, under Texaco, the burden shifts to the Respondent to prove a legitimate and substantial business justification, i.e., waiver or reliance on a nondiscriminatory contract interpretation that is reasonable and arguably correct.[2]

In its brief supporting the judge's decision, the Respondent asserts that the collective-bargaining agreement does not provide for vacation pay as an alternative to time off and that there is no evidence the Respondent ever paid employees vacation pay in lieu of vacation. The Respondent also points out that article 8, section 2, states that vacation cannot be accumulated and carried over into a subsequent anniversary year. The Respondent contends that the denial of benefits here is consistent with its past practice established in 1979 of postponing vacations until after the strike.

Although the Respondent accurately states that the contract does not specifically provide for vacation pay in lieu of time off, neither does the contract specifically prohibit it. The contract simply provides that the Respondent pay an employee for a specific time period during which the employee does not have to work, if the employee has worked at least 1000 hours. Therefore, for employees who satisfied the 1000-hour requirement, the right to vacation pay had accrued.

The Respondent's conduct during the 1979 strike does not advance its business justification argument for two reasons. First, there were no requests for vacation benefits during the 1979 strike because that would have made the strikers ineligible for food stamps. Thus, the Respondent did not deny requested vacations in 1979. Second, the Respondent's 1979 postponement of vacation until after the strike was pursuant to a strike settlement agreement, which did not purport to interpret the parties' collective-bargaining agreement. Consequently, the 1979 vacation postponement, based as it was on a strike settlement agreement, cannot serve to demonstrate the Respondent's reliance in the instant case on a reasonable and arguably correct nondiscriminatory interpretation of the vacation pay provisions in the collective-bargaining agreement.

[2] 285 NLRB 241.

In finding that the benefits did not accrue or, alternatively, that the Respondent rebutted the General Counsel's prima facie case, my colleagues rely on the contract provision requiring employees to work their last scheduled workday before and first scheduled workday following their vacation. Even the Respondent, however, did not assert that it relied on this provision in denying vacation benefits. Texaco plainly states that it is the employer's burden to "demonstrat[e] reliance" on a particular contract interpretation.[3] Indeed, in Texaco the Board rejected the employer's belated contract interpretation as nothing more than a "post hoc rationalization."[4] The majority's attempt to create a business justification for the Respondent is inconsistent with Texaco, the very case on which the majority relies. The majority's willingness to mount the Respondent's defense for it is similar to the Fifth Circuit's speculation on the employer's motivation in Great Dane, which the Supreme Court held was a reversible error. NLRB v. Great Dane Trailers, 388 U.S. 26, 35 (1967).

Further, I simply cannot subscribe to the meaning my colleagues devise for article 8, section 4. The provision must be read in its industrial context to ascertain its meaning. By requiring an employee to work before and after vacation, the provision was not meant to serve as a condition precedent to the accrual of vacation benefits, as the majority interprets it. Rather, the provision is disciplinary in nature; it prevents employees from extending their scheduled vacations by taking a sick day or leave without pay before or after their scheduled vacation. I do not believe such a requirement warrants finding in the circumstances of this case that vacation benefits had not accrued or that the requirement constitutes a reasonable and arguably correct contract interpretation.

As the Respondent has not demonstrated its reliance on a nondiscriminatory contract interpretation that is reasonable and arguably correct, and as the contract provision on which the majority relies would not serve as a substantial and legitimate business justification even if the Respondent had relied on it, I would find that the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(3) and (1) by denying requested vacation benefits to striking employees.

I would further find that by denying the requested vacation benefits, the Respondent has unilaterally changed terms and conditions of employment without bargaining with the Union and has thereby violated Section 8(a)(5) of the Act.

DECISION

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

WILLIAM N. CATES, Administrative Law Judge. This case was tried at Erwin, Tennessee, on 10 December 1985.[1] The charge was filed by Oil, Chemical & Atomic Workers International Union, Local 3-677 (the Union), on 9 September, and the complaint issued on 23 October alleging that Nuclear Fuel Services, Inc. (Respondent) violated Section 8(a)(1), (3), and (5) of the National Labor Relations Act (the Act) by refusing on and after 20 May to grant its employees, then on strike, accrued vacation benefits as requested by the Union. Because Respondent conceded that it has not paid accrued vacation benefits to strikers during the course of the strike, which still continued at the time of the hearing, the sole issue presented in the case is whether Respondent had legitimate business justifications for its conduct.

On the entire record, including my observation of the demeanor of the witnesses, and after consideration of the briefs filed by the General Counsel, Respondent, and the Union, I make the following

I. JURISDICTION

Respondent is a Maryland corporation with an office and place of business located at Erwin, Tennessee, where it is engaged in the manufacture of nuclear fuels. During the calendar year preceding issuance of complaint, Respondent purchased and received at its Erwin, Tennessee facility goods valued in excess of $50,000 directly from suppliers located outside the State of Tennessee. The complaint alleges, Respondent by its answer admits, and I find that Respondent is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

II. LABOR ORGANIZATION

The complaint further alleges, Respondent admits, and I further find the Union is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

III. THE ALLEGED UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

A. The Material Facts

The facts in this case are not in dispute. Respondent and the Union have been parties to successive collective-bargaining agreements since at least 1972 covering Respondent's employees in a production and maintenance unit.[2] The most recent such agreement was effective 15 May 1982 until 15 May 1985. Immediately on expiration of the most recent agreement, the unit employees ceased work and engaged in an economic strike. As indicated earlier, that strike continued at the time of the hearing.

The complaint alleges and the answer admits that on 20 May representatives of the Union requested that Respondent pay striking employees their accrued vacation benefits provided for under the expired collective-bargaining agreement. Roland Bailey, Respondent's human resources manager and a participant in negotiations with the Union, declined the Union's request by telling the union representatives that vacation was going to be handled the same as it had been in 1979, that when the strike was over the employees would come back, that they would pick up their vacation as if the strike period of time had never happened. In short, the returning strikers would have whatever time remaining from the time they reported back to work to take their vacations as if the strike had not occurred.

Bailey's reference to 1979 was an allusion to the 1979 strike by unit employees when Respondent, as part of a strike settlement agreement with the Union, granted returning strikers their accrued vacation time or pay in lieu of vacation at Respondent's option. However, this provision of the settlement agreement specifically precluded reliance on it as precedent for pay for unused vacation.

Despite repeated requests by the Union at various subsequent times for vacation pay for the strikers, Respondent adhered to its position.[3] Moreover, with respect to at least one inquiry by an individual striker about vacation pay on 7 November, Bailey advised the employee in writing that, "In accordance with our past practice, vacation of all bargaining unit employees are being rescheduled during the period of the labor strike due to production requirements," and "[w]hen the strike has ended, the Company will be pleased to discuss re-scheduling of your vacation."

Article 8 of the expired collective-bargaining agreement between the parties is captioned, "Vacations and Vacation Pay" and sets forth the eligibility requirements for vacations. Thus, section 1 captioned, "Paid Vacations" provides:

> The Company shall grant employees vacations with pay under the following conditions:
> (a) One week. An employee who has worked not less than one thousand (1000) hours during a period of not less than twelve (12) months fol-

[1] All dates are in 1985 unless otherwise indicated.

[2] More specifically, the appropriate unit alleged in the complaint and admitted by Respondent has been, and is:

> All production and maintenance employees, laboratory assistants, laboratory technicians, plant clerical employees, surveillance technicians, and radiation monitors employed by the Respondent at its Erwin, Tennessee facility, but excluding all office employees, office clerical employees, laboratory employees, other than laboratory assistants and laboratory technicians, technical, professional, and and sales employees, foremen, watchmen, guards, and supervisors as defined in the Act.

[3] Employees who were on vacation at the beginning of the strike, however, were paid for the rest of the workweek in which the strike began.

lowing the anniversary date of his/her last regular employment shall be eligible for one (1) calendar week of vacation and shall receive forty (40) hours pay at his/her regular rate.

Subparagraphs (b) through (f) of the section provide for additional weeks of vacation on a graduated basis based on the employee's length of service with Respondent.

Section 2 captioned, "Vacation Period" provides:

> Employees will be allowed a total of fifteen (15) one-day vacation days which may be taken as ten (10) sick days (under a strict definition of sickness) or ten (10) scheduled and five (5) unscheduled one day vacation days provided that the Company shall not be required to allow more than 25% of a unit, group, shift, or area to be on vacation at any one time. Vacations may be scheduled up to 4:00 p.m. on Monday prior to shift scheduling on Wednesday. Requests for unscheduled one-day vacations must be received by the Company one (1) hour prior to shift change. Vacation earned during one anniversary year provided in Section 1 of this article shall be taken in the anniversary year or immediately thereafter. In no case shall a vacation period be permitted to accumulate and carry over into any subsequent anniversary year. Each employee's vacation period shall be designated by the Company to meet the requirements of operating conditions provided, however, that the period preferrable to the employee on a unit seniority basis shall be selected whenever possible. In the event the Company determines that operating conditions require part or all the Erwin Plant to be shutdown for vacation period, the Company will give the affected employees at least fifteen (15) calendar days prior notice. Discharged employees shall be paid for vacation earned up to the time of discharge.

Section 3 provides for the rate of pay for vacations as follows:

> (a) The rate of pay for vacation period shall be the employee's regular rate at the beginning of his/her vacation period.
> (b) An employee will receive vacation pay prior to his/her vacation providing that a minimum of fourteen (14) days advanced written notice is given and a minimum of one week's vacation is taken.

Section 4 requires that the employee work on both the scheduled workday before and after vacation and states:

> Employees paid under Section 1 of this Article shall be required to work at least eight (8) hours on their last scheduled work day before their vacation begins and at least eight (8) hours on their first scheduled work day after their vacation ends, unless excused by their supervisor. Failure to comply with this provision shall be proper cause for discipline.

B. Contentions of the Parties

Based on the facts related above and an affirmative response by Bailey to the General Counsel's question whether the only reason Respondent had not paid employees vacation benefits was because they were on strike, the General Counsel argues that Respondent's actions constituted discrimination against the strikers in violation of Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act. In this regard, the General Counsel relies on NLRB v. Great Dane Trailers, 388 U.S. 26 (1967); Gulf Envelope Co., 256 NLRB 320 (1981); Rockingham Machine-Lunex Co., 255 NLRB 346 (1981); and Jacques Syl Knitwear, 247 NLRB 1525 (1980). The General Counsel also contends that Respondent's refusal to pay the vacation benefits constituted a violation of Section 8(a)(5) of the Act because as it constituted a unilateral change without bargaining with the Union. The Charging Party in its brief essentially echoed the General Counsel's contentions. Although acknowledging that Respondent's apparent retaliatory intent in failing to pay the vacation benefits could be rebutted by a showing by Respondent of substantial business justifications for withholding the benefits, the Charging Party asserts that Respondent here showed no such justification. To the extent that Respondent relied on the vacation accord reached in settlement of the strike with the Union in 1979, the Charging Party contends that such accord establishes no past practice in view of the uncontradicted evidence in the record in the form of the testimony of Union President Lonnie Tolley to the effect that the Union in 1979 specifically did not request payment of vacation pay to strikers during the strike because it would have rendered the strikers ineligible to receive food stamps. Moreover, the Charging Party argues that the 1979 strike settlement agreement could not in any event establish a past practice of deferral of vacation benefits during the strike since the agreement regarding vacation benefits on its face was nonprecedential.

Respondent contends on the other hand that its failure to pay vacation benefits during the strike was justified by past practice and the prior collective-bargaining agreement set out above. Respondent also relies on provisions of article 3 of the agreement, the "management rights" section, which gives Respondent the right to determine "the schedules of production and the assignment of work." More specifically, Respondent asserts there are no requirements that Respondent grant employees vacation pay in lieu of vacation. Although the 1979 strike agreement did allow payment of vacation pay in lieu of vacation, such allowance was at the option of Respondent. Further, the settlement in this regard was, by further agreement, precluded from establishing a precedent. Under these circumstances and in the absence of evidence that Respondent was attempting to thwart the strike by rescheduling vacations, Respondent argues that its actions were not destructive of employee rights or otherwise discriminatory to employees in violation of Section 8(a)(3) and (1) of the Act. Respondent asserts essentially the same arguments in defense of the 8(a)(5) complaint allegations. Thus, there were no unilateral alterations of employee benefits, according to Respondent.

Respondent would distinguish those cases cited by the General Counsel, supra, as involving situations where the employer treated strikers differently from nonstrikers regarding vacation pay, where the employer's action in denying vacation pay was not in accordance with a recently expired contract or past practice, or where there was no previous collective-bargaining contract at all. These cases are inapplicable to the facts, according to Respondent, who relies primarily instead on Texaco, Inc., 179 NLRB 989 (1969), as being more apposite and as substantiating the legality of Respondent's position.

C. Analysis and Conclusions

The analysis of the issues in this case must begin with Great Dane Trailers, supra, in which the Supreme Court held that where an employer's refusal to pay accrued vacation pay to striking employees while paying it to nonstrikers was "discrimination in its simpliest form" and therefore violative of Section 8(a)(3) and (1) of the Act. The Court went on to state:

> First, if it can reasonably be concluded that the employer's discriminatory conduct was "inherently destructive" of important employee rights, no proof of an antiunion motivation is needed and the Board can find an unfair labor practice even if the employer introduces evidence that the conduct was motivated by business considerations. Second, if the adverse effect of the discriminatory conduct on employee rights is "comparatively slight," an antiunion motivation must be proved to sustain the charge if the employer has come forward with evidence of legitimate and substantial business justifications for the conduct. Thus, in either situation, once it has been proved that the employer has engaged in discriminatory conduct which could have adversely affected employee rights to some extent, the burden is upon the employer to establish that he was motivated by legitimate objectives since proof of motivation is most accessible to him. [Id. at 34.]

In Great Dane, the Court found a violation without ascertaining whether the employer's conduct was "inherently destructive" of employee rights, because the employer failed to present any evidence of a legitimate motive for its conduct.

The principles in Great Dane are applicable here if not the facts. However, neither the General Counsel nor Charging Party specifically argues that Respondent's actions were "inherently destructive" of important employee rights. Conduct of an employer is inherently destructive if it "carries with it 'unavoidable consequences which the employer not only foresaw but which he must have intended,' and thus bears its own indicia of intent." Id. 388 U.S. at 33, quoting NLRB v. Erie Resistor Corp., 373 U.S. 221, 228, 231 (1963). Inherently destructive conduct has also been defined as that conduct which has "far reaching effects which would hinder future bargaining, or conduct which discriminates solely upon the basis of participation in strikes or union activity," Portland Williamette Co. v. NLRB, 534 F.2d 1331, 1334 (9th Cir. 1976), or "that which creates visible and continuing obstacles to the future exercise of employee rights." Inter-Collegiate Press v. NLRB, 486 F.2d 837, 845 (8th Cir. 1973).

To the extent the General Counsel and the Charging Party rely on Bailey's concession that Respondent failed to pay the vacation benefits due to the strike, I find such concession does not establish an express intent to discriminate against employees which might be considered "inherently destructive" of their rights. Bailey's concession, particularly considered in the context of his preceding affirmative response to the General Counsel's question of whether the employees would have received their vacation benefits if they continued to work after May 20 (i.e., if they were not on strike) was, I conclude, a truism rather than an admission of discriminatory intent. Moreover, no other evidence of union animus on the part of Respondent was shown in this case which might throw a different and more sinister light on Bailey's concession. And there was no evidence here that Respondent treated strikers differently from nonstrikers which would indicate an intention to penalize strikers. I therefore find Bailey's admission does not evince discriminatory intent substantiating a finding of "inherently destructive" conduct.

The case sub judice unlike the situation in Great Dane also involves delayed payment of accrued vacation benefits rather than an outright refusal to grant such benefits. At least one court has held that delayed payment of vacation benefits to strikers does not constitute "conduct which bears it own indicia of intent carrying with it unavoidable consequences which the employer must have intended." NLRB v. Borden, Inc., 600 F.2d 313, 321 (1st Cir. 1979). The Board itself has indicated in its holdings in Texaco, supra, and Detroit Edison Co., 206 NLRB 898 (1973), that postponing vacation benefits during a strike is not, without more, unlawful. Accordingly, I conclude Respondent's conduct in this case cannot be catagorized as "inherently destructive."[4] Further, in light of this conclusion, the adverse effect of Respondent's alleged discriminatory conduct must be regarded as "comparatively slight."[5] Therefore, under Great Dane, and because Respondent has come forward with a claimed business justification, antiunion motivation must be proven. Respondent's business justification must be carefully examined to determine whether it reflects such antiunion motivation. Here, Respondent relies on the provisions of the expired

[4] Based on this same reasoning, I reject the argument of the General Counsel asserted for the first time in his posthearing brief that Respondent's denial in its answer of par. 12 of the complaint alleging the refusal to grant employees accrued vacation benefits was a sham interposed for delay in breach of Rule 11 of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure. The General Counsel's argument was that Respondent's counsel must have known of Respondent's refusal to pay vacation benefits in light of Bailey's "admission" at the hearing discussed above. Regardless of Bailey's "admission," I do not view Respondent's denial in its answer as inconsistent with its legal position that it had not refused to pay vacation benefits to the strikers but rather had postponed paying them.

[5] As noted, because the vacation benefits have been delayed by Respondent's action rather than eliminated the strikers have lost little. As the court observed in Stokely-Van Camp, 722 F.2d 1324 at 1330-1331 (7th Cir. 1983), a case involving similar circumstances, "The only thing [the strikers] 'lost,' was the opportunity to receive wages for work performed for all weeks after [the end of the strike], which opportunity supposedly would have arisen if vacations had been paid during the strike."

collective-bargaining agreement[6] and past practice. If satisfactorily established, these justifications would suffice to rebut the violations alleged. See Vesuvius Crucible Co. v. NLRB, 668 F.2d 162 (3d Cir. 1981). Moreover, the establishment of such business justification would further serve to distinguish this case factually from Great Dane as well as the other cases cited by the General Counsel, supra.

Considering first past practice, it is to be observed that the record establishes only one time in the past, 1979, when Respondent experienced a strike during which vacation benefits were not paid. Although the record (statements of counsel) alludes to other strikes the record is silent regarding vacation benefits during such strikes. Respondent's failure to pay benefits during the 1979 strike would appear to be diminished in its precedential value because there was no evidence that the Union requested payment of benefits on behalf of the strikers during the strike. There was no evidence that any individual striker sought to receive vacation benefits during the strike. Although the failure by the Union or individual strikers to seek benefits during the strike might suggest an understanding on their part that they were due nothing, the existence of such an understanding is specifically refuted by the uncontradicted and credible testimony of Union President Lonnie Tolley who explained that vacation benefits were not sought because it would have adversely impacted on strikers' eligibility for food stamps. Moreover, the terms under which vacation benefits were paid to employees after conclusion of the 1979 strike were as much a product of the strike settlement as they were the collective-bargaining agreement under which they initially accrued. Further, the stipulation in the strike settlement provisio on payment of vacation pay in lieu of paid time off at the option of the Company specifically precluded future reliance on the provision as precedent. Nevertheless, the uncontradicted and credible testimony of Ray Charles Rice, former human resources representative of Respondent, establishes that consistent with Respondent's position and its views of the collective-bargaining agreement, Respondent canceled vacations of, and did not pay vacation benefits to, strikers during the 1979 strike even though some of them were scheduled before to the strike to start their vacations after the strike began. This evidence at least confirms Respondent's institution of a practice of not paying vacation benefits to strikers. The existence of this practice, albeit not a longstanding one, tends to support Respondent's "business justification."

Considering next the expired collective-bargaining agreement, it is clear such agreement is silent on vacation benefits during the course of a strike. It is equally clear that the agreement does not provide for payment to employees of vacation pay in lieu of vacation. On the contrary, sections 3 and 4 of article 8 dealing with vacations appear to comtemplate employees taking vacation time off. Aside from the provisions of the 1979 strike settlement agreement, the record is silent regarding any practice in granting vacation pay in lieu of vacations. As already noted, while the 1979 strike settlement agreement did allow Respondent to grant pay in lieu of vacation at its option, the agreement by its express terms established no precedent. It thus appears that there is no contractual basis for concluding that the striking employees were entitled to accrued vacation pay as opposed to scheduled time off with pay.[7] In addition, there was no evidence that despite an absence of a contractual provision allowing pay in lieu of vacation Respondent nevertheless in practice granted vacation pay to employees on sick leave or other types of unpaid leave. Thus, there was no departure from past practice despite the terms of the bargaining agreement to show ulterior motivation or discriminatory treatment on Respondent's part.[8]

The strikers' entitlement to time off with pay must then turn on whether under the agreement with Respondent the strikers or Respondent could determine the scheduling of vacations. The bargaining agreement clearly does not specify a calendar period for vacations. Although Respondent under the agreement can specify a plant shutdown and vacation with appropriate notice to employees, and has done so in the past, there is no evidence that before the strike Respondent had scheduled a shutdown period to take place during the strike here. In this regard, the case is distinguishable from the situation in Wallace Metal Products, 244 NLRB 41 (1979), where the Board found a violation of Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act by an employer who refused to pay strikers' accrued vacation pay that, under the terms of the collective-bargaining agreement, was to be paid during a yearly scheduled 2-week shutdown, a shutdown which under the facts of that case coincided with the occurrence of the strike.

As Respondent contends, the bargaining agreement here clearly contemplates control and discretion by Respondent in scheduling vacations. Although the agreement provides that Respondent cannot be required to allow more than 25 percent of its employees off at one time for vacation, it also provides that an employee's vacation period shall be designated by the Respondent to meet the requirements of operating conditions provided, however, that the period preferable to the employees on a seniority basis shall be selected whenever possible. Respondent could therefore schedule vacations to best meet its operating needs. The record reflects that Respondent continues to operate during the strike utilizing supervisory personnel. What percent of normal production it is [6] It is well established that the policies of Sec. 8(a)(5) of the Act require that the terms of a collective-bargaining agreement relating to mandatory subjects of bargaining may not be unilaterally changed without notice to, and negotiation with, the other party to the agreement even though the agreement has expired. See Hen House Market No. 3 v. NLRB, 428 F.2d 133 (8th Cir. 1970).

[7] Accordingly, the Board's holding in Seeburg Corp., 192 NLRB 290 (1971), is inapposite. There the Board found a violation in the employer's refusal to pay accrued vacation pay to strikers where the contract specifically allowed pay in lieu of vacation. There vacation pay had accrued before the strike. Thus, no "business justification" could be shown by the employer in refusing to pay the vacation benefits.

[8] It is for this reason that the Board's decision in Stokely-Van Camp, Inc., 259 NLRB 961 (1982), enf. denied 722 F.2d 1324 (7th Cir. 1983), is inapposite. In that case, while the employer was not contractually required to pay vacation pay in lieu of vacation, it had granted such pay to employees on sick leave and other leaves of absence. Consequently, the Board found the employer was not empowered by the collective-bargaining agreement nor past practice to refuse vacation benefits to strikers.

achieving is not shown, but there was no plant shutdown.

As pointed out by the administrative law judge with apparent Board approval in Texaco, Inc., 169 NLRB 989, 993 (1969), there is a distinct difference between vacation and strike time, and:

> In vacation time the absence from work is timed to interfere to a minimum degree with a company's operation. For a strike to be effective, the strikers' absence from work must create a maximum interference with a company's operations. Respondent continued to operate at 85 percent of normal during the strike. It is apparent that during such a situation, the fewer people absent from work for any reason, the easier it is for Respondent to continue its operations. Respondent could not control absences due to strike but under its contract and under past practices, it could control absences due to vacations.

Except for the reference to the percent of production achieved during the strike, the above statement can be applied fully to the instant case. If Respondent under the bargaining agreement could control the scheduling of vacations, it could choose not to schedule such vacations during the course of a strike when its need for employees is most critical and while it is still attempting to operate its facility.

The Charging Party's brief appears to argue that Respondent's scheduling of vacations was limited by the contractual provision that "the period preferable to the employee on a unit seniority basis shall be selected whenever possible." This argument ignores the clause to which the proviso was attached which allows Respondent to schedule vacations to meet its operating needs. Further, the proviso itself by use of the term "whenever possible" grants Respondent further discretion in ascertaining what is possible in light of its production needs. Obviously, Respondent's operating needs for personnel are greater during the course of a strike.

Accordingly, I conclude Respondent, like the employer in the Board's Texaco decision,[9] supra, was contractually entitled not to schedule vacations during a strike and therefore could withhold vacation benefits. Also as in Texaco, Respondent has not canceled vacation benefits for the strikers but has clearly told the Union in the uncontradicted words of Bailey "that the vacation is going to be handled the same as it had been in 1979; that when the strike was over with, the employees would come back, they would pick up their vacation as if this period of time never happened," and "[they] would have whatever time remaining from the time they reported back to work that they had in the past," and that "[i]f it was 2 months, 3 months, to take it, they would have that length of time to take it when they got back." In short, the vacation benefits were simply postponed, not canceled. There would be no lapsing of vacation benefits, and the strikers would not be penalized for the strike. Under these circumstances, I conclude Respondent's withholding of vacation benefits during the strike had only a minor impact on the strike which could not override Respondent's business justification.[10]

Considering all the foregoing, I conclude Respondent was entitled contractually and by past practice to schedule vacation benefits after the strike, so that it had a "business justification" for not paying vacation benefits during the strike. Accordingly, since I conclude that Respondent's action was not inherently destructive of employee rights, and in the absence of any independent evidence of union animus in Respondent's action or other evidence revealing Respondent's disparate or inconsistent application of the collective-bargaining agreement provision on vacations[11] showing Respondent intended to discourage union membership, I find and conclude that Respondent did not violate Section 8(a)(3) and (1) of the Act as alleged. I further find and conclude that since Respondent's actions were in accord with the terms of the expired collective-bargaining agreement, Respondent made no unilateral changes violative of Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act. I shall recommend that the complaint be dismissed in its entirety.

On the foregoing factual findings and conclusions, I reached the following

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. Respondent is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.
2. The Union is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.
3. Respondent has not engaged in unfair labor practices within the meaning of Section 8(a)(1), (3), and (5) of the Act by not paying vacation benefits to strikers during the course of the strike.

On these findings of fact and conclusions of law and on the entire record, I issue the following recommended[12]

ORDER

The complaint is dismissed.

---

[9] See also G. C. Murphy Co., 207 NLRB 579 (1973); Detroit Edison Co., 206 NLRB 898 (1973).

[10] In reaching this conclusion, I also note that Respondent made no announcement before the strike that it would withhold benefits during the strike. Such an announcement could be viewed as an effort to dissuade employees from striking. On the contrary, Respondent even allowed employees on vacation at the time the strike began to continue their vacation for the remainder of the workweek in which the strike began. I do not view this conduct as inconsistent with Respondent's position. See Texaco, supra.

[11] It was the inconsistent application of the contractual provision on vacation benefits which most persuaded the Board in Borden, Inc., 248 NLRB 387 (1980), enfd. 645 F.2d 87 (1st Cir. 1981), cited in Charging Party's brief, to find that the employer's refusal there to pay benefits to strikers was intended to discriminate against them and discourage their union activity. Borden is distinguishable because there is no evidence of an inconsistent application here.

[12] If no exceptions are filed as provided by Sec. 102.46 of the Board's Rules and Regulations, the findings, conclusions, and recommended Order shall, as provided in Sec. 102.48 of the Rules, be adopted by the Board and all objections to them shall be deemed waived for all purposes.

Adair Standish Corporation and Flint Local 282-C Graphic Communications International Union, AFL–CIO. Case 7–CA–25059

July 29, 1988

DECISION AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN STEPHENS AND MEMBERS BABSON AND CRACRAFT

On February 6, 1987, Administrative Law Judge Bernard Ries issued the attached decision. The Respondent filed exceptions and a supporting brief, and the Charging Party filed cross-exceptions, a supporting brief, and an answering brief.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the decision and the record in light of the exceptions and briefs and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings,[1] findings,[2] and conclusions as modified, to modify his remedy,[3] and to adopt the recommended Order as modified.[4]

We agree with the judge's finding that Adair Standish Corporation committed numerous violations of Section 8(a)(1), (3), and (5) of the Act in the course and aftermath of a successful union campaign at its Standish, Michigan plant. We disagree, however, with some of the rationale stated in the judge's decision. Although we adopt the judge's ultimate conclusions, for the reasons set forth below, we do not in all instances adopt his rationale.

The Respondent is a wholly owned subsidiary of a printing company headquartered in Southfield, Michigan. The Adairs operate two printing plants in Michigan: one at Dexter, close to Southfield, with about 65 employees; and one at Standish, about 150 miles from Southfield, with about 37 employees. Both plants are engaged in the same type of work, i.e., printing automotive service manuals, other manuals, catalogues, and forms. The conduct on which this case is based occurred at the Standish facility.

I. THE 8(A)(1) VIOLATIONS

We agree with the judge's finding that the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act when acknowledged Supervisor Calvin Ireland threatened during the union campaign that the arrival of a new press that had been ordered for the Standish plant was going to be delayed or canceled because of the union activity.[5]

We agree with the judge's finding that the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act when, 2 days after the election, the Respondent posted a notice that stated that "[a]nyone who is interested in revoking their authorization card which you signed prior to the election may do so by obtaining a request form from your supervisor." Dennis Adair testified that the notice evolved from inquiries made by two employees about retrieving their cards.[6] We agree with the judge that the notice

[1] We find no merit in the Respondent's exception to the severance of Case 7–CA–25973 from this case. Our reasons are fully set forth in our decision in Adair Standish Corp., 283 NLRB 668 (1987).

We agree with the judge's finding that the Respondent violated Sec. 8(a)(1) of the Act by interviewing employee Carol Barber without observing the safeguards prescribed in Johnnie's Poultry Co., 146 NLRB 770, 775 (1964), enf. denied on other grounds 344 F.2d 617 (8th Cir. 1965). We find no merit in the Respondent's contention that this allegation is barred by Sec. 10(b) of the Act because it was not specifically referred to in the charge. We agree with the judge's ruling at the hearing that this allegation was encompassed within the charge's surveillance allegations. See generally Clark Equipment Co., 278 NLRB 498 (1986).

In finding that the questioning of Barber violated Sec. 8(a)(1) of the Act, Chairman Stephens does not rely on Johnnie's Poultry Co., supra, but finds (1) that, under all the circumstances, employee Barber could not have felt free to refuse to respond to the questions asked by the Respondent's attorney, (2) that in light of the Respondent's expressed hostility to the employees' union activities, an employee in that situation could reasonably have been coerced by the questions concerning what she had signed and whether she knew who had brought the Union in, notwithstanding an assurance that her job would not be affected by her answers, and (3) that these particular questions went beyond the questioning necessary to prepare for the hearing on the Respondent's objections. On the basis of all of these factors taken together, Chairman Stephens finds the 8(a)(1) violation.

[2] The Respondent has excepted to some of the judge's credibility findings. The Board's established policy is not to overrule an administrative law judge's credibility resolutions unless the clear preponderance of all the relevant evidence convinces us that they are incorrect. Standard Dry Wall Products, 91 NLRB 544 (1950), enfd. 188 F.2d 362 (3d Cir. 1951). We have carefully examined the record and find no basis for reversing the findings.

We have carefully examined the record and we find no merit in the Respondent's contentions that the judge was biased or had a predetermined theory of the case.

The Respondent has excepted to the judge's conclusion that Plant Manager Dennis Adair is Robert Adair's son. We note that Dennis is John Adair's son but find this immaterial to the decision.

[3] In accordance with our decision in New Horizons for the Retarded, 283 NLRB 1173 (1987), interest on and after January 1, 1987, shall be computed at the "short-term Federal rate" for the underpayment of taxes as set out in the 1986 amendment to 26 U.S.C. § 6621. Interest on amounts accrued prior to January 1, 1987 (the effective date of the 1986 amendment to 26 U.S.C. § 6621), shall be computed in accordance with Florida Steel Corp., 231 NLRB 651 (1977).

[4] We shall modify pars. 1(c) and 1(d) of the recommended Order to conform to our decision.

[5] Despite the absence of a complaint allegation, the judge found a separate 8(a)(1) violation in a similar remark made by Supervisor Rich Livingstone several months after the election. We find it unnecessary to pass on the legality of this statement because the finding of an additional violation would be essentially cumulative and would not materially affect the Order.

The judge found, and we agree, that Darrell Baughman was not a supervisor and that, therefore, statements made by him did not constitute a violation of the Act. We find it unnecessary to go beyond this conclusion and do not rely on the judge's further discussion as to whether remarks made by Baughman would have constituted violations if Baughman were a supervisor.

[6] Employee George Nott testified that on election day, he asked Scott Merrill, one of the Respondent's attorneys, what use the Union could make of the card that Nott had signed earlier. When Merrill said the card could be used to fine him if Nott crossed a picket line, Nott asked how was a violation of Section 8(a)(1), but only for the following reasons. We find that the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) because it did not merely advise employees of their legal rights, but rather solicited them to revoke their authorization cards. Although it is, of course, lawful "for an employer to inform employees of their rights under Section 7 [in] an atmosphere free of coercion, intimidation, or union animus," Peoples Gas System, 275 NLRB 505, 507–508 (1985), that is not the situation here. In this case, the Respondent's communication to employees occurred in the context of contemporaneous violations of Section 8(a)(1), (3), and (5). In addition, the notice was posted immediately after the Union's election victory that the Respondent adamantly opposed. Finally, we note that the notice directed employees to their supervisors to obtain revocation forms. In apparent furtherance of this directive, Supervisor Ireland testified that he "took it upon himself" to "let the employees know that I had the forms to fill out to revoke their authorization cards." Employee Cummings verified that he had been approached by Supervisor Ireland about the availability of such forms. As the judge reasoned, this procedure puts employees "in the limelight and on the spot" in a manner inconsistent with their basic Section 7 right freely to choose whether to engage in or refrain from union activities. Finally, this coercive aspect of the notice was not mitigated by any employer assurances against reprisals for failing to request a form. Accordingly, we adopt the judge's finding that the Respondent's notice violated Section 8(a)(1).[7]

II. THE 8(A)(3) VIOLATIONS

We agree with the judge that the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(3) of the Act when it posted a notice a few days after the election announcing a new and more stringent tardiness policy, stating that the behavior of employees who did not report on time each day "will result in disciplinary action immediately." We also agree with the judge that the Respondent's issuance of a written warning to employee Tim Cummings pursuant to the new policy violated Section 8(a)(3) of the Act.

We also adopt the judge's finding that the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(3) and (1) of the Act by suspending employee Ed Lachcik for 2 days. We do so for the following reasons. As the judge found, given the capricious and unpredictable manner in which tardiness was handled in the past, it is reasonable to conclude that despite Lachcik's record of tardiness and the fact that he had previously received two warnings, the suspension was at least in part due to the Respondent's unlawful imposition of its new attendance policy. In this regard, we note, as the judge did, that after receiving his second warning on May 7, 1985, Lachcik was late numerous times between May 7 and the September 11 election without receiving any further discipline. Shortly after the election, Lachcik was suspended for the first time, for tardiness that occurred before the new policy was announced. Thus, the General Counsel has established that the employees' protected activity was a motivating factor in the Respondent's decision to suspend Lachcik. Under the analysis set forth in Wright Line, 251 NLRB 1083 (1980), enfd. 662 F.2d 899 (1st Cir. 1981), cert. denied 455 U.S. 989 (1982), approved in NLRB v. Transportation Management Corp., 462 U.S. 393 (1983), the burden shifts to the Respondent to show that it would have suspended Lachcik even in the absence of the employees' selection of the Union. We find that the Respondent has failed to meet its burden. The Respondent offered only vague testimony that employees had been suspended or discharged in the past for attendance problems. No personnel records were introduced to substantiate this. Since Lachcik's suspension was imposed under the new policy and given the unpredictable way tardiness had been handled in the past, the Respondent has failed to show that the suspension would have occurred without the union activity.

We agree with the judge's finding that the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(3) of the Act by its refusal to take delivery of the Goss Press at Standish. In March 1985 the Respondent purchased a reconditioned high-powered press which it admittedly intended to install in its Standish plant to replace an older, slower Color King Press. Delivery was scheduled for July.[8] Meanwhile, union organizing efforts began at Standish in June resulting in an election and union victory in September. Delivery of the press was delayed. The new press was put into storage and ultimately in May 1986 was installed at the Dexter plant.

The judge found that "this turn of events smacks of a motivation tainted by organizational considerations," and noted that two admitted supervisors made this connection in talking to employees. The he could revoke the card. We find it unnecessary to pass on the judge's commentary in fn. 23 of his decision concerning this advice.

[7] We agree with the judge that by Supervisor Ireland's action in approaching employees and stating that he had the forms, the Respondent committed an additional 8(a)(1) violation. Although not alleged in the complaint, this matter was fully litigated at the hearing.

Chairman Stephens agrees that, through the combination of the posted notices and the statements to employees by their supervisors concerning the availability of the revocation forms, the Respondent violated Sec. 8(a)(1) of the Act. He would not break the conduct down into separate violations.

[8] All dates are in 1985 unless otherwise noted.

judge rejected the testimony of Robert Adair and the Respondent's explanation that the change was made for purely business reasons, i.e., competition from Canadian printers and the loss of automotive manual contracts. Robert Adair explained that the press was diverted because Dexter was the main plant, John Adair was there, and the quick turnaround jobs are done at Dexter. These factors, however, existed in March when the decision was made to place the press at the Standish plant. Thus, the judge found that the Respondent's explanation had "nothing to do with the volume of business, only the logistics." The judge, in rejecting the Respondent's explanation, stressed that he was not disputing the Respondent's business judgment but found the explanation unlikely, particularly in light of the Respondent's failure to substantiate its economic claim by producing full and complete evidence as to the Company as a whole, or even as to the Standish plant standing alone. The judge concluded that the Respondent's decision to place the new press at Dexter instead of Standish was motivated solely by antiunion considerations, in violation of Section 8(a)(3).

We agree with the judge's analysis.[9] In adopting the judge's decision in this regard, we additionally find that the failure to install the Goss press at Standish adversely affected the employees' terms and conditions of employment because the arrival of the new press was reasonably anticipated by the employees as having a beneficial effect on their jobs. According to the credited and uncontradicted testimony of employee Tim Cummings, Dennis Adair had spoken of the new press in the context of the Company's attempt to expand into a new field. This testimony raises an inference that diversion of the press from Standish could reasonably result in diversion of new work from Standish. Further, the installation of the new Goss press was intended to replace the older, apparently more difficult to run Color King press. Accordingly, we find that the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(3) and (1) of the Act by its failure to install the Goss press at the Standish plant.[10]

III. THE 8(A)(5) VIOLATIONS

We agree with the judge's finding that the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(5) of the Act by failure to bargain over the changed personnel policy enforcing stricter discipline for tardiness and by its failure to bargain over the economically motivated September 25, 1985 layoffs of Larry Foster and Cynthia Johnson. The Respondent has filed exceptions to the judge's finding of an 8(a)(5) violation in its failure to bargain over the layoffs, and to the make-whole remedy ordered. We find the Respondent's exceptions to be without merit. The judge's unfair labor practice finding and recommended remedy with respect to the layoffs are in accordance with Board precedent. See Lapeer Foundry & Machine,, 289 NLRB 1185 (1988); Advertiser's Mfg. Co., 280 NLRB 1185 (1986), enfd. 823 F.2d 1086 (7th Cir. 1987).

ORDER

The National Labor Relations Board adopts the recommended Order of the administrative law judge as modified below and orders that the Respondent, Adair Standish Corporation, Standish, Michigan, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall take the action set forth in the Order as modified.

1. Substitute the following for paragraph 1(c).

"(c) Telling employees that equipment would not be or might not be installed at their plant because of their union activities."

2. Substitute the following for paragraph 1(d).

"(d) Soliciting employees to revoke their authorization cards, and having supervisors personally inform individual employees that they had the revocation forms available."

3. Substitute the attached notice for that of the administrative law judge.

APPENDIX

NOTICE TO EMPLOYEES
POSTED BY ORDER OF THE
NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS BOARD
An Agency of the United States Government

The National Labor Relations Board has found that we violated the National Labor Relations Act and has ordered us to post and abide by this notice.

Section 7 of the Act gives employees these rights.

To organize

To form, join, or assist any union

To bargain collectively through representatives of their own choice

To act together for other mutual aid or protection

To choose not to engage in any of these protected concerted activities.

[9] Moreover, even treating this as a mixed motive case and assuming that there was a partial business motivation based on economic considerations, the Respondent still has not met its burden under Wright Line, supra, to establish that it would have taken the same action even absent the employees' union activity.

[10] The judge's Order requires that the press be moved from Dexter to Standish. This puts into effect what would have been the status quo ante but for the discriminatory act of the Respondent. We find no merit in the Respondent's exception alleging the remedy is punitive.

WE WILL NOT refuse to bargain with Flint Local 282-C, Graphic Communications International Union, AFL–CIO or any other labor organization, after such a labor organization has prevailed in a representation election, by making material changes in existing terms and conditions of employment of our represented employees without consulting the labor organization as required by law.

WE WILL NOT discriminate against employees for supporting the Union or any other labor organization by transferring equipment in order to diminish the employment opportunities available to the employees and by promulgating more stringent attendance rules.

WE WILL NOT tell employees that equipment will not be or might not be installed at their plant because of their union activities.

WE WILL NOT solicit employees to revoke their authorization cards and WE WILL NOT have supervisors personally inform individual employees that they have revocation forms available.

WE WILL NOT conduct interviews with employees in preparation for a hearing (i) without informing them that their participation in the interview is purely voluntary and that they can refuse to answer any questions, or (ii) in an atmosphere of hostility to the Union involved, or (iii) while conducting such interviews, exceed the legitimate scope of inquiry for such interviews so as to unnecessarily and coercively intrude into the Section 7 activities of employees.

WE WILL NOT in any like or related manner interfere with, restrain, or coerce you in the exercise of the rights guaranteed you by Section 7 of the Act.

WE WILL promptly install in our Standish plant the Goss HV press which was installed in the Dexter plant in May 1986.

WE WILL, if we have not already done so, offer Cynthia Johnson and Larry Foster immediate reinstatement to their former jobs or, if those jobs no longer exist, to substantially equivalent ones, without prejudice to their seniority or any other rights and privileges previously enjoyed, and WE WILL make them whole for any loss of earnings and other benefits resulting from their unlawful layoffs, less any interim earnings, plus interest. In addition, WE WILL make whole any employees including Edward Lachcik and Tim Cummings who have suffered losses stemming from application of the new policy relating to tardiness adopted about September 13, 1985.

WE WILL remove from our files any reference to the layoffs of Larry Foster and Cynthia Johnson on September 25, 1985, the September 17, 1985 disciplinary notice issued to Tim Cummings, and the September 17 suspension of Edward Lachcik and any reference to other disciplinary action involving other employees since about September 13, 1985, issued pursuant to the new tardiness rule adopted at that time, and notify them all in writing that such expunction has been made, and that such adverse actions will not be used against them in any way.

WE WILL rescind the September 13, 1985 tardiness disciplinary policy and the offer of assistance for the revocation of union authorization cards also announced about September 13, 1985, and remove the posted notice of such policies.

WE WILL notify and, on request, consult with the Union before making changes in any mandatory subject of bargaining.

ADAIR STANDISH CORPORATION

Dwight R. Kirksey, Esq., for the General Counsel.
Francis T. Coleman, Esq. and Scott R. Merrill, Esq. (Boothe, Prichard & Dudley), of Washington, D.C., for the Respondent.

DECISION

BERNARD RIES, Administrative Law Judge. This case was tried in Bay City and Midland, Michigan, on various days in August and September 1986. The consolidated complaint alleges that Respondent committed several violations of Sections 8(a)(1), (3), and (5) of the Act in the course and aftermath of a successful union campaign at its Standish, Michigan plant.[1]

All parties have submitted briefs,[2] which I have carefully reviewed, as I have similarly considered the record

[1] As explained in the "Order Granting Motion To Sever" issued by me on 5 November 1986, I granted a motion by the Charging Party to sever the allegations of the consolidated case (Case 7–CA–25973) dealing solely with Respondent's general refusal to recognize and bargain with, and its refusal to furnish information to, the Union. On 10 November 1986, I issued a decision in that case (JD–294–86).

[2] On or about 21 November 1986, Respondent filed "Respondent's Motion To Strike Certain Portions of the Briefs Filed by the General Counsel and Charging Party." Thereafter, the General Counsel and the Charging Party filed answers to the motion. As they point out, the "Motion to Strike" is, in fact, simply a reply brief. Presumably, Respondent recognized that while the Board's Rules and Regulations permit the filing of "motions" without stated limitation (Sec. 102.24), they make no express provision, in Sec. 102.42 dealing with the filing of "a" brief, for reply briefs. Hence, Respondent filed what lawyers would identify as a reply brief, with the clearly inappropriate title of "Motion to Strike." Ironically, in doing so, Respondent included a statement of alleged fact which is dehors the record and which would fall within those categories normally subject to a motion to strike; further included a statement of fact regarding the contents of the complaint which is indisputably erroneous; and made several misstatements of the record.

Charging Party requests denial of the motion; the General Counsel asks me to reject the document and strike it from the record. Having had, perforce, to read the "Motion to Strike" to determine whether it was well-founded, I see no point in striking it from the record. I shall, however, of the proceedings[3] and my recollection of the witnesses as they testified. There follow the findings of fact, conclusions of law, and recommendations I have drawn from these sources.

I. THE DIVERSION OF THE GOSS HV

A. Background

Respondent is a wholly owned subsidiary of a printing company with headquarters in Southfield, Michigan, a suburb of Detroit. Robert Adair is president and one-third owner of the Company and its real estate, machinery-purchasing, and other subsidiaries, and his brother John presumably is another owner.

The Adairs operate two printing plants in Michigan: one at Dexter, close to Southfield, with about 65 employees, and one at Standish, perhaps 150 miles from Southfield, employing approximately 37 workers.[4] The Standish plant was opened last, in or about 1976. Both plants have basically engaged in the same sort of printing work—automotive service manuals for use by service shops and garages, and other kinds of catalogs, forms, and manuals—although Dexter, unlike Standish, also does all the "preparation" work for both plants. Robert Adair testified that the Standish plant was established because it was thought to be "cost effective" to have another plant in the Detroit vicinity which was within a day's commute, with time left over; he later explained that the average cost of labor was less at Standish—"That is the reason we are there."[5]

There were at Standish two printing presses—a large, fast, sophisticated one called the Goss HV and a smaller, slower, older Color King.[6] Adair testified that early in 1985, he and brother John anticipated an increase in business and decided to trade in the Color King for another Goss HV, to be placed in the Standish plant. They contracted at the end of March to purchase a remanufactured Goss from Rockwell Graphic Systems, Inc., in Chicago.

The sale was originally planned to be consummated in June, but evidently the renovation was not completed by that month. However, on 15 July, a Rockwell representative dispatched a mailgram to Adair stating that the press was "expected to ship week of 7/29/85" and to be received on "7/31/85," and that Adair should arrange to have the payment balance ready to forward on "7/26/85." The press was never installed at Standish. Eventually, instead, it was sent to Dexter, and a smaller press called the Surburban, requiring fewer employees to operate, according to Robert Adair, was removed from Dexter and installed in place of the expected Goss at Standish.

The first question presented is why the plan was changed. The General Counsel and the Charging Party attribute the decision to the union activities of the Standish employees.

The record shows that at some time around late June, a Standish press employee named Larry Foster, another employee named Cynthia Johnson (both of them here alleged to be discriminatees), and "maybe 25–30 people" met in the lunchroom one morning after accidentally discovering that a less senior employee named Darrell Baughman (about whom more later) was earning a higher wage than other employees. The group chose six employees—including Foster and Johnson—to speak to Plant Manager Dennis Adair, son of Robert, "about seeing if we could get some insurance and a pay raise possibly."

A few days later,[7] the six spoke to Adair; he said that he would "get back to" them, but time passed and nothing happened.

One morning, a number of people in the lunchroom inquired about the results of the meeting with Adair. They "had like a vote" to investigate finding a union to help them, and appointed Foster to undertake the search.

Foster ultimately made contact with Thelma McConnell, an organizer for GCIU, and a meeting at a motel between McConnell, Foster, Johnson, and three other committee members ensued. The next day, the five employees explained to "the rest of the group" how a union could be organized. A week later, perhaps on 9 July, McConnell met with a "majority of the people" at the town hall, where she obtained a number of signed authorization cards. Present at the meeting as a result of Foster's invitation was Calvin Ireland, conceded by Respondent to be one of the only three statutory supervisors (including Dennis Adair) at the plant; Ireland also signed a card.[8]

The Union filed a petition with the Board on 15 July, and the 11 September election resulted in a 25–11 union victory.[9]

According to the General Counsel and the Charging Party, it was the appearance of the Union on the scene in July, and its subsequent victory in September, which led Respondent to change its mind about installing the newly refurbished five-or six-manned Goss in the Standish plant and to put it instead at Dexter, while sending the smaller three-or four-man[10] Suburban to Standish from Dexter to replace at Standish the Color King which had been traded in on the new Goss. The General treat it as a reply brief which neither the regulations specifically, nor I in my discretion (Allis-Chalmers Corp., 234 NLRB 350, 351 fn. 4 (1978)), has authorized, and I shall, to the best of my ability, ignore it.

[3] Errors in the transcript have been noted and corrected.

[4] There were 37 voters in the 11 September election.

[5] I found it difficult to believe that, as he testified, Adair could not quantify the comparative wage scales at the two plants because the record shows that he personally reviewed and signed each pay change, at least at Standish.

[6] At some material times, the Standish plant has operated a night shift limited to one press crew; normally, the rest of the plant—the binders, the shippers, etc.—does not work at night.

[7] Foster's testimony, from which this passage comes, is atrocious regarding dates and times.

[8] Respondent referred to Ireland at the hearing as "supervisor press department," not necessarily limited to the day shift.

[9] Respondent subsequently filed objections to the election; a hearing officer found the objections to be without merit on 22 November 1985; on appeal, the Board agreed and issued a certification of representation on 27 May 1986; and on 6 June, the Respondent filed a motion for reconsideration with the Board, which the Board denied on 24 September.

[10] Robert Adair testified that the Suburban "normal[ly]" takes a three-man crew; Judy Schumacher testified that when she worked on it, four people were required.

Counsel relies not only on the timing of the change and on what it considers to be weaknesses in Respondent's explanation of it, but also on certain statements and other indicia of unlawful motivation. We turn first to the latter contentions.

B. The Alleged Evidence of Motivation

1. Larry Foster testified that at some point between 9 July and 11 September, while he and Supervisor Ireland were operating the Color King, Foster said that he would be happy when it was replaced by the Goss (obviously a subject of common knowledge at the plant) because the King press was difficult to operate. According to Foster, Ireland "told me that I should not be too anxious in getting rid of the King press, because of the Union activity they could take and cancel the new Goss coming." Although Ireland testimonially conceded that he might have told Foster that the new press was coming, he denied that he also told him "it was not" coming or expressed an opinion that the press would come in if the Union did.

The complaint alleges that in or around September 1985, Supervisor Ireland "threatened employees that the delivery of the recently ordered Rockwell-Goss press was going to be delayed or cancelled because of the employees' support for the Charging Union and because of the Charging Union's organizing campaign." Although Foster's recall of the timing of events was abominable, he did not strike me as a dishonest person;[11] the whole of Ireland's testimony, on the other hand, left me doubting his reliability. Accordingly, I accept Foster's testimony as recited above.[12]

I conclude, moreover, that the statement alleged—made by an acknowledged supervisor and suggesting a possible link between "Union activity" and adverse action against the employees—is clearly coercive within the meaning of Section 8 (a)(1). That Foster invited Ireland to attend the first union meeting does argue, it is true, that Foster regarded the relationship between Ireland and the rank-and-file to be one of equality, thus mitigating the effect of the statement on Foster. At the same time, Foster also knew the side of Ireland which afforded the latter a desk (or two, according to employee Cummings) and daily employment involving, unlike the other employees, little or no routine manual labor in the regular course of his duties. The evidence also shows that Ireland signed disciplinary warnings in the "Signature of Foreman or Supervisor" Block and was thought to be in charge of all presswork in the shop, next to Adair. There was enough there, I believe, to lead Foster to believe that in speaking of such possibilities, Ireland was echoing the mindset of the employer. I therefore conclude that in making his assessment of the possibilities, Ireland violated Section 8(a)(1) as alleged. I further conclude that the statement by Ireland lends force to the contention that the diversion of the new Goss from the newly unionized Standish plant to the unorganized Dexter shop was motivated by union-related considerations.

2. A similar, but more definite, statement was attributed to Darrell Baughman, the night-shift press operator, by 3-year employee Brian Lachcik, who was, at the time, "press help" working with six other employees on the night shift. Lachcik testified that on one occasion, after the election, Baughman told the crew that "the new press is not coming in, it got shipped to Dexter." He went on to say it was "on account of the Union. He said once this Union is in, we ain't going to have the new press in. He said you should have waited until the new press come in before the Union came in. You should have put the new press in."

Baughman did not testify. There was, however, a good deal of testimony about him, and its aggregate leaves me convinced that Baughman was, or was apparently, in a position to make definitive pronouncements about the reason for management decisions.[13] He was the operator of the press at night, in charge of a crew of six people and also, because seldom were any other workers present, often "in charge" of the building (to which he had a key) as well.[14] Lachcik testified that when he went on the night shift, Adair introduced Baughman to him by saying, "[T]his is your foreman on the night shift, he is going to tell you what to do, you listen to him."

This admonition was arguably directed primarily to Baughman's control over the press. There is scant evidence in the record of real supervisory-type responsibility possessed by Baughman. Lachcik testified that if he felt ill, he would "ask . . . Darrell if I could go home," and Baughman would say, "okay, sometimes—if we got enough help you can go."[15] Baughman possessed neither the authority to hire, fire, nor impose discipline on the members of the night crew. The evidence does show that Baughman earned 50 cents per hour more than the day-shift press operator—Dennis Adair testified that the extra pay was because Baughman was an expert machinist, a licensed truckdriver, an expert press operator, and "very, very dependable"—but it will be recalled that, according to Foster, it was the extra 50 cents received by [11] Of the six instances of Foster's unreliability outlined in Respondent's brief, five have to do with the timing and duration of various events. As to the sixth—whether Foster was ever told that he was promoted to "press operator," Respondent asserts, inter alia, that "no other witness confirmed the alleged promotion." Supervisor Ireland, when asked on redirect what Foster's position was "during the summer of 1985," answered, "I believe press operator."

[12] I do not think, however, although I cannot be sure, that the conversation could have occurred as late as 9 July while Foster and Ireland were operating the Color King. The testimony is extremely confused as to when in 1985 Respondent stopped using the Color King. Foster elsewhere testified that the last such time was 2 July. On the other hand, Plant Manager Adair testified that the Color King was being used, but "very little," "during the summer."

[13] Even though Baughman did not testify, Lachcik's testimony is troublesome, in that he has Baughman saying, at once and the same time, that the new press "got shipped to Dexter" and "once this Union is in, we ain't going to have the new press in." There is clear tension between the conflict in tenses.

[14] So Dennis Adair conceded. Other nonsupervisory employees also had keys, however.

[15] On brief, the Charging Party misstates the testimony in also asserting that employee McMann "similarly has received permission from Baughman to leave the shift early." What McMann really testified on cross-examination was, "I would tell [Baughman] what the problem was, you know, and then he takes care of it from there . . . . I would leave."

Baughman which instigated the concerted activity in June, which suggests that the complaining employees viewed him as one of them. Baughman voted without objection in the election.

Of considerable importance is the fact that Dennis Adair stays in close contact with the night-shift operations. Lachcik testified that Adair would normally stay over 60 or 90 minutes into the 3:30 to midnight shift to help get the job going; would usually return to the plant about three times a week at 10 p.m. and "stay a couple of hours"; and, if he did not return in person, would call about 11 p.m. to monitor the job.[16]

Having considered, although not recited here, all the testimony regarding the asserted supervisory status of Baughman,[17] I am convinced that he does not qualify as a "supervisor" within the meaning of Section 2(11) of the Act. D. V. Copying & Printing, 240 NLRB 1276, 1281–1282 (1979). I agree with Respondent that, of the criteria there listed, the only one which might possibly apply to Baughman is the power "responsibly to direct" other employees, and this record shows neither that he "responsibly" directs the night crew, nor that he does so, as the Act also requires, with "the use of independent judgment." If the disputed employee in Bowne of Houston, 280 NLRB 1222 (1986), cited by Respondent, is not a supervisor, I do not see any possibility that Baughman would be so considered by the Board.

Nor, assuming that he was a leadman, can I conclude that he ostensibly possessed sufficient authority to be considered an agent of Respondent in the opinion of the other employees, so that they would impute to the employer any sentiments expressed by Baughman regarding the consequences of union activity.[18] Although Baughman apparently acted on occasion as if he thought he possessed managerial authority, there is no evidence that Respondent ever gave employees "just cause" for believing that Baughman's remarks regarding labor-management relations represented "the policies and desires of the management." Cf. Machinists Local 35 v. NLRB, 311 U.S. 72, 80 (1940); Helena Laboratories Corp. v. NLRB, 557 F.2d 1183, 1187 (5th Cir. 1977).

I therefore recommend dismissal of this allegation.

3. There was further testimony of the same stripe, however, which, although not alleged in the complaint as an unfair labor practice, shores up the General Counsel's claim of a connection between the union activity and the Respondent's change of heart about locating the new press.

Cynthia Johnson testified that she had several conversations with Rich Livingstone, Respondent's third admitted supervisor, after her layoff in September. At a discussion in a bar, a few weeks before the instant hearing, the bindery supervisor, Livingstone, said to Johnson and fellow employee Janet Johnson that "that is where we messed up. If we would have waited a couple more months, the new press would have been put in and we would have went ahead with the Union." Janet Johnson, a believable witness, gave testimony which confirmed that given by Cynthia Johnson; Livingstone was never produced to deny or explain the conversation. I credit the two employees.[19]

4. The complaint alleges that, in violation of Section 8(a)(1), at some time between 15 July and 11 September, Baughman told employees that because of the union activities, "he was watching them and recording their actions in a 'black book' and threatened that their jobs

[16] Adair testified that he returned on the average of "three, four" nights a week and called in "once or twice a night."

[17] Perhaps the most significant other evidence is that Baughman performs the apparently ministerial act of signing the employee timesheets.

[18] With respect to an issue to be discussed infra, I note the testimony of Lachcik that he and employee Kohn, seeing a notice about getting certain request forms from their "supervisor," asked Baughman who the "supervisor" of the night shift was.

[19] I also conclude that Respondent violated Sec. 8(a)(1) by virtue of Livingstone's remark. Although the complaint is silent on this discussion, and Livingstone failed to testify, the Board has told me that in such circumstances it is appropriate to rest an unfair labor practice finding on such uncontested testimony. Paul Distributing Co., 264 NLRB 1378 (1982). I, of course, defer. Respondent cites Barkman Contracting, 276 NLRB 1062 fn. 2 (1985), involving a backpay claim for certain calendar quarters for employees not listed in the specification, found by the Board not to have been "fully litigated." What the Board meant in this context is not discussed.

Respondent argues that there is no evidence that Adair ever communicated with Livingstone regarding the new press or knew of or authorized his remarks. It further asserts that Livingstone, the bindery supervisor, was in no position to speak authoritatively about the location of a press and was obviously venturing his own opinion, citing Abbey Island Park Manor, 267 NLRB 163 fn. 1 (1983), and that in such circumstances, "a discriminatory motive cannot be attributed to the employer simply as a result of casual statements made by supervisors," citing NLRB v. Swan Super Cleaners, 384 F.2d 609 (1967), and Dayton Food Fair Stores v. NLRB, 399 F.2d 153 (6th Cir. 1968).

There are two separate issues here—whether the remark constitutes evidence of Respondent's mindset, and whether it constituted a violation of Sec. 8(a)(1). Abbey Island involved an office clerical employee, clearly not a supervisor, who was also held not to be an agent "for hiring purposes" regarding a statement about the possibility of rehire made to an applicant. Swan Super Cleaners does not stand for so broad a proposition as that quoted above. In the present case, Livingstone was one of only three conceded supervisors at the plant, having direct authority over a bindery work force varying in size from 2 to 12. The presence or absence of a new Goss HV would obviously affect the volume of his own work, and so he would quite naturally have an interest in its disposition. When Adair was asked at the hearing whether he had ever "consult[ed]" Ireland or Livingstone about decisions to purchase and install equipment, his answer was a surprisingly weak, "No, I don't believe so. I don't recall ever doing that." The fact that, without explanation, Livingstone was not called as a witness to say that he made no such statement or was merely expressing his personal opinion is a strong ground for inferring that his testimony would be adverse to Respondent. It is, of course, possible that Livingstone (and Ireland) simply voicing their own sentiments about the effect of unionization on the location of the press, but it happened that they proved to be right. In this setting, I am inclined to believe that they knew something about Respondent's state of mind which the lesser employees did not know.

As for concluding that an 8(a)(1) violation was committed, the court in Dayton Food Fair Stores, supra, did hold that the remarks of a (arguendo) supervisor could not to constitute such a violation, attributable to the company because "[t]he remarks were made on Davis' own initiative, without the knowledge and consent of Food Fair. At most, they were hearsay evidence of the company's attitude, made by one sympathetic to the union campaign." The reference to "without the knowledge and consent of Food Fair" appears to be a factual finding made by the court; at least, I am unable to find it in the decision of the administrative law judge or that of the Board. But in Dayton, where the supervisor told an employee to "watch his step because the company knew of his activity," the Board held that Sec. 8(a)(1) had been violated, a conclusion which is binding on me (Iowa Beef Packers, 144 NLRB 615, 616 (1963), and I do not doubt that the Board would make a similar finding today, whether the supervisor was sympathetic to the union campaign (not shown to be true in Livingstone's case) or friendly with the employee to whom the remark was addressed.

were in jeopardy in the event they received a certain number of demerits." Brian Lachcik, who said that Baughman had never before spoken of a "black book," testified at first that "after the election" and "before the [objections] hearing," Baughman had told the night employees that he "had the little black book, and he was putting checks on it. He said three strikes [you're] out on the book." On cross, he reaffirmed that this occurred after the election, but his pretrial affidavit states that Baughman made the remark "during the campaign." Asked which was accurate, Lachcik replied, "I believe now it was probably after . . . the election."

William McMann, named by Lachcik as having been present on this occasion, testified for Respondent, but, regarding this incident, was only asked if he had ever "seen" a black book in Baughman's possession or heard him make "any threats to any employee"; his answers were in the negative.

Given McMann's failure to directly rebut Lachcik's testimony on the "black book" incident when the opportunity was there to do so, together with Baughman's failure to appear and deny, I feel constrained to accept Lachcik's testimony, even taking into account his prounion stance (he was one of the few employees who wore a homemade union button) and his confusion about the timing of this statement by Baughman.

Nonetheless, accepting arguendo that Baughman, contrary to my earlier conclusion, is a legal representative of Respondent, I perceive no basis for finding the violation of Section 8(a)(1) alleged in the complaint. The latter asserts that Baughman "told employees" that he had adopted the "black book" "because of their activities on behalf of the Charging Union and because of the Charging Union's organizing campaign." In fact, contrary to the General Counsel's assertion on brief, Lachcik did not testify that Baughman made any reference to "the employees' support for the union," nor, contrary to Charging Party's brief was the remark addressed only to Lachcik. In consequence, the necessary link to Section 7 concerted activities is absent, and I would find no basis for inferring one in the circumstances. I recommend dismissal of this allegation.

5. Further alleged as a violation of the Act (and asserted to be indicative of Respondent's attitude toward the Union) is Lachcik's undisputed testimony that a couple of weeks before the election, after Lachcik had caused a "bad accident," Baughman "advised" him to take his homemade union button off "before Denny sees it, he might get a little steamed on what happened here." Evidently Baughman himself had not objected to the wearing of the button, but thought that Adair, in conjunction with the accident, might. To me, this sounds like simply considerate advice, and not the "order" which the complaint alleges, and I would find no violation based on this event, even if I thought Baughman legally represented Respondent in some way.

6. Further alleged to be a violation of Section 8(a)(1) is an announcement posted by Respondent on about 13 September, 2 days after the election, which stated: "Anyone who is interested in revoking their authorization card which you signed prior to the election may do so by obtaining a request form from your supervisor." According to Respondent's testimony, this notice evolved from inquiries made by two employees about retrieving their cards.

Employees George Nott testified for the Respondent that, on election day, he asked Scott Merrill, one of Respondent's attorneys, what use the Union could make of the card earlier signed by Nott. When Merrill said the card could be used to fine him if Nott crossed a picket line, Nott asked how he could revoke the card. Merrill said he would draw up a revocation form and send it to Adair. Adair also testified that another employee, Arlene La Fever, broached him about revoking her card; she did not testify.

When union adherent Wayne Libbrecht saw the notice "a couple of days" after the election, he went to see Supervisor Ireland about it. Ireland told him to ask the office secretary, who handed him two stamped envelopes and a form letter addressed to the Union, the letter asking for return of the authorization card in the "stamped, addressed envelope which is enclosed."[20]

The complaint asserts that the posting of the notice and the implementation of the revocation system violated Section 8(a)(1) because it "could be used by Respondent to monitor which employees chose to revoke their union authorization cards, and which did not." The underlying assumption of this unusually specific allegation must be that the Respondent had knowledge of the identity of those employees who had signed cards. There is no direct evidence that Respondent possessed such knowledge, although it is very likely that Respondent assumed that certain employees such as Foster and Libbrecht, who wore union buttons in the plant, had done so, and it is arguable that Respondent knew of others through its Supervisor Ireland, who had been present at the July meeting when a number of employees had signed. In this limited sense, Respondent might have been capable of "monitor[ing]" the behavior of certain known or assumed signatories. Because we have no solid indication that Respondent was aware of any more than a handful of employees who had signed the cards, the claim that the system "could be used to monitor" which employees chose to revoke their union authorization cards, and which did not, seems fanciful.

More forceful is the contention (not expressly advanced in the complaint) that the suggestion to revoke cards, posted by the Respondent just 2 days after the union election victory, constitutes overarching interference with the private union affairs of employees and a calculated demonstration of defiance in the face of the union electoral success. The Board does not seem to have steered a particularly steady course in treating this sort of problem.[21] In considering what approach to apply in dealing with the employer who involves himself in the termination of the relationship between employees and unions, the Board has referred to several factors, in some cases stressing one or the other, in some cases failing to discuss seemingly pertinent prior precedent.

[20] It is not true, as the Charging Party asserts on brief, that employee Krozeleski obtained a form from Baughman; Krozeleski testified only that Baughman stated that employees on his crew "could come to him" for such forms.

[21] I say this with full appreciation of, and sympathy for, the constraints within which the Board has had to perform over the years.

I begin arbitrarily with Perkins Machine Co., 141 NLRB 697 (1963), in which an employer, by letter, brought to the attention of employees the contractual escape period for withdrawing from membership and revoking dues-checkoff authorizations. The employer enclosed two copies of a withdrawal form, and envelopes addressed to the union and the company. The cover letter stated that the company was merely informing the employees of their rights, that it was not urging resignation, and that the employee's decision would not affect his treatment by the company. The Board found nothing wrong with the employer bringing to the attention of its employees their contractual rights, noting the absence of threat or benefit and the company's assurances of neutrality and nonreprisal.

Cyclops Corp., 216 NLRB 857 (1975), involved the aftermath of a strike, where 13 employees spoke to the employer about withdrawal from checkoff. The company sent a letter to all employees notifying them of their withdrawal rights, and another letter informing each employee of his or her "anniversary date" for purpose of withdrawal, stating that the company "must" be notified of the employee's decision so that it would be apprised whether to continue deducting dues. The administrative law judge found Perkins applicable, despite the absence of any assurances by the employer of freedom of choice, and he assigned some weight to the fact that in Cyclops, unlike Perkins, 13 employees had evidently prompted the employer's action.

These two cases thus seem to say that an employer, without disavowing detriment to the employees, may lawfully choose to notify the employees of their rights to dissolve their relationship with a union voluntarily and provide them with information and forms to be used to that end, at least in a setting where a bargaining agreement imposes constraints on dissolution. In R. L. White Co., 262 NLRB 575 (1982), in which no contract existed, the Board appeared to apply a different standard. There, during the course of an organizing campaign, the employer distributed a leaflet answering the question of how an employee could revoke an authorization card, giving the addresses of the relevant local union and the Board Regional Office, and stating that the matter "is solely that employee's decision." The Board, without referring to Perkins or Cyclops, seemed to prohibit any "assistance" beyond information as to addresses, saying (at 576):

> An employer may lawfully inform employees of their right to revoke their authorization cards, even where employees have not solicited such information, as long as the employer makes no attempt to ascertain whether employees will avail themselves of this right nor offers any assistance,[5] or otherwise creates a situation where employees would tend to feel peril in refraining from such revocation. Aircraft Hydro-Forming, Inc., 221 NLRB 581, 583 (1975).

[5] The mere publication of the addresses of the Union and the Regional Office does not constitute unlawful assistance. See Tartan Marine Company, 247 NLRB 646, 655–656 (1980).

The Board dismissed the complaint, pointing to the facts that the employer "did not attempt to monitor" actual revocation, and had "assured employees" that the decision was solely theirs. White appears to stand for the proposition that any "assistance" beyond the furnishing of addresses renders the conduct in issue unlawful, as would an "attempt" by the company to keep track of which employees followed through, and that assurances to the employees of benign motivation have some meaning, even where no monitoring occurred.

Soon thereafter, Ace Hardware Corp., 271 NLRB 1174 (1984), came along. Citing Perkins and Cyclops, but not White, the Board found nothing wrong with an employer, in response to an employee's question about withdrawal from the union during a preelection speech, saying that it was not his job to help people get out of the union, but that if they would "come to him or members of management, he could assist them in getting out and would help them in any way possible." He also held up a dues-checkoff card and stated that he "would see what he could do" in helping in that area, on request. The Board found it to be established Board law that employers could "bring to employees' attention" their right to resign and revoke "so long as the communication is free of threat and coercion or promise of benefit. In both Perkins Machine Co. and Cyclops Corp., the Board approved the employer's supplying of withdrawal of information and forms." Thus, the seeming prohibition of White against giving "assistance" (aside from addresses) appeared to have been silently abandoned.

Four months later, however, in Mariposa Press, 273 NLRB 528, 529 (1984), the gospel according to White was, in part, resurrected. In Mariposa, the employer circulated a self-initiated (according to the administrative law judge, at 540) letter to employees, telling them how to go about rescinding a card, together with a sample letter of withdrawal. The Mariposa decision states:

> An employer may lawfully inform employees of their right to revoke their authorization cards even if employees have not solicited such information, as long as the employer makes no attempt to ascertain whether employees will avail themselves of this right nor offers any assistance or otherwise creates a situation in which employees would tend to feel peril in refraining from such revocation. R. L. White Co., 262 NLRB 575 (1982). Here, the Respondent did not attempt to monitor whether employees would actually revoke their authorization cards and there is no evidence that the Respondent requested or gave assistance to any employee.

The Board distinguished other cases by pointing out that preelection meetings in Mariposa, the employer had assured employees of their right to support a union and stated that it would not discriminate against any employer who desired "to vote for or talk up a union and if the union won, [the Respondent] would bargain with the Union." (Id. at 530.) Because the employer's letter to employees about their right to withdraw had set forth a sample statement to be copied and sent to the Union and the Board, it is clear that the Board did not consider such a sample as itself constituting "assistance," as it had implied in White.

Finally, University of Richmond, 274 NLRB 1204 (1985), failed to mention any of the foregoing cases. Before the election, "several" employees had questioned management about getting their cards returned. Thereafter, a management representative held meetings in which it told employees how to do so, and gave each employee a letter and stamped envelope addressed to the local regional director. The manager "explained that the employees were free to sign the letter and mail it or throw it out, and that management would not monitor their decision." The form letter states, in part, "I understand that my employer will not know either that I signed a card or that I requested its return." The Board dismissed the complaint, stating:

> The Board has held that an employer may lawfully assist employees in the revocation of their authorization cards when employees initiate the idea of withdrawal and have the opportunity to continue or stop the revocation process without the interference or knowledge of the employer.[5] Applying those principles here it is undisputed that employees initiated the idea of withdrawal by questioning Inlow and Hardy about the revocation process. The credited evidence also shows that Inlow assured employees that they were free to do with the letter as they wished and guaranteed them that the Respondent would not monitor their decision. There is no evidence that the Respondent coerced employees into requesting their cards back; nor did it exert pressure on employees to mail the letters. Instead, the decision to revoke the authorization card rested solely with each employee.[6] Therefore, we shall dismiss this complaint allegation.

[5] Jimmy-Richard Co., 210 NLRB 802, 803 (1974).

[6] We find the judge's reliance on Gayston Corp., 265 NLRB 1, 12 (1982), to be misplaced. In Gayston, the employer was engaged in a course of unlawful conduct, of which the distribution of union membership withdrawal forms was an integral part, calculated to cause employees to withdraw their support from the union . . . Gayston is inapposite because that factor is not present here.

White, supra, and Mariposa, supra, had expressly found irrelevant the fact that employees had not previously solicited information about withdrawal, so long as the employer, in broaching the subject, offered no improper "assistance." Richmond, on the other hand, seems to allow the employer to "lawfully assist," but only "when employees initiate the idea of withdrawal" and "have the opportunity to" revoke or not without the interference or knowledge of the employer, a factor apparently established in Richmond by the assurances given to employees "that they were free to do with the letter as they wished" and the "guarantee . . . that the Respondent would not monitor their decision."[22]

In attempting to synthesize the foregoing decisions, it seems fair to say that the Board has consistently held that an employer, even without having been asked, may bring to the attention of its employees the various rights they possess to rescind authorization cards, to withdraw from union membership, and to cancel dues-checkoff authorization.[23] There is, however, a distinction drawn in the cases between advising of the right to rescind and the furnishing of "assistance" in doing so. The result in Jimmy-Richard, supra, seems a sound one: the employer only gave out withdrawal forms to those employees who individually asked for one. But the Board has gone beyond that, on occasion,[24] and held that an employer, unprompted, may not only bring up the subject of revocation as a general matter with the employees (without employee instigation, Perkins, White, Mariposa) but may also offer assistance in the form of letters, envelopes, and addresses (only with employee instigation, Richmond). However, it is at this point, the Board has seemed to sense, that the danger of coercion becomes more concrete.

When all the employees are advised by the employer of their right to withdraw cards (even though perhaps, as in the instant case, only one or two may have inquired about the subject), without any indication why the employer has been provoked to advise them, an instinctive feeling arises that many of the card-signing employees, not fully cognizant of the extent of the employer's knowledge regarding the identity of signers, might consider it discreet to accommodate the employer by signing and sending off the forms. That would appear to be the reasoning behind the Board's frequent emphasis, as recently as Richmond (Inlow assured employees that they were free to do with the letter what they wished and guaranteed them that Respondent would not monitor their decision), on the fact that the employer has in one way or another conveyed to the employees that the choice is theirs and that no harm will come to them from a failure to comply.

In the present case, with an exception to be discussed below, it is important to note that Respondent did not indiscriminately pass out forms, etc., to the employees; it only posted notices telling "[a]nyone who is interested in [22] The Board's citation of Jimmy-Richard in Richmond seems to apply the limited principle of the former case to the rather different factual case found in the latter. In Jimmy-Richard, the employer only gave withdrawal forms to those employees who specifically requested them from management, without any prior prompting from the latter. In Richmond, management launched a series of employee meetings and distribution of forms to all employees after only "several" employees had inquired about withdrawing.

[23] In a preelection context, the right to urge rescission of cards makes some sense: the results might be, for example, that the union would lose the 30-percent showing of interest necessary to the holding of an election. Postelection and precontract advisories, however, seem more difficult to rationalize, particularly in the present case—while we have no authorization cards in evidence, they evidently did not also constitute "membership" cards, because the testimony shows that there would be no membership for these employees unless a contract was signed. Thus, the advice to an inquiring employee that he could be fined for crossing the picket line during a hypothetical strike appears to be erroneous.

[24] But see White, supra; Mariposa, supra; and Tartan Marine, supra.

revoking their authorization card which you signed prior to the election may do so by obtaining a request form from your supervisor." This offer would, I think, nonetheless tend to induce a state of uncertainty and concern in at least the more timid card-signers: Does the employer know about my signing a card? Will I get into trouble if I do not accept his offer of a rescission form?

As indicated, it appears to be the Board's position that this kind of potentially coercive notification can and should be mitigated by assurances given by the employer that the employees will suffer no penalty if they fail to send in the form. (Perkins, supra; White, supra; Mariposa, supra; Richmond, supra; contra, Cyclops, supra). In this case, however, Respondent gave no such assurances. As I conclude the body of precedents, the failure to do so in these circumstances imbued the bare notices with a reasonable tendency to coerce employees in the exercise of their Section 7 rights and thereby violated Section 8(a)(1).[25] Moreover, to the extent that "lawful . . . assist[ance]" is permitted by Richmond only "when employees initiate the idea of withdrawal," the one or two employees who assertedly raised the question here contrasts unfavorably with the "several" employees who inquired in Richmond.

In any event, there is specific evidence that one acknowledged supervisor went out of his way to confront employees with the fact that such forms were available. Employee Cummings testified that he had been approached by Ireland about the availability of such forms, and Ireland also testified that he "took it upon himself" to "let the employees know that I had forms to fill out to revoke their authorization cards." He said that he did not think the notices were posted as of that time, but that seems most unlikely.

It is, I believe, especially coercive conduct for a supervisor to approach individual employees and reinforce the posted revocation message. Putting employees in the limelight and on the spot in such a fashion clearly has a reasonable tendency to influence them in the exercise of the rights authorized and protected by Section 7. I conclude that Ireland's individual approaches to employees about revocation of their cards thereby violated Section 8(a)(1).[26]

[25] One might argue that the Board should outlaw altogether these wholesale efforts by employers to persuade or suggest to employees the possibility of withdrawing from or changing their relationship with unions. The nature of that relationship is really none of the employer's business, in almost all situations; and the potential for coercion would appear to outweigh—assurances or not—any conceivable legitimate purpose to be served by an employer intruding itself into the private association between employee and union.

[26] Although this aspect of the activity related to the withdrawal forms was not alleged in the complaint, it could not have been more fully litigated, having issued from Ireland's own mouth, and is therefore subject to a finding of violation. "It is settled law that the Board may find an unfair labor practice when the issue has been fully litigated even though it had not been specifically pleaded in the complaint." NLRB v. Bighorn Beverage, 614 F.2d 1238, 1241 (9th Cir. 1980). The same principle applies to the more general violation just found. Although the complaint spells out a theory, which I reject (the revocation procedure "could" be used to "monitor" those employees who chose to revoke and those who did not), it is clear that the lawfulness of the procedure itself was being put in question, and I cannot believe that the issue could have been more comprehensively litigated than it was.

7. On or about 13 September, 2 days after the election and perhaps the same day that the revocation notice just discussed was posted, Dennis Adair posted the following notice:

> To All Adair Standish Employees.
> Now that the election is behind us, we can go back to "business as usual." I have been trying to be very careful in these past few months to make sure no one felt like he or she was being singled out for discipline because of his or her views on unionism.
>
> As a result, I have now [sic; obviously should be "not"] enforced some of our Company policies as strictly as I have in the past—especially the Company attendance policy. It is important for everyone to be at work on time each day. Failure to do so without prior authorization from someone in management will result in disciplinary action immediately.
> When you don't show up on time it puts that much more of a burden on us as well as all of your fellow workers. This isn't fair to the people who are dedicated to making the Company work. Thank you for your cooperation.

Paragraph 15(a) of the complaint alleges that the notice constitutes an announcement that certain policies would be enforced more strictly than in the immediate past, in retaliation against the union activities of the employees and the Union's success at the polls 2 days earlier; paragraph 15(b) charges that a written reprimand issued to employee Tim Cummings on 17 September and a 2-day disciplinary suspension issued to employee Edward Lachcik on the same day were the unlawful product of this more strict enforcement of the rules as announced in the 13 September posting; and paragraph 16(a) asserts that the posting constituted unilateral action violative of the Union's right to be consulted as provided by Section 8(a)(5).

a. The 8(a)(3) violations. The threat against those employees who do not report "on time each day"—was clearly a new and more stringent policy than had obtained in the past. The witnesses agreed that the only prior published rule pertaining to lateness was a sign stating that employees would forefeit 12 minutes pay for each tardiness, and the evidence shows that this longstanding practice continued throughout the preelection campaign period. The published threat of a new, undefined, and "immediate" "disciplinary action" was an unprecedented event, and one may reasonably infer (as the employees very likely did) that it signaled a hardened attitude by management toward them as a result of the union victory of 2 days before. That the Company was still doggedly battling the Union by virtue of this threat could only have been confirmed by the appearance at the same time—2 days after the election—of the notice offering to assist in retrieving authorization cards.

This is not to say that Respondent had not disciplined employees in the past for attendance problems, but the imposition of discipline had seemingly been a capricious thing. Dennis Adair testified that he had discharged employee Dobler, and others whom he could not recall, for tardiness, but no personnel records were produced. He further testified that he had in the past given written warnings to Dobler, Ed Lachcik, Raymond Moore, and Calvin Ireland, but no copies were kept of this sort of discipline until the plant obtained a copying machine in the spring of 1985. Employee Tim Cummings testified on cross-examination that he believed that Dobler and Mooer had received warnings slips years before, and that Dobler was fired for absenteeism. He further agreed that others had been terminated for not reporting on time, usually after receiving warnings, but he believed that employees were first orally warned before they received written warnings. (He told Ray, "30 days if you are late, in 30 days you are going to get a written warning.")

The only copies of such warnings entered into evidence by Respondent—given a possible postcopier range of around April 1985 to 22 September 1986, the last day of the hearing—were a 4 April 1985 warning notice to Lachcik for "lateness" and "absence," with the warning that "2nd notice will have discipline[sic] action"; and a "2nd notice" dated 7 May 1985, noting the same deficiencies and threatening: "If you are late or miss a day during the month of May, employment will be terminated." Clearly, the threat in the first notice that a second notice "will have discipline[sic] action" was not to be taken seriously.

On 17 September 1985, however, Lachcik received a 2-day suspension for "third notice of lateness." The timecards pertaining to Lachcik put into evidence by Respondent encompass an 8-week period beginning with the week ending 4 August and terminating in the week ending 22 September 1985.[27] They show that Lachcik was late once in the first week, on time in the second, late twice in the third week, on time in the fourth, tardy twice in the fifth week, once in the sixth, three (substantial) times in the seventh, and none in the eighth (in which he worked only 3 days because of the suspension). The 17 September suspension notice does not state which (if less than all) of the latenesses brought about the discipline.

On the same day that Lachcik was suspended, dayshift press operator Cummings, a 7-year employee, received from Adair a written warning citing "Lateness" and reading, "You must be here on time!" Cummings' lateness record for the same 8-week period as that pertaining to Lachcik was proffered by Respondent and was at least as unimpressive as Lachcik's: one lateness in the week ending 22 August, three the following week, once the week thereafter, twice in the next week, none in the subsequent week, twice the next week, twice the week after that (including a 90-minute absence on the day of the election), and none in the final week (after receipt of the written warning). Three on-time working days elapsed between the last tardiness and the 17 September notice.

That Respondent acted within the bounds of the law in issuing a warning slip to Cummings on 17 September is put in issue by his testimony that he had had "a rash of tardiness since about December" of 1984, and that while Adair had mentioned to him in March or April 1985 Cummings' responsibility to be on time, the "rash" continued without penalty, other than the normal sanction of loss of paid time.[28] To the question whether a survey of Cummings' timecards going back to January 1985 would show that he was late about as many times as are shown on the eight August and September cards in evidence, Cummings answered, "I would think so, yes."

This question was asked and answered prior to a 6-week hiatus in the hearing. It should have inspired Respondent to refute Cummings' testimony, if untrue, by producing documentation to the contrary. No such documentation was introduced when the hearing resumed. I consider it reasonable, therefore, to draw the inference that Cummings' claim of 9 or 10 months of frequent and previously undisciplined tardiness is supported by the record.

This indicates, I think, that the notice did announce, and Respondent did implement, a new and more stringent tardiness policy a few days after the election. If, as I infer, Cummings was consistently late from December 1984 to the following September, and only once, in March or April, drew a rebuke, after which he continued to be tardy without sanction, it seems fair to conclude that Respondent was willing—or resigned—to accept Cummings as he was.[29] The written warning of 17 September bespeaks a decidedly different approach, and the only apparent explanation of the differences lies in the union election victory of 11 September.

There is no evidence in the record that Cummings was a notorious union adherent, but that is beside the point. His record shows that before the 13 September announcement, Respondent had not maintained the policy proclaimed on that day—that if an employee does not report "on time each day," his or her tardiness "will result in disciplinary action immediately." That this was a far cry from the past practice is demonstrated by the testimony of Supervisor Ireland, who said, "We have on occasion if people miss too much time or [are] late too often, we warn them with a written notice." I attribute the change to the lost election—indeed, the fact that Adair issued two written disciplines on the same day, only 6 days subsequent to the election, after a 10-year tenure as plant manager during which he could testimonially identify only four employees who had received written warnings, probably speaks for itself—and find that the [27] Thus, we do not know the tenor of Lachcik's attendance record from 7 May, his last disciplinary notice, to the end of July.

[28] Adair testified that before the warning notice, he had had "several" discussions with Cummings about his tardiness. In general, I did not find Adair to be a reliable witness. As an example, Adair testified that Foster has never been a press operator, while, as noted above, Respondent's witness Ireland, asked about Foster's status during the summer of 1985, replied, "I believe press operator." This is consonant with Foster's testimony that, for the short period in that summer in which the Color King press was operational, Adair told him he was the "press operator." I would give credence to Cummings in a conflict with Adair.

[29] Cummings testified on cross-examination that, in a conversation with Livingstone, the latter asked Cummings if he "deserved" the pink slip, and he answered, "I said I deserved it when I was being late, not after the election." I do not believe that this was necessarily a concession that Cummings deserved the warning, but was, rather, more an iteration of his opinion, previously expressed, that there was something suspicious about the delay.

rule change violated Section 8(a)(3). I also find that the change, as it affected Cummings, violated the same section.

The Lachcik case is somewhat more difficult. Unlike Cummings, Lachcik was already encumbered by two warnings; the record shows, although with imprecision, that other employees had been in the past suspended or discharged after compiling a disciplinary record; and it seems possible that Lachcik's performance in August and September might possibly have earned him a 2-day suspension in preunion days. Given, however, the entirely capricious and unpredictable manner in which tardiness was handled in the past, it seems reasonable to conclude that insofar as the discipline of Lachcik was rendered under the aegis of the new policy, it too might never have been imposed in the absence of that decree. I would therefore recommend finding a violation concerning the Lachcik allegation.

b. The 8(a)(5) violations. As for Respondent's failure to satisfy its obligation to bargain with the Union subsequent to the 11 September election, the law has taken the consistent course that after a union has won an election, the employer is immediately bound to bargain with the union about changes in working conditions, even though objections have been filed by the employer and no certification has issued. NLRB v. Laney & Duke Storage Warehouse Co., 369 F.2d 859, 869–870 (5th Cir. 1966), enfg. in pertinent part 151 NLRB 248 (1965); Catholic Medical Center, 236 NLRB 497, 500 (1978); Mike O'Connor Chevrolet-Buick-GMC Co., 209 NLRB 701, 703 (1974). A material change in the disciplinary system is a subject about which the Union was entitled to receive notification and be afforded the opportunity to bargain; before the new policy was announced, it had received neither. Similarly, although I am recommending dismissal of the 8(a)(3) allegations relating to Larry Foster and Cynthia Johnson, their layoff was subject to collective bargaining; Respondent, however, simply announced the action directly to the two employees as a fait accompli. In so doing, Respondent violated Section 8(a)(5) of the Act in both instances. Clements Wire & Mfg., 257 NLRB 1058, 1059 (1981), and cases cited.[30]

8. The complaint alleges that on 22 October, the day before the commencement of a Regional hearing on Respondent's objections to the election, Respondent's counsel violated Section 8(a)(1) by interviewing employees without assuring the employees that "they did not have to meet with counsel and answer his questions or in any other way indicate that the employee's [sic] participation in said interrogation was wholly voluntary" and by attempting to secure information which was "unreasonably beyond the scope of his preparation for the hearing on Respondent's objections," thus constituting "coercive interrogation of the employees' union activities."

Only one employee testified on behalf of the General Counsel on this issue. Carol Barber was one of the five employees whom Respondent's Attorneys Coleman and Merrill had indicated to Adair that they wished to interview. Adair asked Barber if she would "mind staying" on 22 October to talk to the company lawyers. She said she would do so.

Barber testified that when she was taken into the office and introduced to Coleman and Merrill, Coleman told her that "what [she] had to say would not affect [her] job or [her] position or the trial the following day." Coleman then allegedly asked if she "knew who had brought the Union in"; if she "had signed a green card"; if she "had signed anything else"; "if anybody else had signed anything [sic]"; and "if anybody else was members of the Union."[31]

Merrill, she testified, asked a couple of questions, having to do with whether Foster "sat at the table" (presumably at union meetings) with the union officials, and whether initiation fees had been waived. She denied that anyone had told her that she did not have to answer questions, that she did not have to stay, and that she had an option to answer a question or not.

Barber made a positive personal impression, but some of her testimony on cross gives considerable pause. On another subject, when asked what the company layoff policy was, she answered, "Generally for a while there it was the lowest one in seniority working [who was first laid off]," but then, asked whether it was not true that Adair "lays off whoever he wants" regardless of seniority, Barber answered "Yes" adding, "There is no policy." But then she stated, "Since I have been there, it is the least seniority. We were last hired in, we were first laid off. Asked whether her affidavit conceded that Adair has not followed seniority for layoffs, Barber replied, "Sometimes he does, sometimes he doesn't." But she immediately termed "accurate" the following quotation from her affidavit: "The employer's past practice with regard to layoff and recall of employees has been that it has not followed seniority and Dennis Adair has laid off or recalled whoever he has wanted."

Contrary to Barber, Attorney Merrill testified that it was he who asked Barber the majority of the questions put to her, Attorney Coleman having posed only one or two questions initially and then having left the room. Merrill stated that he prefaced his questioning of Barber and the other employees as follows:

[30] Respondent's brief ignores the Mike O'Connor line of cases completely and concentrates on the irrelevant question of whether there had been a formal request for "bargaining" by the Union before the election. Although the argument is beside the point, I note that it must require a supreme effort of will to assert, as Respondent does, that none of the three letters sent by the Union on 12 July 1985 "unequivocally demands that the Company bargain with the Union," given the Union's statements in one of the letters to Adair that (1) the majority of the employees had designated the Union as their bargaining representative; (2) the latter "claims the right to represent them"; (3) the Union "stands ready to meet . . . to discuss the matter of recognition"; and (4) "If the Company agrees to recognize the Union as representative of its Production and Maintenance employees and agrees to bargain collectively on the terms of a labor contract, the Union will be pleased to withdraw the NLRB petition."

Eagle Material Handling, 224 NLRB 1529 (1976), enfd. 558 F.2d 160 (3d Cir. 1977), cited by Respondent, is an entirely different case. There, the union had lost the election before the employer's unilateral changes, and the Board accordingly found no violation of Section 8(a)(5). When a union wins an election, even though it has not been certified and has "not yet requested the Respondents to bargain," the employers nonetheless undertake unilateral action "only at their peril." Laney & Duke Storage, supra at 266–267.

[31] On cross, however, she attributed this question to Merrill.

> I then informed the employees, each employee as they entered the room, and after we had introduced our names, that they did not have to talk to us, that their participation had to be voluntary. I then explained that we were going to ask them some questions that were going to be used as possible testimony at the hearing the next day. I told each employee that I had no desire to know on [sic] their views of the unionism either before or against the unionism [sic], and I told the employees that whatever they said would not be used either favorably or disfavorably towards the employment position with the company. And that the employee could refuse to answer any question if he felt it was too personal or didn't want answer the question.

A 2-1/2-page affidavit given by Merrill to the Board on 25 October, however, did not support this testimony. The affidavit focuses on his prehearing interrogation of employees, and the pertinent portion reads:

> At the start of each of the meetings with the individual employees, I introduced myself as an attorney for the company. I told them the company was involved in a hearing the next day concerning possible misconduct by the union during the campaign. I told each of them that they might be a possible witness at the hearing and I needed to review any possible testimony with them. I gave each the following assurance: I told each that whatever response they made would not have any adverse impact [initialed by Merrill] on their job or working conditions [initialed] at the company. I also told them that their response would not have any favorable impact on their jobs. I told them I was not interested on [sic] their views on whether they were for or against the union, but was just interested as to whether he (or she) had any knowledge about statements, threats, or other acts of intimidation by the union [initialed]. This is all I told them about the purpose of the meeting. With the exception of Barber, who I knew had been subpoenaed by the union to appear at the hearing, I told the others that they would be compensated by the Employer for their appearance at the hearing.

At the present proceeding, Merrill maintained that although he had told the Board agent who took his affidavit that he "had given the voluntary assurances, that I told employees that they did not have to respond," the agent had inadvertently omitted this portion of Merrill's statement from the affidavit, and then, compounding the omission, Merrill had failed to notice this missing language when he "hurriedly" read over the affidavit (even though he had initialed corrections of typing errors as he did so). His haste resulted from the fact that he had spent a day of overseeing affidavit-giving by Respondent's witnesses and was in a hurry to return to Washington from Detroit. He further gave the seeming unlikely testimony that he had not read over the copy of the short affidavit, which had accompanied him back to Washington, until shortly after 15 November, when the complaint issued, even though he knew that the attorney's prehearing interviews were a subject of investigation. When asked whether he then wrote to the Regional Office to formally supplement his affidavit, he replied that he had not done so, but had instead telephoned the Board investigator to tell him that the affidavit was in error (as shown above, the complaint claimed, in part, that the employees had not been told that "they did not have to meet with counsel and answer his questions").[32]

Having testified on direct that Coleman had "initially asked [Barber] one or two questions" before he departed, Merrill agreed on cross that his affidavit also erred in stating, "I did all of the interrogations of the individuals. Coleman may have present [sic] for the first meeting (with Tim Krozeleski) but he did not attend the others as I was the only lawyer present for them." While he recalled that Coleman did not ask Barber any "substantive" questions, he could not "recall which questions he asked her" of a nonsubstantive nature.

Like Barber, Merrill was a personally impressive witness, but his testimony leaves much to be desired. Three other witnesses offered confirmation, in varying degrees, of Merrill's testimony. Adair testified that he had been instructed by the lawyers to notify the witnesses that they "didn't have to stay and speak" to the lawyers, and that he did so; he further recalled that Merrill told Barber that the interview was voluntary and she did not have to answer the questions. Employee Krozeleski testified that Adair told him the attorneys would "like to talk to me if I wanted to." All he could remember of his 10-minute talk with Attorney Merrill was:

> A. That it was—if I wanted to speak with you and stay to discuss anything?
> Q. And what, if anything else, was told to you?
> A. Well, that's about it. And I agreed to stay to discuss.

Krozeleski could not remember whether he had been informed that he would be a witness at the hearing or even whether the hearing was mentioned.

Employee McMann, who had been appointed press operator only 3 months before, was more helpful to Respondent: "You [Merrill] were very cautious and you told me who you were and that you represent the company and that—the union is trying to come in there and that [Sic]. And you told me it was very voluntary if I wanted to talk to you or not and that. And I said, yeah, I can talk to you and that, and so we talked." Overall, McMann seemed a reasonably honest witness, but he seemed somewhat anxious to give answers favorable to the Respondent on examination regarding the supervisory status of Baughman.

The parties agree that the governing ground rules here are set forth in Johnnie's Poultry Co., 146 NLRB 770, 774–775 (1964), enf. denied on other grounds 344 F.2d 617 (8th Cir. 1965), in which where the Board lists the "specific safeguards" necessary to afford an employer the "privilege" of questioning employees before a hearing:

[32] The Board agent was not called from Detroit to give rebuttal to Merrill's testimony, which was the next-to-last testimony given on the last day of the hearing in Midland, Michigan.

> Thus, the employer must communicate to the employee the purpose of the questioning, assure him that no reprisal will take place, and obtain his participation on a voluntary basis; the questioning must occur in a context free from employer hostility to union organization and must not be itself coercive in nature; and the questions must not exceed the necessities of the legitimate purpose by prying into other union matters, eliciting information concerning an employee's subjective state of mind, or otherwise interfering with the statutory rights of employees.

Despite the flaw in the testimony of Barber,[33] it is not easy to feel confident here that she was told of her right to "participate on a voluntary basis." Merrill testified that he had been told, when he gave his affidavit, that "there was some indication that proper warnings may not have been given." He went on to say that he told the Board agent that "I had given the voluntary assurances, that I told employees that they did not have to respond." The likelihood of the Board agent having omitted this from the affidavit and the likelihood that Merrill "neglected" to notice the omission when he read over the affidavit before he signed seem remote indeed, as does the assertion that he did not again check over the short document on his return to Washington. I was not overly impressed with the confiriming evidence offered by Respondent, as discussed above, and, although the decision is not an easy one, I would be more inclined to believe that Merril simply forgot to give Barber the assurance of her right to abstain.[34]

However, two of the other "boundaries" mapped out in Johnnie's Poultry were also "transgresse[d]" here, thus in any event making the interrogation of Barber unlawful under the scheme of that case. The "context" was plainly not "free of employer hostility to union organization." Before the election, Respondent had sent its employees a letter relating that in the forthcoming weeks it would be discussing "all the disadvantages of Unions and how you and your families could be seriously hurt by union representation."[35] It decided not to install the new press at Standish, a decision openly attributed by Supervisor Ireland to Foster as being related to the union effort. Within days after the election, Respondent continued visibly to battle the Union: it posted a new and more restrictive disciplinary system; it imposed discipline on employees Lachcik and Cummings for behavior theretofore tolerated (at least in Cummings' case) for many months; and it went out of its way to influence employees to revoke their authorizations to the newly selected Union. It is safe to say that the questioning did not "occur in a context free of employer hostility to union organization."

In addition, Merrill's questioning did "exceed the necessities of the legitimate purpose" of preparation for the hearing on objections "by prying into other union matters." Respondent had filed five objections to the election, to two of which (alleged objectionable conduct under NLRB v. Savair Mfg. Co., 414 U.S. 270 (1973)), it later produced no evidence. The third and fourth objections related to the possibility that employees Lachcik and Naiman had made various threats to other employees. The fifth sought to show that Foster had, one night in August, come to Adair's house and overturned some garbage cans.

Under prevailing law, Respondent had a legitimate interest in attempting to prove at the hearing on objections that Lachcik, Naiman, and perhaps Foster were "agents" of the Union.[36] To inquire into these questions, it was unnecesary to "ask . . . all of the employees who, in their minds, the main representative of the union among the employees was," as Merrill himself states in his affidavit.[37] Moreover, while Merrill testified as to some questions which he had put to Barber, he did not expressly deny having asked other questions earlier attributed by her to him, such as the legally irrelevant "who had brought the Union in" (the proper question would have specifically referred to Foster, Naiman, and Lachcik), "if anybody else had signed anything," and "if anybody else was members of the Union."[38]

Accordingly, because I conclude that the questioning of Barber failed to explain her right to refrain from answering, was overbroad, and occurred in a context unacceptable according to Johnnie's Poultry, Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1).[39]

C. The Diversion of the Goss HV and the Layoff of Foster and Johnson: 8(a)(3) Allegations

The foregoing discussion considers several of the unfair labor practices alleged in the complaint, both before and after to the election, on which the General Counsel would rely as tending to prove that Respondent's motivation in redirecting the newly purchased press from Standish to Dexter was informed by antiunion considerations. The General Counsel would, in addition, use this background for purposes of inferring that the layoff of union adherents Foster and Johnson on or about 25

---

[33] In her favor is her willingness to testify that she was told at the outset that "what [she] had to say would not affect [her] job or [her] position or the trial the following day."

[34] There is some additional support for this conclusion in the statement in Merrill's affidavit that he told employees that he "needed to review" any possible testimony they might give, which clearly implies that the employees had no choice in the matter.

[35] Although not alleged to be an unfair labor practice—indeed, the latter was offered by Respondent for another purpose—the warning of "serious hurt" to employees and their families strikes me as a distinct showing of "employer hostility." Kenco Plastics Co., 260 NLRB 1420 (1982) (animus may be inferred from lawful activity).

[36] Although the objection based on Foster's alleged foray into Adair's garbage seems truly frivolous.

[37] Merrill did not testify to having posed this question. The closest he came testimonially was that, to gather evidence on "an issue of agency involving Mr. Foster," he asked Barber "if she had received an authorization card" and "who she had received it from." Although Respondent's brief states that Merrill asked Barber "whether Foster had given other individuals authorization cards . . . (Tr. 727-730)," Merrill did not so testify, either at the cited pages or anywhere else.

[38] I think that Barber probably erred in imputing most of these questions to Coleman; I suspect that Merrill was, in large measure, the interrogator.

[39] Although the complaint does not expressly mention the "context" criterion of Johnnie's Poultry, the context to which I refer was fully contested in the course of litigating this case. In any event, the sole factor of exceeding the necessary scope of inquiry would bring the principle, and the violation, into play.

September was similarly inspired. We turn first to Respondent's change of mind regarding the location of the new press.

The reader would do well to re-read the first few pages of this decision at this point. In brief, Respondent purchased in May 1985 from Rockwell International a reconditioned high-powered press which it admittedly intended to install in its Standish plant, replacing the older, slower Color King located there (and trading in the latter on the "new" press). An employee union effort began at Standish around the end of June and resulted in a union election victory on 11 September; for asserted reasons to be explored hereafter, the new press was eventually put into storage, and it was not until May 1986 that it was installed—but at Dexter, Respondent's other plant, rather than at Standish. On its face, this turn of events smacks of a motivation tainted by organizational considerations, and two admitted supervisors, as found above, made such a connection in talking to employees about the reasoning behind this volte face.

Respondent's principal witness on the subject of its decision to install the newly purchased Goss at Dexter instead of Standish was President Robert Adair; his brother John, who assertedly shared in making the decision, inexplicably did not testify. Robert Adair was a personally satisfactory witness, but his testimony, studied as a whole, seems inconsistent and improbable.

He testified that the intent in opening the Standish plant in 1976 was primarily to produce service manuals, price lists, etc., for the automotive industry in Detroit (General Motors and its components, Ford, Chrysler, and American Motors), the same type of work done at Dexter for many years—"that is our market, the automotive manual market." Adair testified that he and brother John were "very optimistic" about the state of their business at the beginning of 1985, based on recent experience, and decided to trade in the Color King at Standish and install a second Goss HV there. After contracting in March for the press with Rockwell, which undertook to recondition the press, they hoped to have it delivered in May and running by July, but delays kept it from being finished until September. Actually, the "tentative" scheduled contract date for shipment was "June 1985." What Adair failed to mention was that, by an addendum signed by him on 20 May 1985, Respondent additionally purchased "1-Lot parts necessary to reverse the quarter fold fly arrangement," which presumably added some time to Rockwell's reconditioning work.

Reference has been made to the 15 July mailgram from Rockwell to Respondent announcing that the former "expected to ship week of 7/29/85" with receipt by Respondent on "7/31/85." Appearing as the General Counsel's witness, a Rockwell managerial employee, Glenn Hill, testified that in "June," Rockwell's sales manager and Adair had verbally "agreed" that the press "would not be ready" until September. This sounds like a curious sort of arrangement. Hill could not say that the press was not in fact ready for delivery in July, as the mailgram indicates, and he agreed that when Rockwell sends such a mailgram, chances are very small that the equipment is not delivered by the estimated date; he did not indicate the reasons for delays in the estimated "less than one or two precent" of such instances. Adair testified that unanticipated delays precluded such shipment in July and August, but he said there was no such later documentation like the mailgram. This also seems peculiar; if Rockwell was accustomed to notifying of probable arrival by mailgram, one would assume that it would also announce delays in the same manner.

"[S]ometime" in September, Adair says, notice was received from Rockwell that the press was ready, and Adair, brother John, and son Dennis went to Chicago to inspect it. After finding the press to be in order, Adair told Rockwell that he was unsure where the press would be installed, and he asked Rockwell to store it for him. He testified, "They agreed to store it until January of 1986."[40] This appears to mean that in September, Adair was already planning on keeping the new press out of commission until at least January.

Adair's first explanation for this decision was that in "June" 1985, when the bids were let for the 1986 car manuals, "we found that we had lost a great deal of work that we had the previous year," Chevrolet being a "large portion" of it. Instead of the anticipated 10- to 15-percent increase, catalog division experienced a 17-percent decline. Most of the work, he said, was lost to Canadian printers taking advantage of the exchange rate. Adair continued, "And the other thing that happened in June that made me think twice about this press is that General Motors photographic announced a $4 to $6 million dollar expansion of their facilities to handle more work. That is in process now, which made me realize that in a year or 2 years down the road from last spring, there was going to be a lot less General Motors work available to outside printers such as ourself [sic]. And that is when we decided that we had made a mistake." Adair stated that in June, he asked Bob Bowers of Rockwell "what would happen if we cancel this order," and Bowers replied, "We would probably try to hold you to the contract." Bowers was not called to testify about this conversation.

There are several problems here. One is that Hill, financial manager of Rockwell's customer service group in Chicago, testified that in speaking with Robert Adair in early September, the latter told him that "business was real good and they were thinking of creating a third satellite plant . . . possibly in Michigan, or possibly in Indiana" and the new press would go to the third satellite plant if he opened one. When Adair testified thereafter, he was not asked to comment on or refute Hill's undoubtedly accurate testimony.

At trial, Respondent placed much stress on the fact that it discovered in June 1985 that it had failed to win "probably seven or eight" separate bids for the automotive manuals for the Chevrolet division. However, Adair was not reluctant to state that he had "many times" lost annual bids which the firm had previously been performing of the same "magnitude" as the Chevrolet bids that were lost in 1985. After the loss of the Cheverolet bids,

[40] There is no support whatever in the record for Respondent's claim on brief that "the decision to warehouse the new Goss H.V. press . . . was made . . . before the Company had any knowledge of union organizing activity [ie., before July]."

the firm subsequently went after other business: "We got some, but [the total volume] went down." Adair testified that for fiscal year 1985, ending 30 June 1985, total sales volume for the two plants had been $9 million, a figure that slipped approximately $1 million for fiscal year 1986.[41]

Analysis reveals that the core issue here of why the change of plans was made so that the new press wound up at Dexter rather than Standish is only tangentially related to Respondent's sales as of June 1985; the real issue is not whether the press was needed after June, but why it was placed in one location rather than the other. Respondent's handling of the former issue is, however, of some interest.

As noted, even as he was testifying to the loss of the Chevrolet bids in June 1985, Robert Adair was very persistent in telling counsel for the Charging Party that Respondent loses bids "of that magnitude . . . . every day of the week . . . all the time . . . absolutely" including work that the firm had performed the previous year. He also insisted that loss of sales in 1 year is at best only a "slight consideration" in assessing what he expects the future to bring—"last year is ancient history." In attempting to dramatize the loss in sales as a result of the June 1985 bidding, Respondent was very guarded in offering documentary evidence that might show the overall sales for the fiscal years involved, even though it was urged to do so by virtue of a ruling by me.

Through Genevieve Rakstis, an accountant employed by Adair for 27 years, evidence was adduced that "like 90 or 95 percent" of the work done for Chrysler, Ford, and General Motors over the years has been performed at Standish, and that "like 90 percent, I think," of the work done at Standish is for those three customers. How Rakstis deduced these figures is unclear, because Robert Adair, when asked to approximate what portion of overall volume was produced at Standish in fiscal year 1986, testified that he did not know because "we don't keep separate records of what is done at Standish or what is done at Dexter. . . . [W]e have no records saying which one was done where."[42]

Putting that problem aside, however, Respondent introduced some salemen's commission records, which shows a comparison between total sales to the three automobile companies for Respondent's fiscal year ending 30 June 1984, 1985, and 1986. These records reflect that for the years ending 30 June 1985 and 30 June 1986, sales to General Motors dropped about $1 million (from about $1.7 million in fiscal year 1985 to about $700,000 in fiscal year 1986).[43]

It is, however, very difficult to know from these bare figures for only three clients how well the Company was doing during the remainder of 1985 and the first part of 1986 because the figures represent only about one-third of Respondent's $9 million total sales volume, as testified to by Adair. Although an attorney for Respondent stated that they had "total sales figures for all the corporations," Respondent chose not to introduce them; given Adair's concession that the Respondent did pick up "some" new work during 1985–1986, the remaining figures may have cast a revealing light on an obscure corner of the case, and it would not be unfair to draw an adverse inference against Respondent for its resistance to painting a complete picture. Plumbers Local 669 v. NLRB, 789 F.2d 9, 15 fn. 18 (D.C. Cir. 1986). (Board correctly discounted employer's assertions that it made 150 unsuccessful bids in the absence of any documentation to support the claim.) It is well to recall at this point the uncontroverted and entirely credible testimony of Rockwell's Glenn Hill that, in September 1985, Robert Adair had told him that "business was real good and they were thinking of creating a third satellite plant . . . possibly in Michigan, or possibly in Indiana." I can see no reason for Adair to have lied so elaborately to Hill about the well-being of his business—and this was months after assertedly losing the Chevrolet work.

Also relevant here is the uncontradicted testimony of employee Cummings that on an occasion before the union activity commenced, as he and Dennis Adair talked about the new press, the latter said that it had "better register and is supposed to do a lot better color work," and the Company was "trying to expand into a new field where they can get more work for the color." It would be of considerable interest to know what the remaining undisclosed sales figures show.

The last time that Adair was asked (by his counsel) why "in June of '85" he "made the decision not to have the press delivered to Standish," he again answered in terms of the lack of an overall basic need for the machine itself rather than the choice of placement. He referred to the "invasion" by the Canadian printers and the information he had received indicating that General Motors would be producing its own service manuals in the future. When he spoke of this topic the first time, Adair stated that "General Motors photographic announced a $4 to $6 million dollar expansion of their facilities to handle more work." The second time, he offered a somewhat different account: "my conversation with people at GM photographic who informed me they were going to make a very large expansion in their plant and that they would possibly be doing all General Motors service manuals in the future." He went on, indeed, to expand on conversations with other equipment firms which indicated equipment purchases by General Motors geared not only to the production of service manuals for General Motors, but also for "other people," meaning [41] This included a bid, apparently lost in September, for a 3-year contract for Michigan state income tax forms which Respondent had performed at Standish for 8 of the preceding 9 years.

[42] Despite this professed lack of knowledge, however, several pages earlier Adair had been able to state that he thought that "all of the Chevrolet manuals were done at Standish" in fiscal year 1984. Later, he said that he "thought" volume was down in Standish in fiscal year 1986, "but I don't know because we don't keep separate records."

[43] They also show a lesser decline in the Ford account—from about $1,370,000 in fiscal 1985 compared with about $1,260,000 in 1986. Sales to Chrysler, however, rose from about $700,000 to $880,000. These latter sets of figures would seem to indicate that the "Canadian printers" may not have represented as much of a threat to the market as Adair tesified. It is also worth noting that Respondent's sales to these three companies during the fiscal year ending 30 June 1984, not long after which, according to Respondent, it was encouraged to purchase the new press, amounted to about $3,263,000 compared with sales of $2,866,000 for the year ending 30 June 1986, a difference of only about $397,000.

that Respondent might be losing "more than just General Motors' business . . . to this equipment."

Respondent also introduced evidence that it made an attempt in March 1986 to sell the new press, again pursuing what I view as a misguided theory of the real issue here. One might note, however, that while the evidence unquestionably supports a conclusion that Respondent did advertise the press for sale in a single issue of the "Printers Hot Line" on 5 March 1986, the sales effort does seem half-hearted. Thus, the ad was carried only once; Adair testified that his asking price for the press, not shown in the ad, was "the same we paid for it, approximately $770,000," without indicating why he would not be willing to take a loss on a piece of equipment he did not need; he testified that he received "two or three responses" to the ad, but told us nothing else about them; and he never bothered to try to resell the press to Rockwell, which, of course, deals in this sort of used equipment. But if Respondent was not in fact interested in selling the press, what could be the reason for this documented, yet seemingly tepid, advertisement effort? One answer might be that a Board complaint was pending which alleged that Respondent's refusal to take delivery of the press was inspired by the successful union organizational effort.

There is also conflict in the testimony regarding when the decision was made not to place the new press at Standish. After Rockwell had stored the press gratis until January 1986, it was moved into commercial storage in Jackson, Michigan, for some months. At some time prior to May 1986, or so Adair testified, "We decided, my brother and I, that we had a lot of money in the press sitting there brand new[44] and decided that we would put it into our Dexter plant and run it and put our old press that was in Dexter as a standby press into Standish. We knew if we put it into Standish, it would just sit there. So we put it into Dexter so that we could get some use out of it." Thus, Robert at this point testimonially placed the decision around the spring of 1986. Robert was not, however, elsewhere consistent in answering this question. Thus, when asked by counsel for the General Counsel if it had been in May 1985 that the outlook for the new press going to Standish had changed, Adair replied that he could not be specific about the dates, but it was "[s]ometime in the spring when I saw these contracts leaving, when we made a decision." Because the contracts allegedly "left" in June 1985, Adair here pushed the "decision" back a year. But when Dennis, who was present during his father's testimony, was asked when he learned "that the decision would not be made [sic] to place the press in Standish," he replied that he "first learned about it around September [1985] . . . [r]ight around the time of the trip" to Chicago, from "Bob Adair, Sr." Thus, there appears to be a serious inconsistency within and between the two Adairs on this point, casting doubt on the overall veracity of Robert Adair concerning the timing of the decision.

When Adair was asked why the decision was made "in May" to ship the Goss to Dexter, he replied, "Well, our discussion was that if we put it in Standish it would sit there most of the time and not turn over . . . . [It would sit there because] we didn't have enough business to warrant two presses. We were running one press [at Standish] and turning out all the work we could get. And we had a lot of money in this press and we wanted to use it somehow so we put it in our main plant." Because the testimony was that both Dexter and Standish produced automotive manuals, the next logical question was asked—why Dexter instead of Standish? The answer was that Dexter was the "main plant": "There will always be work done in Dexter because our prep department is there but mainly because my brother John is there. And there are some jobs that I want him right there and he wants to be right there when they are printed for a number of reasons having to do with quality, delivery and so on." Adair explained that the "fast turnaround jobs" are done in Dexter because of "the proximity of the prep department and it is closer to Detroit. It is quicker."

For the following reasons, I find the foregoing explanation to be illogical:

1. If there was not enough work at Standish for two Goss HV presses, then there was also not enough work at Standish and Dexter for one each. On that assumption, does it make any sense to unpack, install, and perhaps occasionally use (for "fast turnaround jobs") a newly reconditioned press instead of continuing to vigorously attempt to sell it "STILL IN CRATES. NEVER USED," as Respondent's March ad in the "Printers Hot Line" proclaimed?

2. If the jobs for which Adair wanted brother John "right there" were the "quality" and "fast turnaround" jobs, it would appear that Respondent had been able to perform such work satisfactorily in the past with the existing Dexter equipment (Adair did not specify what were the "some jobs" for which he wanted John to be present, or how many such jobs there were to which he was referring). No reason is offered why the new Goss was suddenly needed for such work at Dexter. Obviously, Adair was not referring to the ordinary, year-in, year-out manual printing that had been done at Standish without John's immediate presence.[45]

3. Even if the foregoing made any sense, why did it take from June 1985 until March or April 1986 for its reasonableness to become evident to the Adairs? Adair testified that it was in June 1985 that he "made the decision that this press was a mistake" and he and his brother "discussed what to do. We had a problem." The fact is that the first and only nominal attempt to sell the press was not made until March 1986, and it remained in storage, after the Adairs finally inspected it in September, for about 6 months.

[44] The cost of the press and related equipment seems somewhat unclear. Adair testified, and the documents in evidence appear to confirm, that the total cost (not including $90,000 trade-in for the Color King) was $770,000. Rockwell employee Glenn Hill, however, put the "net" cost at $566,000, a figure that Respondent's brief adopts.

[45] On brief, Respondent does not even refer to the "mainly because . . . John is there" alleged purpose. The brief states: "reconditioned press shipped to Dexter . . . because Dexter had its own 'prep department,' was closer to Detroit automotive market, and had high volume, quick turn-around capability."

It should be pointed out that this same reasoning could have applied when the new machine was purchased in April 1985. A decision based on the same special factors (brother John's location; the quick turnaround jobs) would have then also made it equally sensible to send the new press to Dexter and ship the Dexter Suburban press to Standish, which already had one Goss HV. Such an explanation as Respondent offers has nothing to do with the volume of business, only the logistics. Instead of adopting that arguably sensible approach, however, Respondent had decided in April 1985 to put the new Goss in Standish—until the Union won the September election.

4. Subsequently, when asked again by counsel why the decision not to receive the new press at Standish was made, Adair said, "It was based on the fact that we had competitive problems and we were going to have less business at Standish and at Dexter, probably. And we didn't need that additional capacity." Asked if it was his assessment that Respondent could "produce the necessary volume of business with the one HV press that was at Dexter," Adair answered, "That is right. We discussed that and decided that we didn't need more than one." I find these replies most confusing.

As for the lack of "need" for "that additional capacity" because of a business decline, Respondent already owned the additional capacity; the question was where to locate it. As for the following question and answer, I am not sure what Adair meant. "[D]idn't need more than one" what? Respondent already owned at least two Goss HV presses to which the testimony specifically alludes, the existing one at Standish and the new one put in at Dexter.

5. Having given this involved rationale for ultimately sending the press to Dexter instead of Standish, Adair failed utterly to replicate it when asked by his counsel on redirect examination, "In '85 in June of 85 when you made the decision not to have the press delivered to Standish, what were the principal considerations then?" Adair replied, "the two principal considerations were the invasion of our market by the Canadian printers and my conversation with people at GM Photographic who informed me that they were going to make a very large expansion in their plant and that they would possibly be doing all General Motors service manuals in the future." For one thing, as already shown, Adair had testified that he and John had made the decision not to have the press delivered to Standish in the spring of 1986, and yet he was willing to accept the predicate of the question that it was "in June of '85." For another, the answer is not at all responsive to the question put; it is the answer to another question about why he may have been concerned that buying the new press was a mistake. Both errors show, I think, for a man of his stature, and poise, an unseemly uncertainty about the facts.

The preceding analysis finds a good deal of fault with the testimony of Respondent's principal witness in attempting to explain why the new press was shifted from the recently unionized Standish plant to the unorganized Dexter facility. In finding the testimony unbelievable, I do not think that I am simply disputing Adair's business judgment. Although, it is true, I consider certain aspects of the explanation highly improbable, I think such analysis is proper when the business "explanation" is as unlikely as this one is; and when it is accompanied by internal and external contradictions, failure to offer appropriate and available details, and similar insignia of unreliability, the weakness of the proffered explanation may be considered affirmative proof of the General Counsel's case. Wright Line, 251 NLRB 1083, 1088 fn. 12 (1980), "The absence of any legitimate basis for an action, of course, may form part of the proof of the General Counsel's case. See, e.g., Shattuck Denn Mining Company v. NLRB, 362 F.2d 466 (9th Cir. 1966)." For the reasons thoroughly set out above (including the express statements by supervisors linking the decision to the Union), then, I conclude that Respondent's decision to emplace the new press at Dexter instead of Standish was motivated solely by antiunion considerations, in violation of Section 8(a)(3).[46]

The complaint and the evidence presented appear to allege two different theories of an 8(a)(3) violation regarding Larry Foster and Cynthia Johnson. Paragraph 13 refers to the refusal to take delivery of the Goss press at Standish, "thereby causing the layoff of employees Cynthia Johnson and Larry Foster," because of the union activities, and union election victory, of "its employees" (emphasis added). Paragraph 14 alleges that the 25 September layoff of the two was motivated by "their activities on behalf of, and support for the Charging Union, and because of" the union election triumph. I take paragraph 13 to allege that the Johnson and Foster layoffs were simply a proximate consequence of the unlawful action of diverting the press, and paragraph 14 to mean that even if the altered decision about the press was lawful, the selection of Johnson and Foster for layoff was independently discriminatory.

Regarding the second contention, it is difficult to say that Foster and Johnson were selected because of their union activities.

[46] The Respondent errs in stating that, to sustain an 8(a)(3) violation, the General Counsel "must meet the Wright Line test and show that the action would not have taken place but for the union activity." That, of course, is not the test laid down by Wright Line; as the Board recently stated in Cullum Mechanical Construction, 281 NLRB 453 fn. 2 (1986), "We . . . do not adopt the judge's statement that the General Counsel had the burden of proving that Wokasch would not have been discharged absent his protected activity. See Wright Line, 251 NLRB 1083 (1980)." The test, as the Board further states in Cullum, is whether the General Counsel has established that "protected activity played a part" in the adverse action taken; in a so-called mixed motive case, the respondent may then attempt to show that the action would have been taken regardless of the protected activity. NLRB v. Transportation Management Corp., 462 U.S. 393, 400 (1983). Although I would, however, not consider the present case to be one involving mixed motives, see Transportation Management, supra at 399 fn. 4, in which event it would seem sufficient to prove that the protected activity played a part in the action taken, the Board holds that a Wright Line analysis is required in all cases involving an 8(a)(3) and (1) motivation, even where there is a finding of pretext, which "necessarily means that the reasons advanced by the employer either did not exist or were not in fact relied on, thereby leaving intact the inference of wrongful motive established by the General Counsel" (Bridgeway Oldsmobile, 281 NLRB 1245 fn. 2 (1986), quoting Limestone Apparel Corp., 255 NLRB 722 (1981).) It should suffice to say that I conclude that the General Counsel has established here that the union activity was a motivating factor in redirecting the press and that Respondent has not proved that, in the absence of such activity, it would have located the press at Dexter in any event.

Johnson was one of the committee of six who spoke to Adair in June about improved benefits. Employee Joseph Krozeleski testified that he once saw Johnson, Foster, and Naiman informing employees in the bindery about a union meeting that night, which prompted him to tell Adair "these guys are organizing a union." Whether, as the General Counsel assumes on brief, Krozeleski named the three is not clear; asked what Adair replied, Krozeleski said cryptically, "Not much really, because it was pretty much kept secret." It seems probable, however, especially in this small plant, that Adair came to know who the union activists were.

Johnson and former employee Judy Schumacher both testified that, probably in June, in speaking to Adair about the new press, they expressed a concern that it might be equipped with a "stacker" like the existing Goss, a device which could automatically perform their normal job of press "jogger," and which might result in their layoff. According to Johnson, Adair "told me and Judy not to worry, we would not be getting laid off because we would be put in the bindery department if [the new press] had a stacker." Adair was not asked about this statement, and he very well may have made it, but it would seem extraordinary if he meant it, given the history disclosed by this record.[47]

Although Respondent maintained no rigid classification system, the record shows that workers were broadly classified in the minds of both management and labor. Johnson was, clearly, considered "press help" (the classification given by Lachcik to himself at hearing); Carol Barber, testifying for the General Counsel, said that Johnson worked on the press "most of the time." However, it had not been uncommon in the past that when work slowed down on the Color King press, to which she was principally assigned, Johnson, who began her career in the bindery, would be detailed to the bindery to take up slack there, and sometimes she might find herself doing both kinds of work in the same day.

In the summer of 1985, as work on the Color King came to an end (Johnson was laid off for a week in June, together with all the bindery workers), she was assigned to the bindery at the time she was laid off on 25 September. She and Foster were called out of the punchout line by Adair to be told that they were being laid off; they gave different versions of the conversation.

Johnson recounted that she had told Adair that the choice was unfair "because I was working in the back [i.e., the bindery]," and Adair had replied, "Well, you are considered press and things are really slow so I am going to have to lay you and Larry off." Foster recalled only that Adair called the two of them out of line and said they were being laid off "for lack of work. That is all he said."

It is difficult to understand why Johnson would think her selection was unfair. Surely she understood that her primary job was working on the presses, and she also knew that, as she and Foster both freely testified, there had been other occasions in the past on which they had been laid off before other employees, primarily bindery workers, over whom they held companywide seniority.[48] Moreover, the likelihood of her imminent layoff in any event from the bindery work is made evident by the fact that also in September, four other bindery workers were laid off shortly after Johnson. Although Adair testified in answer to a question on cross that his "assessment of an employee's merit [is] the determining factor" in deciding who to lay off, there is no reason to believe that Johnson's work in the bindery was appreciably more valuable than that of those who normally worked there.

As for Foster, his union activity was more notorious—he had been a member of the original six-person committee, he was one of the two or three employees who had worn union badges before the election, he served as the union observer at the election (and, as discussed above, his name may have been mentioned to Adair by Krozeleski, as one of a group which was "organizing a union"). But with respect to his selection for layoff on 25 September, there is, as in Johnson's case, no substantial basis for inferring that the choice was related to such activity.

Foster testified that he worked in "the press department." Although the record is rather uncertain on the point, it is clear that, since around early July, very little or no work had been performed on the Color King press on which he had been employed. Thereafter, Foster was doing odd jobs (helping on the Goss press "if someone did not come in," a "little maintenance" around the plant, and "help[ing] out in shipping.") Taking as true the testimony of, inter alia, Foster, Johnson, and, ultimately, Barber, that Company seniority played no role in layoff selection (Foster, first employed in 1980, had been laid off for 3 months between November 1980 and February 1981; for 5 months in 1982, called back for 2 months, and then laid off for another month; laid off for 4 months in 1983, and then for another month in that year after returning for 19 days; and laid off for 2 months in 1984), there is no cogent proof that his selection in 1985 was unjustly motivated. Given that the only press crews working were the ones that normally operated the Goss (which did not include Foster);[49] the Sep-

[47] I might add that there were passages in the testimony of these seemingly dependable employees that left me wondering about their credibility.

[48] In her 7 years with Respondent as of 1985, Johnson had been laid off at least 13 times for periods lengthy enough to collect unemployment benefits.

[49] Foster testified that when he and Johnson were laid off in September, the other two employees who had previously worked on the now unused Color King "went onto nights." No effort was subsequently made at the hearing to develop this statement. As far as I can tell, Foster was simply wrong on this score.

Elsewhere in the record, Foster identified the three people who worked with him on the Color King until it was taken down as "Greg Walker, Cynthia Johnson and Judy Schumacher," and sometimes "Greg Kohn." Schumacher testified that she was granted personal leave for 3 months on 23 August 1985 and did not attempt to return until November. Employee Brian Lachcik testified that among the crew working with him on the press night shift from January–November 1985 were "Gregg Kohn" and "Greg Walker." Employee McMann, asked who were the other empoyees on the night shift "during the summer of 1985," also named "Greg Kohn" and "Craig [sic] Walker" (Lachcik also named a "Ralph Skelter" not mentioned by McMann). It seems fairly clear from this that Foster was wrong in saying that Walker (and/or Kohn and/or Schumacher) was transferred to the night shift when he and Johnson were laid off in late September. I do not believe, however, that Foster tember release of five employees from the bindery (the staff of which varies greatly with the amount of work being done); and the small size (two to three employees) of the remaining department, shipping-receiving-warehousing, it is difficult to conclude that Respondent was acting from antiunon motivation in determining that Foster should be the next to go.

This is not to say that a certain aura of suspicion does not emanate from the testimony and the basic facts of the case. Foster and Johnson were core members of the union effort, with Foster being particularly conspicuous. Because of the several record admissions that in the past Dennis Adair had often laid off regardless of plant seniority, it might have seemed the easiest course for him to say that the choice of Johnson and Foster was made on the basis of a lack of press work plus the kind of odd jobs that they had been doing. Instead, Adair became involved in an assertion that the other people in the pressroom "were more qualified at their positions . . . . [t]he other members of the crews were better at what they were doing than Larry could have been if he had replaced them." He also stated that Foster was "not qualified" to perform work in the bindery. He eventually came around, however, to saying that there was sort of a presumption of superiority; "But I would not lay somebody off that was normally in that position, because if they are normally in that position, they're there because they're good, and I'm not going to replace them." He then answered "Yes" to the leading question, "Is it fair to say you maintained the crews intact?" In explaining the choice of Johnson, Adair could not rely on her lack of qualification to perform bindery work, so he simply stated that she was not a "bindery worker," and therefore not entitled to consideration over those who were.

There is something dubious about all this. Nonetheless, given the unquestioned absence of any policy favoring companywide seniority, and the fact, so far as the record shows, that Foster and Johnson were the next likely candidates for layoff (with other bindery workers following a few days later), I cannot conclude that the selection of those two for layoff on 25 September should be attributed to their union association.

The other question apparently posed by the complaint—whether the diversion of the new press had the consequence of causing the layoff of Foster and Johnson (perhaps more appropriately a subject for discussion in the remedy section)—can be answered briefly. To reach a conclusion of consequential discrimination, the record would at least have to show that, had the new Goss been installed at Standish by 25 September 1985, there would have been additional work done on that press. There is no such evidence in the record, nor can it be assumed. If the record contained some description of what work was performed on the new Goss at Dexter during that period, there might be some basis for drawing such an inference, but the record is silent in that subject. Accordingly, I recommend that this allegation be dismissed.

D. The Alleged 8(a)(5) Violations

Regarding the allegations of unilateral action laid under Section 8(a)(5), however, the General Counsel has made her case. As previously noted, layoffs are a mandatory bargaining subject about which an employer cannot act unilaterally after a union has prevailed in a representation election. Clements Wire & Mfg. Co., supra, 257 NLRB 1058, 1059 (1981). The failure to notify and consult with the Union about the layoffs of Foster and Johnson on 25 September, presenting the Union instead with a fait acompli, thereby violated Section 8(a)(5).[50]

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. Respondent Adair Standish Corporation is an employer engaged in commerce and in an industry affecting commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act.

2. Flint Local 282-C, Graphic Communications International Union, AFL–CIO is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

3. By, in or about July 1985 and August 1986, telling employees that a new printing press would not be, might not be, or was not installed at the Standish, Michigan plant, because of the union activities of the employees; in September 1985, posting a notice inviting employees to revoke their union authorization cards while failing to notify employees that their decisions on the matter were voluntary and would not adversely affect their employment, and having a supervisor personally inform employees of this program; in October 1985, in an atmosphere of hostility to the union, conducting an interview of an employee in preparation for a hearing on objections to an election, and, while conducting such an interview, exceeding the legitimate scope of inquiry, an failing to inform the employee that her participation was voluntary and that she could refuse to answer any questions, Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.

4. By, in 1985 and 1986, refusing to install a new printing press at the Standish, Michigan plant as it had originally intended and instead installing the press in its Dexter, Michigan plant; and by, on or about 13 September 1985, announcing and implementing a new and more strict attendance policy, and, on 17 September, applying deliberately intended to lie about a matter so easily subject to documentary and other refutation.

This matter is further confused by the testimony of Johnson that the employees who worked with her on the Color King had been Foster, Schumacher, and Bob Bonner (and Ray Moore "before he quit" in June 1985). There is no evidence, from the identification of the night crew given by various employees, that Bonner ever transferred to that shift. Foster testified that when he occasionally worked on the Goss during the summer of 1985. Bonner was the "roll stand attendant," and he further stated that, at the time of his testimony, Bonner was still working on that press, presumably on the day shift. Bonner was one of the group of six that met with Adair in June about increased benefits, and he also met with the union organizer thereafter.

[50] The fact that there existed an established past practice of making such layoffs would seem to be totally immaterial in the presence of a new bargaining agent, which, of course, has never had an opportunity to acquiesce in, or waive its rights to be consulted about, the Employer's right to take such action unilaterally. As the Board held in Clements Wire and again in San Antonio Portland Cement Co., 277 NLRB 309 (1985), quoting Elito Corp., 263 NLRB No. 106 (Aug. 31, 1982) (not reported in Board volumes), "while an employer may properly decide that an economic layoff is required, once such a decision is made, the employer must nevertheless notify the union and, upon request, bargain with it concerning the layoff."

the policy to employees Cummings and Lachcik, Respondent violated Section 8(a)(3) and (1) of the Act.

5. By, in September 1985, unilaterally changing its attendance policy and laying off employees, Respondent violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act.

6. In all other respects alleged in the complaint, the General Counsel has failed to establish that Respondent violated the Act.

THE REMEDY

Certain remedial relief is called for by the conclusions reached above, in addition to the customary cease-and-desist order and the posting of notices.

First, I shall recommend that Respondent be required to transfer the new Goss HV press from the Dexter plant to the Standish plant, as had been originally contemplated prior to the advent of the Union. That will help to restore the intended status quo. If, of course, future bona fide business considerations warrant removal or sale of the press, nothing in the law would preclude such action.

Second, Larry Foster and Cynthia Johnson must be made whole for their layoffs, which were accomplished without the notice and consultation required by law. Clements Wire, supra at 1059, and cases cited at fn. 8. It is obvious from the record that layoffs and recalls are frequent at this plant. Foster testified that he was recalled to work "sometime in May" of 1986; he was employed at the plant on 6 August, the day he testified. It seems fair to assume that reinstatement occurred on the day in May on which he was recalled, but because there may be some unknown problem about his reinstatement I shall include in the remedy a provision for his reinstatement.

Johnson testified that she was recalled around Christmas 1985, worked 3 days,[51] was laid off again, and was called back for 1 day in January. I sustained an objection to further questioning whether she "refuse[d] reinstatement" when she was called back to work in mid-April, on the theory that recalls made subsequent to the filing of a charge of discrimination are not relevant to the issue of discriminatory motivation. In Johnson's case, I do not believe that a termination date can be determined here for her backpay period; that will have to be resolved at the compliance stage.

Clements, supra, had the employer bargain, on request, with the union concerning layoffs that had occurred during a 20-month period; because we deal here with ony two employees, one of whom has evidently been reinstated, I see no need for such a specific order. I have considered the General Counsel's recommendation that the backpay remedy apply to "any employees in the unit who have been unilaterally laid off since September 13, 1985." But the record establishes with any clarity only the unilateral layoff of Foster and Johnson. Unlike the new disciplinary policy, the evidence does not show that the Respondent adopted a "policy" of unilateral layoffs which was presumably applied thereafter.

The Board has adopted some slightly varying remedies recently in these unilateral layoff cases, perhaps based on its knowledge about whether employees have or have not probably returned to work. Compare San Antonio Portland, supra, with Flex Products, 278 NLRB 417 (1986). For want of a better reason for choosing, I shall follow the formula in Flex, the more recent case. Both Foster and Johnson should be made whole for their net loss of earnings from 25 September 1985 to the date of Respondent's offer of reinstatement to them, with interest, in accordance with F. W. Woolworth Co., 90 NLRB 289 (1950), and Florida Steel Corp., 231 NLRB 651 (1977).[52] The same monetary remedy should apply to Edward Lachcik regarding his 2-day suspension.

The disciplinary notices issued to Cummings and Lachcik on 17 September 1985 must be rescinded and excised from their records. In this instance, the adoption of the new tardiness policy was an affirmative act, and it is fair to presume that it has been applied according to its terms. As the Board held in Van Dorn Plastic Machinery Co., 265 NLRB 864 (1982), the rule must be rescinded and the status quo restored by removing from their records and making whole all employees "adversely affected" by the "unilateral change in [the employer's] attendance/tardiness program including, as appropriate, reinstatement to their jobs and backpay" in the manner set forth above. The policy threatening "immediate" discipline for every instance of tardiness, and the one offering to assist in revoking authorization cards, must also be rescinded and notice thereof removed from the walls.

The General Counsel seeks the inclusion of a visitatorial clause to assist in assessing compliance with this Order. The General Counsel has, as a matter of rote, included this request in every brief filed with administrative law judges over the past several months, and has also made the clause subsequently an issue before the Board. Although not flatly rejecting the possibility of adopting such a clause, the Board has not, to my knowledge, ever done so; its reaction appears to have invariably been that the clause is "not appropriate" in the circumstances of the case before it. E.g., E. B. Manning & Son, 281 NLRB 1124 fn. 1 (1986); Princeton Holiday Inn, 282 NLRB 30 fn. 2 (1986) (finding clause "unnecessary" even in absence of exceptions to it). Although the clause seems benign enough and probably useful, I cannot distinguish the present case from others in which the Board has determined it to be inappropriate. I shall therefore not recommend approval of the General Counsel's request.

On these findings of fact and conclusions of law and on the entire record, I issue the following recommended[53]

ORDER

The Respondent, Adair Standish Corporation, Standish, Michigan, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall

1. Cease and desist from

[51] A period about which she exhibited some uncertainty on cross-examination.

[52] See generally Isis Plumbing Co., 138 NLRB 716 (1962).

[53] If no exceptions are filed as provided by Sec. 102.46 of the Board's Rules and Regulations, the findings, conclusions, and recommended Order shall, as provided in Sec. 102.48 of the Rules, be adopted by the Board and all objections to them shall be deemed waived for all purposes.

(a) Refusing to bargain with Flint Local 282-C, Graphic Communications International Union, AFL–CIO (the Union), or any other labor organization, by, after a union has prevailed in a representaton election, making material changes in the existing terms and conditions of employment of its employees without consulting the union.

(b) Discriminating against employees for supporting the Union or any other labor organization by transferring equipment in order to diminish the employment oportunities available to such employees and by promulgating more stringent attendance rules.

(c) Telling employees that equipment would not be or might not be or was not installed at their plant because of their union activities.

(d) Informing employees about, and assisting them in the exercise of, their right to revoke authorization cards, without also notifying employees of their right not to do so and of the fact that employees who fail to take advantage of the offer would not be adversely affected; and having supervisors personally inform individual employees of the right to revoke their cards.

(e) Conducting interviews with employees in preparation for a hearing (i) without informing them that their participation is purely voluntary and that they can refuse to answer any questions, or (ii) in an atmosphere of hostility to the union involved, or (iii) while conducting such interviews, exceeding the legitimate scope of inquiry for such interviews so as to unnecessarily and coercively intrude into the Section 7 activities of employees.

(f) In any other manner coercing, restraining, or interfering with the Section 7 rights of employees.

2. Take the following affirmative action necessary to effectuate the policies of the Act.

(a) Promptly install in its Standish, Michigan plant the Goss HV press which was installed in the Dexter, Michigan plant in May 1986.

(b) If it has not already done so, reinstate Cynthia Johnson and Larry Foster to their former jobs or, if those jobs no longer exist, to substantially equivalent ones, without prejudice to their rights and privileges, and make them whole in the manner set forth in the remedy section of this decision. In addition, make whole any employees, including Edward Lachcik, who have suffered losses, including suspension and discharge, stemming from application of the new policy relating to tardiness adopted on or about 13 September 1985.

(c) Remove from its files any reference to the layoffs of Larry Foster and Cynthia Johnson on 25 September 1985, and any references to the disciplinary notices issued to Tim Cummings and Edward Lachcik on 17 September 1985 and to other disciplinary action involving other employees since on or about 13 September 1985 issued pursuant to the new tardiness rule adopted at that time, and notify them all in writing that such removal has been made, and that such adverse actions will not be used as a basis for future personnel actions against them; and rescind the 13 September 1985 tardiness disciplinary policy and the offer of assistance for the revocation of union authorization cards also announced on or about 13 September 1985, and remove the posted notices of such policies.

(d) Notify and consult with the Union, on request, before making changes in any mandatory subject of bargaining.

DECISION AND ORDER

BY MEMBERS JOHANSEN, BABSON, AND CRACRAFT

On December 29, 1987, Administrative Law Judge Thomas A. Ricci issued the attached decision. The Charging Party filed exceptions and a supporting brief, and the Respondent filed an answering brief.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the decision and the record in light of the exceptions, supporting brief, and answering brief and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings,[1] and conclusions[2] and to adopt the recommended Order.

ORDER

The recommended Order of the administrative law judge is adopted and the complaint is dismissed.

[1] The Charging Party has excepted to some of the judge's credibility findings. The Board's established policy is not to overrule an administrative law judge's credibility resolutions unless the clear preponderance of all the relevant evidence convinces us that they are incorrect. Standard Dry Wall Products, 91 NLRB 544 (1950), enfd. 188 F.2d 362 (3d Cir. 1951). We have carefully examined the record and find no basis for reversing the findings.

Additionally, we are satisfied that the Charging Party's contention that the judge was biased is without merit. Thus, although the judge, albeit improvidently, stated at sec. III,5, par. 2 of his decision, that "Silvus' purpose was to lie at the hearing" and that "counsel for the [Charging Party] refused to answer the question on the record," and further stated at sec. III, par. 7, that the Region "concluded that Weaver was not telling the truth in his signed charge," none of these isolated statements nor any other record evidence demonstrates judicial bias or the failure of any party to receive a full and fair hearing.

[2] The Charging Party excepts to the judge's finding in sec. III, 9, par. 3, that its representative Rauch "had his daughter write up [the October 7] letter, and that she relied upon notes he had written." The Charging Party claims that its district director, Weaver, rather than Rauch, authored this employee letter. Although we agree with the Charging Party that Weaver testified that he wrote the letter, and that Rauch disclaimed authorship, we find sufficient evidence to support the judge's finding that Rauch was actually responsible for the letter insofar as it stated that the Respondent intended to implement its final offer. Thus, Weaver testified that his negotiating notes reflect important discussions between the parties, and that he considered the Respondent's announced intent to implement its final offer important. However, Weaver's October 7 bargaining notes make no mention of this statement. Conversely, Rauch's negotiating notes for the final bargaining session state that the Respondent intended to put its final offer into effect. As Weaver instructed Rauch to prepare the employee letter from Weaver's notes, Rauch prepared the letter, and Rauch's notes were affixed to Weaver's affidavit and the employee letter at the hearing, the evidence is sufficient to conclude that Rauch inserted this statement into the employee letter. In any event, a contrary conclusion would not affect our determination of the merits of the complaint.

In sec. III, par. 8, the judge found that the detailed record testimony of contract negotiations was irrelevant to these proceedings absent any allegation that the Respondent bargained in bad faith or refused to bargain with the Union. We disagree. The substance of the bargaining sessions is relevant to the issue of bargaining impasse, a complaint allegation in this case. However, because we agree with the judge that the Respondent did not threaten to implement its final offer and, further, that the strike was economic, we need not reach the impasse issue.

We expressly disavow the judge's statement in sec. III, par. 7, that "In other words, [the Region] concluded that Weaver was not telling the truth in his signed charge." Neither we nor the judge knows the precise basis for the Region's dismissal of Weaver's 8(a)(5) charge that the Respondent unlawfully implemented its final offer.

Finally, we correct the following errors of the judge: (1) in sec. III, par. 3, the statement "Paul Gorman . . . recalled that Eugene Weaver . . . asked him, twice . . . whether the Company intended to implement its last offer of settlement," is corrected to reflect Gorman's testimony that Weaver once asked him this question; (2) in sec. III, par. 4, the statement "But the Company at the same time also told the Union agents that it was willing to continue the collective bargaining process," is corrected to reflect that the Union told the Respondent that it was willing to continue negotiations if the contract were extended; (3) in sec. III, 5, par. 2, the statement "counsel for the Respondent" is corrected to state "counsel for the Charging Party." These corrections do not affect the outcome of this case.

H. Victor Hansen, Esq. and Lawrence S. McGoldrick, Esq. (Fisher & Phillips), of Atlanta, Georgia, for the Respondent.

DECISION

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

THOMAS A. RICCI, Administrative Law Judge. A hearing in this proceeding was held at Marietta, Ohio, on 30 September and 1 October 1987, on complaint of the General Counsel against Globe Metallurgical, Inc. (Respondent). The complaint issued on 9 June 1987, based on a charge filed on 1 April 1987 by United Steelworkers of America, AFL–CIO–CLC (the Charging Party). The issue presented is whether the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(5) of the Act. Briefs were filed by all parties.

On the entire record and from my observation of the witnesses, I make the following[1]

FINDINGS OF FACT

I. THE BUSINESS OF THE RESPONDENT

Globe Metallurgical, Inc., a Delaware corporation, is engaged in the production and sale of ferroalloys at Beverly, Ohio. During the calendar year preceding 31 December 1986, in the course of its business operations, it sold and shipped from its Beverly, Ohio facility products, goods, and materials valued in excess of $50,000 directly to points outside the State of Ohio. I find that the Respondent is an employer within the meaning of the Act.

[1] Counsel for the Charging Party filed a posthearing motion to reopen the record for the purpose of offering into evidence two letters exchanged between the Respondent and the Union in March 1987. The motion is denied.

II. THE LABOR ORGANIZATION INVOLVED

I find that United Steelworkers of America, AFL–CIO–CLC is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

III. THE ALLEGED UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICE

This entire case turns on a very simple, very limited, and very plain question of fact. Did a spokesman for the Respondent, at the end of a 13-day long, fruitless collective-bargaining session, utter the word "yep," when asked by the principal spokesman for the Union whether the Respondent intended to implement its last offer of contract renewal? The effective contract expired several hours after that word is alleged to have been uttered, and the Union called a strike of the 150 to 200 employees in the bargaining unit at the very moment the contract expired—at exactly 12:01 a.m. on 8 October 1986. For some months thereafter the Respondent continued its reduced operations with its old salaried and managerial employees doing the reduced work of the striking employees. And then, 7 or 8 months later, in 1987, it started to hire replacements for the strikers, about 50 all told. Throughout that entire period the Respondent did not change any of the conditions of employment of any of its employees in the bargaining unit as set out in the contract that had expired in October 1986. Indeed, in the summer of 1987 it asked the Union to send some of the strikers back to work. The Union refused to permit that, and the strike went on.

The sole remedy asked by the General Counsel, if the complaint prevails, is a finding now—that is, at the time of the hearing—exactly 1 year after the strike started, that it was an unfair labor practice strike as distinguished from an economic strike.

Paul Gorman, who led the Respondent's group throughout the long negotiation sessions through August, September, and October, recalled that Eugene Weaver, the district director of the United Steelworkers, asked him, twice, towards the end of the last bargaining session, on 7 October, whether the Company intended to implement its last offer of settlement. Gorman said at the hearing that he was uncertain at that moment as to what the Company would do next, given his knowledge that the Union was on the verge of calling a strike. But he did directly deny telling Weaver that the Company intended to make any unilateral changes or implement a new contract.

The clearest reality shown on this record is that the reason the Union called the strike was because the contract expired and the Company refused to extend it further. Simply put, its decision was not to have its people work when there was not a binding contract in effect. At the last critical meeting on 7 October the Union repeated its request that the Company agree to extend the contract on a day-to-day basis; the Company refused. But the Company at the same time also told the union agents that it was willing to continue the collective-bargaining process. A better name for this kind of strike is a no-contract no-work strike. In plain words, an economic strike.

As it happens, I do not credit Weaver against Gorman. In the light of all the testimony I credit Gorman's denial of having said he would implement his last offer. But even were I to find that an agent of the Respondent made such a statement on 7 October, I would still have to find that that statement was not the cause of the strike that immediately followed. If the reason for the strike was simply that, why did the Union refuse to send its people back when the Company asked for them several months later, and when the Union well knew nothing at all had changed in the conditions of employment of any of the employees in the bargaining unit? Why did it wait 6 months before filing its charge with the Board, a charge that does not even allege what now constitutes the heart of the complaint?

In his testimony at the hearing Weaver said a reason for not permitting his people to go back to work in the summer of 1987 was because he did not know what the Company was paying the production and maintenance employees, or what it would pay the returning strikers. During that same period Weaver was again negotiating with the Respondent, as the Company had invited it to do in May 1987. In fact there were at least half a dozen such meetings between June and the time of the hearing in October. For a union agent so engaged to say he did not know what an employer was paying its people greatly impairs the witness' credibility.

His assertion as a witness conforms with the charge in this case, which Weaver personally filed, where he wrote that the Company had unilaterally implemented its demands for concessions on 8 October 1986. The Regional Office investigated that charge, of course, and found there was no merit in it, that the Company had not unilaterally changed any of the conditions of employment. In other words, that office concluded Weaver was not telling the truth in his signed charge. That is why the complaint is limited merely to the word "yep." Weaver's notes of the critical meeting of 7 October say nothing about implementation. When Weaver contradicted Gorman regarding the use of the word "yep," I do not credit Weaver.

More than half of the 2-day hearing was taken up with Weaver's detailed recital of all the minutiae that were discussed during the 13 bargaining sessions that took place from August to October. He kept repeating proposals and counterproposals, arguments and counterarguments, without end. The General Counsel placed into evidence Weaver's notes made concurrently with the talking that went on; they total over 250 sheets of lengthy, finely written words. In turn the Respondent offered as exhibits the simultaneous notes made by one of the management representatives who attended all the meetings for that very purpose. They total over 220 pages. In addition there are copies of many written proposals offered back and forth throughout the period. There is no allegation of bad-faith bargaining by the Respondent. There is no allegation that the strike was caused by any refusal to bargain. Because of the objective evidence showing beyond a doubt that this was an economic strike and not an unfair labor practice strike, I see no purpose in repeating in this decision all the irrelevant data about what the parties said to one another throughout all those bargaining sessions.

The following facts, clear on the record, suffice to dispose of the entire proceeding. Chronologically:

1. On 29 September 1986 the Union asked the Company to agree to extend the contract—due then to expire at 12:01 on 1 October—on a day-to-day basis. The Company refused. As an inducement to prevail on the Company to agree to that arrangement, the Union said it would—if the contract became binding only from day to day—not strike without giving the Company 2 days' notice in advance. In that very offer is shown the Union's state of mind to strike the moment the contract expired.[2] The parties did agree that day to extend the contract for 1 week, to 12:01 a.m., 8 October.

2. The parties met and discussed the issues again on 30 September and 2 October. At the 2 October meeting Weaver told the company agents he could not meet with them the next day because he had to meet with the employees. The following is his testimony regarding what he told the Company that day.

> We had not had an opportunity to meet with the membership and we were telling the Company that on the 3rd we needed to meet with the membership the following day. . . . To get authorization from the membership giving the committee the authority to make a decision in future meetings whether as to a right to strike or a right to extend this contract, whichever was necessary.

I can only read this statement of the Union's district director as an admission that the Union's position was that very day that there would either be a strike or an extension of the contract. It was a paraphrase of the old cliche: No contract, no work.

3. The next meeting took place on 6 October. This time Weaver had a letter with him when he arrived and handed it to Gorman. It again requested an extension of the contract on a day-to-day basis. It reads in part:

> If the Company accepts this proposal and the Union should later decide to strike, the Union will provide the Company with 48 hours notice of its intent to strike. We propose to use the 48-hour period for the purpose of meeting with Company representatives to assure that arrangements are in place for an orderly and safe shutdown of the Company's facilities.

The Company again refused. This was the Union, on 6 October, again making clear that absent an extension of the old contract a strike was already decided on. But Weaver's story is that the word "yep" did not come from Gorman until the next day. If strike action had already been decided on, how could the word "yep"—even assuming it was uttered the next day—have had anything to do with this case?

4. At the stroke of midnight on 7 October the employees walked off the job. Knowing this would happen the managers had the employees turn in their safety equipment before leaving. The very timing of the strike, of course, is the most convincing proof that the two facts were precisely related—contract expiration and strike. If the word "yep," allegedly uttered a few hours earlier, had really disturbed the Union into thinking about strike action, surely it would have waited a day or two to see if the Respondent really meant to change the employees' pay.

5. The Union's position in this entire picture is badly damaged by the testimony of David Silvus, a union committeeman who attended all the bargaining sessions. The General Counsel called him only to testify that he heard Gorman answer "yep" to Weaver's insistent questioning about whether the Company intended to implement its last offer. Questioning was then taken over by counsel for the Union. The lawyer led Silvus into agreeing with him that the employees did not strike that night, but that they were ordered out of the plant by management, in short, locked out against their will:

> Q. And were those people permitted to work who were scheduled to work on the midnight shift?
> A. No. They weren't.

The complaint says the employees engaged in a strike that night. Throughout Weaver's testimony he kept talking about the Union's strike action. Asked was the purpose of his questioning to prove the Union did not strike and that the men were sent home against their will, counsel for the Respondent refused to answer the question on the record.[3] Silvus' purpose was to lie at the hearing, and his testimony about the word "yep" makes even Weaver's testimony less credible.

6. The day after the strike started Carl McMannis, the Union's president, was interviewed by a reporter. He was quoted as follows in the local press of 9 October. The parties stipulated that he was correctly quoted.

> But McMannis said the Company's 11:30 p.m. shift did report to work. The workers left at midnight because they had no contract under which to continue working.
> The Company's final offer came at 10:15 a.m. Tuesday. It included a total reduction in wages and benefits of about $4.90 per hour as well as elimination of some jobs to save another $1.43 cents per hour. Total cost savings to the Company would be $6.33 cents per hour.

[2] This finding, which I make, is supported by a statement in the General Counsel's posthearing brief where he says: "It is clear that the Union's strike was prompted by Respondent's refusal to further extend the 1983–1986 contract."

[3] Obviously, the Charging Party's lawyer is in disagreement with his client, the district director of the United Steelworkers. In his brief he repeats—in conflict with his client's testimony as well as with the General Counsel's complaint—that on the night of October 7, 1986, the Respondent "sent them [the employees] home and locked the gates." His position is not enhanced by the fact—also asserted in his brief—that somebody in the Ohio Bureau of Employment Services expressed the opinion that when a work stoppage is a result of an employer's "refusal to extend the expired agreement," against a union's desire, the result is a lockout. The decision in this case will rest, as it must, on the credible testimony of the witnesses.

> The Union's negotiating team didn't accept that offer, McMannis said. When the Company refused to grant another extension of the old contract so that negotiations could continue, union workers had no choice but to go home as of midnight Tuesday.

If this statement does not call for the dismissal of the complaint in this case, I do not speak English.

7. Picketing went on for a year—from October 1986 to October 1987, when the hearing in this case took place. Not once did any picket sign mention unfair labor practice as having provoked the strike.

8. In April 1987 the Company asked the Union to come in and attempt to reach an agreement so that the entire problem could be resolved. A number of meetings did take place; the parties talked six or seven times, but no agreement was reached. At the start of these bargaining sessions the Company asked the Union to send some of the strikers back, for there were some jobs to be filled. The Union refused to do that. On 29 April 1987, Union President McMannis was again correctly quoted in the local newspaper: "It would be my wish that they wouldn't go back because we have no contract," McMannis said. Again, the union president calls for dismissal of the complaint.

9. Finally, on 30 May 1987 the Union held an outdoor mass rally of about 1000 members. Weaver was the master of ceremonies and the principal speaker. His total speech to the members was recorded and placed in evidence. After detailing the Company's demands for economic concessions, and after explaining the reasons for the Union's refusal to agree to lesser pay or to any agreement for reductions, one of the statements he made to all those people was that the strikers were "just simply conducting an economic strike."

Weaver tried to talk away this clearest admission that alone defeats the complaint by saying, as a witness, that it was a poor choice of words, that although he said the strike was economic he did not really believe it, and that, anyway, all those people present at the rally did not know the difference between the two concepts. His attempted explanation only serves all the more to discredit him in this case.

All this talk by Weaver also helps one to understand a letter the Union wrote to some of the strikers on the day after the strike started back in October 1986. In that letter they were told, among other things, that the Company "intended to implement their final offer at midnight October 7." The letter was offered in support of the testimony of Paul Rauch, a union representative, as further proof that Gorman had used the word "yep." Rauch testified he had his daughter write that letter, and that she relied on notes he had written about the last meeting after it had ended.

The note Rauch made to himself—also received in evidence—was prepared long after the meeting had ended, indeed after the strike had started at midnight. The note starts with the statement "locked out midnight October 7." This means he wrote the note on October 8, whereas the meeting he says he quotes from had ended at 10:30 a.m. the day before. Significantly, however, the notes written during the bargaining session by the union representative charged with that responsibility contain no reference to implementation or intent to implement anything. This means, of course, that what Rauch wrote in his note, the day after the meeting—that Gorman had said he would implement the contract, as well as the letter he had written to the strikers, represent only a figment of his imagination. The next phrase in his purported notes of the meeting reads: "Company made final offer and intended to put it in effect." To me, this writing was no more than the union officer's fabrication, as an afterthought, in support of the charge later filed accusing the Respondent of having put its last offer in effect. If there is one thing a district director of this Union would put down in his notes of a bargaining session, it is the statement by a company of an intent to commit an unfair labor practice.

On these findings of fact and conclusions of law and on the entire record, I issue the following recommended[4]

ORDER

It is recommended that the complaint be dismissed.

[4] If no exceptions are filed as provided by Sec. 102.46 of the Board's Rules and Regulations, the findings, conclusions, and recommended Order shall, as provided in Sec. 102.48 of the Rules, be adopted by the Board and all objections to them shall be deemed waived for all purposes.

DECISION AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN STEPHENS AND MEMBERS BABSON AND CRACRAFT

On September 15, 1986, Administrative Law Judge Frederick C. Herzog issued the attached decision. The Respondent filed exceptions and a supporting brief.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the decision and the record in light of the exceptions and brief, and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings,[1] and conclusions only to the extent consistent with this Decision and Order.

We agree with the judge that the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act by the statements of Mike Grant, one of the Respondent's owners, to employee Joseph Ennes in February 1985 and to employee James Perez in May 1985 that there was not going to be a union, and his threat to employee Preston Williams in June 1985, overheard by Perez, that he would fire Williams once the Union was out of the way. Further, we conclude, as did the judge, that the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(5) of the Act, but we base the violation only on the Respondent's unilateral changes in health and welfare benefits.

In the spring of 1985, the Respondent and the Union began negotiations for a collective-bargaining agreement to succeed the one scheduled to expire May 31, 1985.[2] After seven bargaining sessions, the Respondent submitted its final proposal dated May 30. The employees rejected the proposal on June 1, but did not vote to strike. As of June 1 the Respondent stopped making the payments to the pension and health and welfare funds that the expiring contract required. The parties met again on June 3 and 7, but did not resolve their differences. On June 11 the Respondent made another final offer that contained some provisions more restrictive than those it had proposed earlier.

From the evidence presented concerning negotiations, we conclude that the parties engaged in hard bargaining, remained far apart on key issues, and reached impasse as of June 1 when the employees rejected the Respondent's May 30 offer. The General Counsel does not contend, nor does the record evidence indicate, that the Respondent's conduct during negotiations through May 30 constituted bad-faith bargaining per se. The complaint alleges only bad-faith bargaining on or after June 11 and unlawful changes in pension and health and welfare benefits on or after June 1. Under these circumstances, we do not find, as the judge did, that the June 1 impasse was tainted by the Respondent's threats to employees or by any prior bad-faith bargaining. Rather, we find that the June 1 impasse was bona fide and, thereafter, the Respondent was free to implement its final offer of May 30.[3] As that offer did not provide for pensions, we find that the Respondent could lawfully terminate pension contributions after impasse, and did not violate Section 8(a)(5) when it discontinued payments to the pension fund designated by the contract. The May 30 proposal, however, did include a health and welfare provision that stated that the Respondent agreed "to remain in the Southern California Steel Fabricators and Boilermakers Trust." Accordingly, we find that the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(5) when, contrary to its final offer, it discontinued contributions to the health and welfare fund designated by the contract and established a different health and welfare plan as a condition of employment.[4]

Based on our review of the course and conduct of negotiations we do not agree with the judge that the Respondent's proposals of June 11 warrant the conclusion that the Respondent was engaged in surface bargaining.[5] On the issues of union security, checkoff, and pension benefits, the key issues that had separated the parties from the beginning of negotiations,[6] the Respondent's position, set out in the June 11 proposals, remained the same. Likewise, its position on a hiring hall, contrary to the judge's finding, was the same as its May 30 position, reserving for the Respondent the right to hire new employees from any source. The holiday benefits and wage classification rates proposed were also unchanged.

[1] The Respondent has excepted to some of the judge's credibility findings. The Board's established policy is not to overrule an administrative law judge's credibility resolutions unless the clear preponderance of all the relevant evidence convinces us that they are incorrect. Standard Dry Wall Products, 91 NLRB 544 (1950), enfd. 188 F.2d 362 (3d Cir. 1951). We have carefully examined the record and find no basis for reversing the findings.

[6] The parties stipulated that throughout the contract negotiations, the positions of the parties had been fairly consistent on the union security, checkoff, and pension issues, "with the employer consistently taking the position that union security and checkoff and pension not be part of the successor collective bargaining agreement, or not be included, and the union consistently taking the position that those three items be included in the collective bargaining agreement."

On some issues the June 11 proposals were more restrictive than the May 30 proposals. The June 11 proposals lengthened the probationary period for new employees and the employment period required for employees to earn prorated vacation benefits. They shortened the contract term from 2 years to 1 year, with the result that a limited second-year wage adjustment was deleted. They amended the grievance procedure and the strike and lockout provisions to omit arbitration and permit the Respondent to implement its final grievance decision and the Union to apply economic sanctions in response. They replaced the health and welfare plan of the expired contract with a different plan. It is significant, however, that the Respondent advanced its June 11 proposals after the parties had reached a legitimate impasse and its economic position was strengthened by the employees' failure to strike.[7] In these circumstances we do not think the June 11 proposals demonstrate that the Respondent had no intent to compose the differences it had with the Union and sought to frustrate bargaining.

In so concluding, we do not find that the Respondent's antiunion statements to employees and its unilateral changes in the health and welfare plan warrant a different result with respect to the Respondent's June 11 proposals. Thus, we note that two of the three antiunion statements were made prior to the parties' bargaining through May 30 and we have found, and the General Counsel has not alleged otherwise, that the Respondent did not engage in bad-faith bargaining through that date, notwithstanding the antiunion statements.[8] Further, although the Respondent's unilateral changes in the health and welfare plan violated Section 8(a)(5) and such conduct is a factor to be considered in determining whether overall bad-faith bargaining occurred, it does not necessarily follow from such conduct that the Respondent's June 11 proposals demonstrated an intent to avoid reaching an agreement with the Union. Roman Iron Works, 275 NLRB 449, 453 (1985). In this regard, we emphasize, as noted above, that many of the June 11 proposals were consistent with the May 30 proposals and that, although certain other of the June 11 proposals were more restrictive than the May 30 proposals, they were advanced after the parties had reached a legitimate impasse and the Respondent's economic position had been strengthened by the employees' failure to strike. Accordingly, considering the Respondent's overall conduct here under Atlanta Hilton, supra, we conclude that the General Counsel has not established by a preponderance of the evidence that the Respondent's conduct in making more restrictive proposals on June 11 constituted surface bargaining rather than good-faith, albeit hard, bargaining.[9]

AMENDED CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

Substitute the following paragraphs for the judge's Conclusions of Law 5 and 6.

"5. By discontinuing the health and welfare payments required by the bargaining contract that expired May 31, 1985, and replacing the contract health and welfare plan with a different plan, the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act.

"6. By threatening employees that there was not going to be a union and that the Respondent would fire an employee once the Union was out of the way, the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act."

REMEDY

Having found that the Respondent has engaged in certain unfair labor practices, we will order it to cease and desist and to take certain affirmative action designed to effectuate the policies of the Act.

We have found that the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act by failing to contribute to the health and welfare fund designated

[8] The judge, in finding that the Respondent's June 11 proposals were so regressive as to warrant an inference that the Respondent had no real intent to compose its differences with the Union, relied heavily on the Respondent's changed bargaining posture in 1985 compared to previous years. He concluded that the "real motivating factors" behind this change were an incident in February in which Grant expressed to the Union's shop steward his unhappiness with the Union's denial of pension benefits to Grant's father, a longtime union member, and Grant's confrontation in February or March with the Union's president concerning the treatment of the latter's son, who was employed by the Respondent. Even were we to consider these incidents as reflecting more than Grant's personal pique with the Union, such incidents would not be determinative of whether the June 11 proposals, in themselves, were so unreasonable as to constitute bad-faith bargaining. In any event, we note that these incidents occurred prior to the good-faith bargaining through May 30.

[9] Chairman Stephens would not extend the logic of Barry-Wehmiller Co., 271 NLRB 471 (1984), i.e., finding no manifestation of bad faith in an employer's offering the union a less favorable contract after it has weathered a strike, to the situation here, where the Respondent has altered its offer for the worse after the Union has simply voted to reject it and has, for the moment at least, declined to strike. The changes—in particular, the withdrawal of the offer to arbitrate grievances—were not insignificant, and they were made a little more than a week after one of the Respondent's owners told an employee that there was going to be "no union in the shop." Even granting that the parties had been at impasse over issues other than those involved in the clauses in which the regressive changes were made, Chairman Stephens would find that an employer that, without any real explanation, makes its total contract offer even less favorable than the offer already rejected is not seeking in good faith to reach a collective-bargaining agreement with the union. Thus, Chairman Stephens would predicate the 8(a)(5) violation on the additional ground of regressive bargaining.

by the contract that expired May 31, 1985, and by establishing a different plan. Therefore, we shall order it to bargain, on the Union's request, about health and welfare benefits and to reimburse the fund designated by the contract for the amounts it failed to pay from June 1, 1985, when it discontinued payments, through November 30, 1985, the date the parties stipulated the period of liabiiity should end.[10] We shall also require the Respondent to make whole employees for any losses or expenses incurred by reason of its unlawful unilateral conduct, with interest as computed in New Horizons for the Retarded.[11]

ORDER

The National Labor Relations Board orders that the Respondent, L. W. Le Fort Company, Inc., Placentia, California, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall

1. Cease and desist from

(a) Threatening employees that there will not be a union and that employees will be discharged when the Union is gone.

(b) Refusing to bargain collectively with International Brotherhood of Boilermakers, Iron Shipbuilders, Blacksmiths, Forgers and Helpers, Lodge No. 92, AFL–CIO, as the representative of its employees in the appropriate unit described below, by unilaterally discontinuing health and welfare contributions to the fund designated by the bargaining contract that expired May 31, 1985, or by unilaterally instituting a different health and welfare plan.

(c) In any like or related manner interfering with, restraining, or coercing employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them by Section 7 of the Act.

2. Take the following affirmative action necessary to effectuate the policies of the Act.

(a) On request, bargain with the Union as the exclusive representative of employees in the following appropriate unit concerning health and welfare benefits and, if an understanding is reached, embody the understanding in a signed agreement:

> All production and maintenance employees in the Respondent's plant located at 1136 Richfield Road, Placentia, California, performing work in manufacturing, fabricating, assembling, contract and repair shops, including the operation of all machines, mechanical devices and tools as may be required to properly perform and complete the work covered by the scope of prior collective bargaining agreements between the parties; excluding all employees who are presently represented through collective bargaining agreements with other unions affiliated with the AFL–CIO, office and clerical employees, technical and professional employees, guards and supervisory employees.

(b) Make whole unit employees by contributing to the health and welfare fund designated by the collective-bargaining contract that expired May 31, 1985, and by reimbursing employees for any losses or expenses incurred by reason of its unlawful conduct, in the manner set forth in the remedy section of the decision.

(c) Preserve and, on request, make available to the Board or its agents for examination and copying, all payroll records, social security payment records, timecards, personnel records and reports, and all other records necessary to analyze the amounts due under the terms of this Order.

(d) Post at its facility in Placentia, California, copies of the attached notice marked "Appendix."[12] Copies of the notice, on forms provided by the Regional Director for Region 21, after being signed by the Respondent's authorized representative, shall be posted by the Respondent immediately upon receipt and maintained for 60 consecutive days in conspicuous places including all places where notices to employees are customarily posted. Reasonable steps shall be taken by the Respondent to ensure that the notices are not altered, defaced, or covered by any other material.

(e) Notify the Regional Director in writing within 20 days from the date of this Order what steps the Respondent has taken to comply.

[10] Because the provisions of employee benefit fund agreements are variable and complex, the Board does not provide at the adjudicatory stage of a proceeding for the addition of interest at a fixed rate on unlawfully withheld fund payments. We leave to the compliance stage the question of whether the Respondent must pay any additional amounts into the health and welfare fund in order to satisfy our make-whole remedy. These additional amounts may be determined, depending on the circumstances of each case, by reference to provisions in the documents governing the funds at issue and, when there are no governing provisions, to evidence of any loss directly attributable to the unlawful withholding action, which might include the loss of return on investment of the portion of funds withheld or additional administrative costs, but not collateral losses. See Merryweather Optical Co., 240 NLRB 1213, 1216 fn. 7 (1979).

[11] In accordance with our decision in New Horizons for the Retarded, 283 NLRB 1173 (1987), interest on and after January 1, 1987, shall be computed at the "short-term Federal rate" for the underpayment of taxes as set out in the 1986 amendment to 26 U.S.C. § 6621. Interest on amounts accrued prior to January 1, 1987 (the effective date of the 1986 amendment to 26 U.S.C. § 6621), shall be computed in accordance with Florida Steel Corp., 231 NLRB 651 (1977).

[12] If this Order is enforced by a judgment of a United States court of appeals, the words in the notice reading "Posted by Order of the National Labor Relations Board" shall read "Posted Pursuant to a Judgment of the United States Court of Appeals Enforcing an Order of the National Labor Relations Board."

DECISION

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

FREDERICK C. HERZOG, Administrative Law Judge. This matter was heard by me in Los Angeles, California, and is based on a charge filed by International Brotherhood of Boilermakers, Iron Shipbuilders, Blacksmiths, Forgers and Helpers, Local No. 92, AFL–CIO (the Union) on or about 13 June 1985 alleging that L. W. Le Fort Company, Inc. (Respondent) committed certain violations of Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the National Labor Relations Act (the Act). On or about 30 October 1985 the Regional Director for Region 21 of the National Labor Relations Board (Board) issued a complaint and notice of hearing alleging violations of Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act.

The issues raised by the pleadings were tried before me on 11 and 12 December 1985. All parties appeared at the hearing through counsel and were given full opportunity to participate, to introduce relevant evidence, to examine and cross-examine witnesses, to argue orally, and to file briefs. Based on the record, and my consideration of the briefs filed by each of the parties, and my observation of the demeanor of the witnesses, I make the following

I. THE BUSINESS OF RESPONDENT

Respondent is a California corporation engaged in the business of fabricating products from steel and their installation in industrial and commercial establishments, having its office and place of business in Placentia, California. During the normal course and conduct of its business operations, it purchases and receives goods, products, and materials valued in excess of $50,000 directly from customers located outside the State of California.

Based on these admitted facts, I find that Respondent is an employer engaged in and affecting commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act.

II. THE LABOR ORGANIZATION

The complaint alleges, the answer admits, and I find that the Union is now, and at all times material has been a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

III. THE ALLEGED UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

A. The Issues

The complaint, as amended, or argued by the General Counsel at the trial, advances two propositions as the essential issues in this case. The first is that in or about February[1] and in or about May or June, Respondent threatened employees by stating that there was not going to be a union at Respondent. The second is that since on or about 11 June Respondent has failed and refused to bargain collectively in good faith with the Union by, among other things, submitting regressive proposals in an attempt to avoid agreement and to create an impasse in bargaining; as a consequence, the General Counsel asserts that Respondent has therefore violated Section 8(a)(5) of the Act by its failure and refusal to make health and welfare pension payments on behalf of employees into the appropriate trust funds, as set forth in the recently expired collective-bargaining agreement.

Another matter, which was apparently inadvertently left open by the parties as an issue in this case, concerns the appropriate description of the unit involved. Neither party disputes that this controversy involves only the Respondent's shop employees, and that Respondent's field employees are covered by a separate collective-bargaining agreement. The complaint alleges a unit described as "all production and maintenance employees performing work in manufacturing, fabricating, assembling, contract and repair shops, excluding all employees who are represented through collective-bargaining agreements with other unions affiliated with the AFL–CIO, office clerical employees, technical and professional employees, guards and supervisors as defined in the Act." The complaint's allegation in this respect comports substantially with the wording in the recognition clause of the collective-bargaining agreement between the parties, which expired on 31 May. The only difference in substance between the old recognition clause and that which was plead in the complaint is that the complaint's allegation fails to mention the inclusion of workers operating "all machines, mechanical devices and tools as may be required to properly perform and complete the work covered by the Scope of the [A]greement." Respondent's proposal of 28 March sets forth a recognition clause consistent with that which had been contained in the previous collective-bargaining agreement, as did the Union's proposal of 1 May. No change was made in the proposals advanced by Respondent on 30 May, 11 June, or 27 November, or by the Union's proposal advanced on 21 October, or by any proposal advanced by any party during the course of the negotiations. However, Respondent's answer denies paragraph 6 of the complaint, that being the paragraph setting forth the description of the unit. During the telephonic pretrial conference and at the trial itself, no resolution was reached, though counsel for the parties did agree during the course of the trial to get together at a later point and stipulate to some modified language satisfactory to all parties. The problem here arises from their failure to have done so, and from the failure of either party to subsequently mention the matter or bring it up in their briefs. Although I have no hesitance, based on their representation at trial and in conversations with me, in labeling this omission by counsel for the parties as mere inadvertence, rather then the product of a conscious design to inject another issue into the case, I am not at liberty to infer what their stipulation would have been. For, as I stated at the trial, the allegation regarding the appropriate unit must be treated as though denied. Of course, the burden of establishing every element of a violation under the Act is on the General Counsel. Western Tug & Barge Corp., 207 NLRB 163 fn. 1 (1973). And since a finding that bargaining has been sought for a unit appropriate for the purposes of collective bargaining is an essential element to a finding that Section 8(a)(5) of the Act has been violated, a failure of proof regarding it might ordinarily lead to dismissal of the complaint, notwithstanding the strong sense that such failure was due to mere inadvertence on the part of counsel for the parties. As has been demonstrated, however, the Union and Respondent have dealt with each other previously, and have had prior collective-bargaining agreements, as well as a number of proposals aimed at securing a new collective-bargaining agreement to succeed the expired agreement. Also, as shown above, each of these agreements or proposals contain identical language in their respective recognition clauses. I deem these documents to be sufficient evidence, in the absence of countering evidence from Respondent, of the appropriateness of the unit described in each such document. Accordingly, I find and conclude that a unit consisting of

> All production and maintenance employees in Respondent's plant located at 1136 Richfield Road, Placentia, California, performing work in manufacturing, fabricating, assembling, contract and repair shops, including the operation of all machines, mechanical devices and tools that may be required to properly perform and complete the work covered by the Scope of [prior collective bargaining agreements between the parties]; excluding all employees who are presently represented through a collective bargaining agreement with other unions affiliated with the AFL–CIO, office and clerical employees, technical and professional employees, guards and supervisory employees constitute a unit appropriate for the purposes of collective bargaining within the meaning of Section 9(b) of the Act.[2]

B. Background

Respondent, a California corporation, has, as noted above, been engaged in the business of fabricating structural steel, as well as the fabrication and installation of plating lines and fuming exhaust systems at its facility in [1] All dates will refer to the calendar year 1985, unless specified otherwise.

[2] This description is drawn from the several documents mentioned above, referring to the parties' previous collective-bargaining agreement and their respective proposals during the course of negotiations, all of which came into evidence as joint exhibits.

Placentia, California. Respondent and the Union have had a collective-bargaining relationship for over 40 years. For the last 29 of those years, the Union's business representative, Jack Doore, has either conducted or assisted in negotiations toward the successive collective-bargaining agreements with Respondent.

On 26 March the Union's president, George Cowie, wrote Respondent requesting that negotiations be commenced toward a new agreement to replace that which was due to expire at the end of May. Respondent and the Union thereafter entered into negotiations and, in fact, conducted nine bargaining sessions, on the following dates: 11 and 25 April; 1, 7, 13, 17, and 23 May; and 3 and 7 June. The negotiating parties also agreed that all agreements reached on individual issues would be subject to modification prior to full agreement being reached. Finally, the General Counsel notes in his brief that he does not contend that Respondent's conduct during negotiations through 30 May constitutes bad-faith bargaining per se.

C. The Alleged Threats

1. Joseph Ennes Jr.

Joseph Ennes Jr. worked for Respondent as a welder from 1977 until March. During the 9 months preceding the termination of his employment for medical reasons, he served as the Union's shop steward. Ennes recounted that sometime in February he was talking with Michael Grant, one of the two owners of Respondent, who oversees Respondent's plant and performs sales work in addition to operating as a superintendent and plant manager. According to Ennes, as they talked Grant mentioned that Grant's father, who had operated the plant for many years, had learned that he was not going to get a pension from the Union, ostensibly because he did not work with tools. Ennes recalled Grant going on to say that he was going to get out of the Union and that "they were going to try to get the Union out of the shop altogether." Under cross-examination, Ennes testified that Grant told him that both he and his brother Joe were going to resign from the Union and that his father, also named Joe, had been denied a union pension despite having made contributions to the Union's pension fund for a long time.

Mike Grant remembered the conversation, despite his inability to place its exact time period. As he recalled, that particular conversation had been preceded by others in which Ennes had expressed curiosity about the efforts of Mike Grant's father to obtain a pension. Mike Grant had been telling him in previous conversations that his father, Joe Grant, was having a difficult time. Mike Grant recalled that as he walked by Ennes that morning, Ennes asked him how his father was doing with his pension and that he responded that he did not think his father was going to get a pension and that his father was pretty upset about it. Mike Grant went on to say that he told Ennes that he was taking himself out of the Union, as was his brother, who is also a member of the management of Respondent. He explained this as motivated by his understanding that the difficulty encountered by his father was that the trustees of the pension wished to count only the time that his father spent working with his hands in the trade. He denied saying anything to Ennes about what would occur in the upcoming negotiations. Grant was not asked specifically whether he had told Ennes that he intended to end the Union's representation of employees in the shop.

I credit Ennes' testimony over that of Mike Grant. Ennes was careful not to enlarge on his statements and successfully withstood a vigorous cross-examination. Mike Grant, in contrast, was not even asked about the specific point in controversy.

Accordingly, I find and conclude that the General Counsel has proven the complaint's allegation that in February Respondent, through Grant, threatened employees by stating that there was not going to be a union at Respondent.

2. James Perez

Former employee James Perez worked for Respondent as a welder for about 6 months in 1984 and for about 2 weeks in 1985. This last period of employment ending immediately prior to the expiration of the collective-bargaining agreement, shown by other evidence to have been on 31 May.[3]
